Improving parking was the main platform of the Sheehan/Laubinger election campaign, and if there is one thing that that Sheehan wants the campus to know, it's that he and the rest of the SGA will continue to work hard for the community. "If there's anything specifically that UMass can take from this, it's that SGA can work," he said. "And we're really looking forward to continuing on this pace and getting things done."

Southwest tunnel revamp in UMass students' hands

By Karen Madsen
Collegian Staff

This Monday marks the final opportunity for students to submit art to the contest held by the Southwest Area government designed to select a new mural for the Southwest tunnel.

Southwest Area Governor Kerry Mulcahy has spearheaded the project and included it among her election platform when she ran for office. Gaye Reinhold, the Southwest North Operations Manager, and Jean Alstrand MacKimmie, of the Housing Department, have provided additional leadership for the project.

The Southwest tunnel has not been painted since the original job, completed more than thirty years ago. Hoping to engender a feeling of community spirit, Mulcahy conceived of a student initiated large-scale art project based on the theme, "There's no place like Southwest." The scheme is a collaboration between the Southwest Area Government and Housing Services. "Basically, we've been working since January to make this happen," Mulcahy said. "I've been personally working since I got elected."

During the summer, Housing Services will scrape the current paint off the tunnel walls preparing it for the commencement of the project in September. "It's awesome to see something we worked so hard for actually happening," mused Mulcahy about the ambitious undertaking.

"It's going to cost a lot. We're trying to get people to donate paint. A lot of the staff has volunteered to donate their time. The tunnel is 12 feet tall and 140 feet long, the roof of the tunnel can also be painted," explained Mulcahy.

Interested students must subscribe to following rules of the competition:

All participants must be current students attending the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

The winning contestant must be present for the Fall Semester 2001 to oversee the project.

All submissions must be dropped off at either the Southwest South or Southwest North Area offices by Monday, April 23, 2001. The offices are open 9-5 p.m., Monday through Friday.

All submissions will be judged on creativity, originality, capturing the theme "There is no place like Southwest" and the community spirit of Southwest, the ability to transpose the design to the tunnel, and whether it is something the faculty, staff, and students can enjoy for years to come. Designs must be created using only the following colors: red, orange, yellow, white, black, brown, purple and blue. No dark colors should be used for the background.

All designs must be submitted on standard size poster board, 22"x28".

All submission must have the name, graduation year, school and summer phone numbers, and school and summer addresses of the contestant. All information must be on the back of the poster board, not on the front of the design.

A panel consisting of University faculty, staff, and students will judge all submissions.

The winning designs will be displayed and unveiled during Southwest Week 2001.

Prizes totaling over $650.00 will be awarded for the top three submissions.

Pioneering calendar praised

By Chanel Dubofsky
Collegian Staff

On Thursday, April 19, members of the Pioneer Valley Lesbian community gathered together in the Campus Center at the University of Massachusetts to commemorate and say goodbye to the Lesbian Calendar, an important instrument in unity and solidarity since 1987.

Organized and edited by Pamela Kimmel, The Lesbian Calendar, "A Monthly Listing of Events By, For and About Lesbians in Western New England" includes information such as discussion and support groups, potlucks, personals, sporting events, performances, services, and activism opportunities for the community. The foundation of support for the calendar comes in the form of lesbian-friendly advertisements. "Cover dykes," are usually members of the lesbian community and have included authors such as Lesléa Newman and Emma Morgan. Photographer Gigi Kaeser, maker of the family diversity project 'Love Makes a Family' has worked on several covers. Cartoonist Alison Bechdel, creator of "Dykes to Watch Out For" contributed original drafts of her comic strip to the calendar, helping to bring in a loyal base of readers and contributors.

The event, sponsored by the Stonewall Center, featured a photo exhibit of past calendars, as well as time and space for women to tell their stories about the calendar. Jennifer Martin, a graduate student in Social Justice Education at UMass and a representative of the Stonewall Center, characterized the calendar as "a vital support system for the lesbian community," and highlighted its role in " documenting the history of the lesbian movement."

Many took the chance to herald organizer and editor Pamela Kimmel's profound work and efforts. "You were the one saying the word 'lesbian' when no one else was," one woman said. "You are a piece of how we built what we have now."

Another woman shared her story of becoming a godmother to two children through an ad she found in the calendar from two women, one straight, the other HIV positive. Others spoke of the contributions made by local groups and businesses who sought publicity in the calendar, which has played an invaluable role in creating the "strong lesbian community in the Valley."

The calendar is closing up shop, due to financial issues, but to celebrate the anniversary, the Stonewall Center plans to hold an art auction and fundraiser to benefit the calendar. All lesbian friendly people are encouraged to call 413-586-5514, to donate or for more information.

'Vocal Imprints' to celebrate unique Asian cultures, unity

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

The 18th Annual Asian Night will take place tomorrow evening from 6:00 p.m. to 1:00 a.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. The event, titled "Vocal Imprints," is put on by the Asian American Students Association and embraces peoples of all Asian cultures.

"We've been working on this since last semester. It takes one whole year to work on this; it's a huge event," said Sopheak Tek, one of the event's co-producers. "Every year, there are about 2,000 to 2,500 people waiting at the door. The Campus Center Auditorium only fits about 800."

The event is designed to celebrate the uniqueness, diversity and cultural richness of Asian and Asia America, as well as to promote unity among Asian cultures. The night will be broken into three parts: student performances, a reception with free food, and a dance party that will cap the evening.

"We have about 23 student performers. Asian Night is a night when all Asian ethnicities are united to work on this huge production," said Tek. "It's the one night that really promotes unity."

During the student performance part of the night, there will be singing, a fashion show, kung-fu and dancing – including the Cambodian Blessing Dance, an Indian dance and a Japanese dance.

Asian Night will also bring speakers Beau Sia, re:verse and Bilinkwellz to UMass. The three speakers will perform a special brand of slam poetry, according to Tek, keeping in the spirit of the night. Tek explained that the title is a way of breaking stereotypes of Asians being quiet or passive and for them to speak out about their identities.

"The guests that are coming do slam poetry. They speak of their identity," said Tek. "They speak of the Asian American political movement and they speak of their culture."

The event, which will be sponsored in part by the Arts Council, Greek Affairs, the Alumni Association and the Programming Board, carries an estimated cost of $20,000, according to Tek.

"They need to pay for a ton of food. They spend a ton of money on advertising too," said John Sheehan, Student Government Association President. "I have seen the budget for stuff like that and you'd be surprised how much money goes into stuff like that."

Tek and the AASA encourage everybody to attend tonight's free event.

"[People] will really be missing out if they don't come. It's really fun," said Tek. "It's not only Asian students that are participating in this. It's other RSOs as well such as The Black Student Union, fraternities and sororities. It's a good way to explore other cultures."

The AASA, according to Tek, promotes Asian identity by becoming politically involved on campus. It is an umbrella group for other Asian RSOs such as the Cambodian Students Association, the Vietnemese Students Association and the Japanese Students Association.

Beau Sia has released a spoken word CD, Attack! Attack! Go!, written a book A Night Without Armour II: The Revenge and appeared in two movies, Slam and Slamnation.

Bilinkwellz is a touring poetry/performing group committed to unearthing the rich histories of Asian people in America.

Reverse is the premier Asian American spoken word group in Washington DC. The group has involved itself on the national and local level in activism, and has conducted workshops across the country on poetry, youth leadership, census data and hate crimes.

Dormitory leaders recognized, honored

By Melissa Shattuck
Collegian Staff

The National Residential Hall Honorary (NRHH) is once again inducting members into their honorary. The honorary recognizes residents who have made outstanding contributions to residential life.

NRHH is spread throughout college campuses nationwide. The University of Massachusetts' branch was started four years ago. Most of its members have been highly involved with improving campus life and can be seen as members of House Councils and Area Government.

"Mostly Resident Assistants and Resident Directors are inducted," said Emily Hudson, senior Psychology major and NRHH President. However, anyone can be inducted into the honorary.

The National Residential Hall Honorary looks for individuals who have made unique contributions to residents and individuals who have shown strong leadership abilities. Inductees are usually involved with a variety of groups on campus, and have made a solid commitment to make residence halls a better place.

There are some requirements that need to be met in order to be inducted. The inductee must have a 2.5 GPA and no current judicial sanctions. Inductees' can either be nominated by RDs, ARDs, or one can nominate themselves. Inductions occur once a year and every spring people are invited to apply. Applications were located at the Center of Diversity and Development (CDD), at Moore residence hall in Southwest. Only the top 1% of residence hall leaders will be inducted.

"It's a way of honoring the top 1% of residential leaders," said Jackie Wiley, senior English major and secretary of the NRHH. "We look at leadership abilities and the person's commitment to residence halls."

This year's induction ceremony will include special guest speaker Alexandrina DesChamps. Professor of Women's Studies. DesChamps was chosen to give a congratulatory speech to the inductees because she is a professor who resides in Orchard Hill.

"Her speech will focus on what characteristics she has seen that exemplify being apart of the top 1% of residential leaders," said Wiley.

The induction ceremony will take place at 2 p.m. in Memorial Hall. It is not open to the public, but for information on which residents were inducted, contact Residence Life at the CDD.

Dance-A-Thon to 'shake it' for charity

The Bluewall will be rocking with the sounds of music and dancing on Saturday April 21 as UMass students participate in a Dance-A-Thon sponsored by Tzedek Hillel, the Jewish Student Union, Alpha Phi Omega, SHARE and Alpha Epsilon Phi. The event is a dance championship where students will request pledges of money for a charitable cause in exchange for dancing the night away. It will take place from 8:30 to 12:30 am, and will be DJ-ed by UMass student Dan Yagudin.

Proceeds from the Dance-A-Thon will benefit the Alma McLeod Foundation, which is dedicated to helping homeless children and families. More than 90 percent of the money that is raised will actually go toward helping the needy. In addition, some of the money will go toward helping a local charity.

The Dance-A-Thon is being sponsored by several student groups on campus. The first sponsor is Tzedek Hillel, a group based at Hillel House that is dedicated toward charitable work and helping the community. This year, Tzedek has already done many events to help those less fortunate in the Amherst community, including a mitten-making event and a canned food drive earlier in April. The Alpha Phi Omega service fraternity, the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity, and the Jewish Student Union are also sponsoring the event. In addition, Tzedek got a grant from the Harold Grinspoon and Diane Troderman Tzedakah Fund to help defray the expenses for the dance.

Pledge sheets to enter the Dance-A-Thon are available at Hillel House, 388 North Pleasant Street, and at the APO office at 409 Student Union. The minimum pledge that the sponsors are asking for from each participant is five dollars. However, the good news is that students do not have to collect the money themselves. Instead, the Alma McLeod Foundation will contact the sponsors during the summer to ask them for donations. Anyone is welcome to come to the Dance-A-Thon to help raise money to help the less fortunate.

The design, which was approved in 1999 and dedicated a year later, is expected to be completed in November of 2003. The memorial will consist of waves of 2,700 composite concrete pillars, standing at differing heights. The pillars are reminiscent of tombstones, thus symbolically recalling a cemetery. Underground will be an information room to explain the memorial. Young pointed out that deciding how to present information will be difficult. "What form will the German narrative take?" he commented. This again speaks to the complexity of German feelings about the past. The site, almost five square acres in the center of Berlin, is adjacent to the American Embassy and the Reichstag.

When asked how Germany should confront its past, Young said that he thinks the country is on the right track. "Germany wrestles constantly [with what to do]...as long as they wrestle and debate, I'm satisfied." He commented that "they have overcome enough to build a memorial." He stated that German participation in NATO's fight against genocide in Bosnia is a positive sign. Young also cited the reform of blood laws, which will make citizenship a factor of residence rather than blood kinship.

The audience was captivated by Young's talk. "Every time I hear you speak, I learn something," said one attendee.

People came to Young's Wednesday night lecture for various reasons. "I love art and architecure and I thought it would be interesting to come here the lecture," said freshman biology major, Hannah Fatemi. Melika Bessaoud concurred with Fatemi that this week's memorial activities served to "raise awareness about Holocaust Memorial Week" while providing interesting opportunities.

The lecture also interested art history major Katie Krol of Easthampton, who studies persecution of the Jews during Medieval times. "I wanted to hear Young speak and broaden my knowledge of the topic," she said.

Another student, sophomore Dave Neer, who just entered the Judaic Studies major, said he attended the lecture "to commemorate the Holocaust and to hear Professor Young speak."

Students only represented a portion of the audience, however. Professor Aviva Ben-Ur of the Judaic Studies Department, who presented a lecture Tuesday night, was present.

Shlomo Barnoon, Professor of Public Health, attended because he said, "I know he [Young] does excellent work and I like to hear what he's working on."

Young's lecture was sponsored by the Office of Jewish Affairs, Department of Judaic and Near Eastern Studies, Hillel House, and Jewish Student Union. Students Sasha Senderovich and Dan Yagudin were responsible for the planning this year's memorial week.

"The biggest challenge this year was to stay away from repeating what has been done many times over for various Holocaust commemorative events. We did not want to have another week of "Schindler's List" and "Life Is Beautiful," said Senderovich.

In choosing the speakers, Yagudin replied, "We wanted people who are on the cutting edge of Holocaust research."

A solemn memorial
In Oklahoma City

Yesterday, Oklahoma City stood in collective silence, as friends and relatives of those killed in the 1995 bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building gathered to remember those that were lost in the tragic act.

It is incredible to think that six years have passed already since the bombing, an event widely considered to be the worst terrorist attack to take place on United States soil. 168 people were killed – men, women, children, all the height if their lives, and all unassuming of the sudden end that would be brought to them.

As they do every year, a crowd congregated around the Oklahoma City National Memorial, recognizing 168 seconds, one for each victim. In a touching tribute to the lives lost. The memorial includes 168 glass and bronze chairs, which bear the names of the victims, and stands on the federal building's former site.

What makes this year so interesting, however – the sixth anniversary – is that Timothy McVeigh, the Oklahoma bomber, is set for execution less than a month from now, an event that has garnered much publicity from the national media.

McVeighs initial request that his execution be televised nationwide caused a stir, sparking debates that centered around his plea: should our nation, with no limitations, be witness to the death of one of the more horrific killers of our time?

In a compromise, United States Attorney General John Ashcroft has announced that the execution – slated for May 16 – will be broadcast on closed circuit television, to accommodate the large number of family members, survivors and rescue workers that wish to view his death.

When all is said and done, more than 250 people will watch McVeigh die. The Justice Department has also announced that, by way of lottery, 10 people from Oklahoma City will travel to Terra Haute to witness the execution in person. In addition to the extended invitations, the government has also set aside a private area in Terra Haute for those who want to be near the execution as it happens.

The whole situation – for all involved parties – is bittersweet. Those still mourning the victims seek a sort of closure in McVeigh's death – hoping that, once he is gone, an awful chapter in their lives will finally be closed.

In a sense, that will happen. The cause of so much pain and anguish will be gone, and that will open doors for the many that have been waiting to step through to brighter things. However, as much of a cathartic act as it may prove to be, we at the Collegian hope that the remembrance of lives does not end there; that the death of one individual would be enough to appease the many who have been suffering for six long years. McVeigh represents more than just the horrific act he was responsible for; he reminds us to this day of the wrong that happens in our own country, or neighborhoods, and even our own backyards. Even with his death, we cannot forget the reality of what happened, and not ignore the possibility if it ever happening again.

Why you can't get into that class

SETH AVAKIAN

It is often said that it is impossible to put a monetary value on an education. This column is intended to provide the student body with a conceptual tool for understanding the impact that budget cuts are having on the Amherst campus. I hope it is the beginning of a system-wide discussion about how academic departments are funded and how those decisions are statements about our priorities.

I was in a Faculty Senate General Education Council meeting two weeks ago. A professor spoke up about the budget cuts and how it would impact his department's general education course offerings. To illustrate the absurdity of their decision and more importantly, the absurdity of the system that we're forced to operate under, I did a little simple math. Here's how it will work:

Undergraduate Tuition (In-state)= $1,714.00

Undergraduate Tuition (Out-of-state): $9.756.00

Curriculum Fee: $2,112.00

Average Undergraduate Tuition: (No Fee Included) $3,724.50

Average Undergraduate Tuition: (Fee Included) $5,836.50

If you figure that three out of four students at Amherst pay in-state tuition, it averages $3724.50 per student per year. I've separated all fees from the cost to undergraduates, including the curriculum fee as well as health, activity and other fees, cost of books, and the cost of room and board. This results in a significant underestimate of the real cost of education to Undergraduates. I have included a running total of average tuition plus the curriculum fee because this is the money that the university collects from students that is earmarked solely for academic instruction. Including all student costs more than doubles the average cost per credit hour.

Average Cost per Credit Hour (Curriculum Fee Included): $194.55

The average undergraduate takes 15 credits per semester, equaling 30 credit hours per year. The cost of tuition divided by the number of credit hours equals $124.15 per credit hour. If you just include the curriculum fee this total becomes $194.55 per credit hour. This is both the cost to the student, and the income to the University. I have intentionally excluded any state support that in the minds of most State Representatives and State Senators should go towards undergraduate education before going to any other need on campus. If I did factor in state funding the numbers would look even more embarrassing.

The department of Geosciences has to cut 1.5 percent of their budget, which is almost entirely comprised of personnel. They don't want to cut tenured faculty, and in my opinion they shouldn't. The only other costs they incur are office supplies such as paper and computers, which are already funded at a minimum. They have decided to achieve the savings by cutting 2 graduate TAs from the Oceanography 103 General Education class that they offer. Each semester this class enrolls 600 students. Multiply by 2 semesters and 3 credits per semester, and it equals 3600 student credit hours provided by one class. Cost per Credit Hour X Credit Hours =Total Value of Class

$194.55 (Fee Inc.) X 3600 = 700,380

Multiply the cost per credit hour by the number of credit hours provided to determine the value of the class for the year. This equals $446,940! Adding the Curriculum Fee to this increases the value of the class to $700,380!

Cost per Credit Hour X Credit Hours= Total Value of Class

A professor without any Teaching Assistants could potentially teach a class of around 25-30 students each semester. This adds up to a maximum of 180 credit hours per year. This totals $22,410-$35,019 of educational value per year. The cost to a department for 2 Teaching Assistants for the year can range from $24,000 to $30,000.

	No Fee	Fee Inc.
Value of Class with Teaching Assistants	446,940	700,380
Value of Class without Teaching Assistant	22,410	35,019
Educational Value Lost	(424,530)	(665,361)
Savings to Academic Department (est.)	30,000	30,000
Ratio of Value Lost to Savings	14:1	22:1

So, with a departmental "savings" in the tens of thousands the undergraduates loose an education valued around a half-million dollars. If the Provost and the Deans of the Colleges want to make the case for additional funding they must make undergraduate education priority number one.

Currently this is not the case. The University continues to make bad resource allocation decisions. That is why this University is broken, and in my opinion doesn't deserve any additional funding until it gets its priorities in order.

If academic affairs absolutely must undergo a 1.5 percent reduction, the Provost should identify the worst performing department(s) and eliminate them. It's not a great idea, but it's better than slowly squeezing the successful departments. The real question is: why doesn't the Provost's office think in these terms? The solution? Fund departments based on the # of majors, the number of graduate students and the number of general education seats they offer. Add additional appropriate factors to that equation, but any system that is not at least based on the number of students it serves does not belong at our university. As I was putting the finishing touches on this paper, I read that the Interim Provost will be Charlena Seymour, the current Dean of the Graduate School. Charlena, I wish you the best of luck, and hope you can bring a fresh perspective to the Provost's office that will protect the education of our University's most valuable resource: the undergraduates.

WHAT WERE WE THINKING?

Boys, not men

JAMIE LOO

We've all heard the expression, "Boys will be boys," and that is somehow an excuse for male stupidity. This is not a column about how men stink or what people call femi-Nazi literature. I am simply giving my take on sexual harassment on campus. Most guys on this campus don't command enough respect from me to call them "men," (only a select a few) and therefore my column is about the "boys" on campus and how the University indirectly enforces sexual harassment. Though I talk about boys, men and administration as a group, I am definitely not addressing all people that fall under those three categories. There are some very positive, respectful men that are faculty and students on this campus who don't fit anything I'm about to say.

One of my friends is in a major that is dominated by men and therefore most of her peers and study partners are guys. In our building, she found a Commonwealth College Learning community based on her major, and the whole hallway is male. They are the most disgusting examples of "men" I have ever heard of on campus. Most people think that male chauvinism and sexual harassment take place on Frat Row when, in reality, many of the nicest guys I have met on this campus have been guys in fraternities. From what I have seen, the real male chauvinism is concentrated in certain large groups of Commonwealth College boys.

The boys in this hallway continually harassed her while working on class projects treating her as a subordinate and making sexual remarks about her and her competence. On a social level around friends these comments persisted and she made it very clear to them their remarks were unappreciated. This fell to deaf ears and the harassment continued. After finally getting fed up she went to look for help on an administrative level. Commonwealth College actually did take steps to try to help her situation but told her that the first thing she had to do was speak to her professor.

Her professor ignored her and basically said that what was going on wasn't a problem and that he had to treat all students on an equal basis, male or female. He wasn't going to change her project group. While putting up posters for room choosing in that hallway the other day, I saw a poster that was put up by a female looking for a roommate. She listed her basic living habits and specified that she was female. The boys on the floor crossed out the word female and wrote under it, "The downside to living with this person is that it's a girl." Last weekend, they basically called my friend a whore, starting rumors that she had a reputation of sleeping around. These are boys she has to work with; these are boys that are supposedly her friends.

That's the story of a group of boys, what I consider to be a boys club. A boys club is a group of guys that are together either by choice or by some odd administrative accident and basically spend their time causing havoc particularly in this case by degrading women on a social level or in a leadership level. I challenge everyone to question friends or neighbors that are women in male dominated majors or RSOs. You would be surprised at what they have to face from males. It's something that sounds like it's straight out of the 1950s, but is something that is very real to a lot of women on campus, in the year 2001. These boys clubs are everywhere on campus and yet in the midst of them there are a few Prince Charmings that I would almost categorize as men. These are the guys that don't believe the crap the other guys in the group are saying but will stand by and shrug it off. Silent affirmation is everyone's enemy, because it doesn't open up the dialogue that is needed to remedy a problem. It's a cycle that persists in all controversial subjects whether it's gender, race or freedom of speech. There are always a few people who don't agree with what's going on around them but will stay silent. In this case it's fear of social rejection of some sort. In some sad contradiction of silence, if someone says anything about any of those guys in that boys club they will be quick to defend each other from attacks. Not women though.

Boys will be boys.

Boys as groups and as individuals need to take more responsibility for their actions towards women and need to think before they speak. Sexual harassment is not just a women's problem but is a men's as well. Louisa May Alcott once said, "It takes at least three or four women to get men into life, through life, and out of life." Boys all have a woman that's near and dear to them: a mommy, a nana, an aunt, a sister, a close female friend, a girlfriend or a cool ex-girlfriend that's still their best friend. Would you appreciate it if a guy or group of guys called her a whore, made fun of her behind her back or verbally harassed her with sexual innuendo? The words "girls," "females," and "women," cannot be seen as just descriptive identities. Names and faces must be attached to these terms and must be taken into consideration whenever the need arises to talk about gender issues. If you're male, the next time you decide to call a sorority girl a whore or refer to her reputation, remember your mom who was in a sorority or one of your close female friends. If another guy said it, will you stand by silently and laugh or be offended and correct him? Hopefully, guys on this campus will begin to have a little more consideration.

Administration such as ResLife and our professors must also take responsibility for their silence, as they are supposedly preparing us for the "real world." Last time I checked, in "the real world" sexual harassment in the workplace isn't tolerated and here at UMass the classroom is our workplace. Sexual harassment in any form shouldn't be tolerated in the classroom, in residence halls, or at UMass as a whole because it's not an expression of political free speech but is an infringement on the civil liberties of other students. "Boys will be boys" is not some sort of genetic excuse for male chauvinism but is a vehicle for boys to continue to oppress women in society. It's an excuse that has been accepted for far too long and must be stopped through both individual and group action.

Giving up

KATIE LANDERS

I've wanted to be a lot of things growing up. At the tender age of 20, I've pretty much learned that so far, I'm not particularly good at anything. I've passed through a lot of phases, spent a lot of money I don't have trying to find a hidden talent, just to learn that I'm a plain old college student.

When I was in the first grade I wanted to be an activist. Don't ask me why because I don't know. I decided as a seven-year-old that I was going to single handedly save the world. With the ozone layer falling apart and the sky about to come crashing down in the spring of 1988, who better to picket than Katie Landers straight out of Marlboro, Mass? So with my Crayolas and my construction paper, I drew up little signs that said "Don't Litter" and "Save the Rainforest." That lasted about ten minutes before I got bored and probably went inside for a snack. Needless to say, the rainforest is still being destroyed every day and I'll probably have skin cancer before I hit 25.

I always took dance lessons growing up. Anyone who knows me knows that I can barely walk without tripping, never mind dance. But whatever, I made my parents pay for lessons until I was 11. I took jazz, tap, ballet, all that good stuff. I mostly wanted to be a ballerina. Ballet shoes get expensive, and I got lazy and didn't really want to go to class anymore. I realized that I wasn't cut out for ballard, so I might as well give up.

By the third grade I moved on to music. The whole music scene lasted quite a long time, just up until last semester. Of course it varied, depending on what instrument I was playing. In third grade I took this test that in my music class. It was a test that showed how well you could read music notes. Ever since I was a kid I've had knack for remembering really odd stuff, and by nine somehow I knew what the notes were, and got myself 100% on the test. This earned me a free violin rental for the year and free lessons. I thought I was a damn prodigy! So I went to the lessons and I rosined by bow, practiced sitting with my legs to the side. Two months into lessons we moved and I just forgot about it. Because it wasn't right in front of me anymore, I didn't really want to do it. Besides, I wasn't any good and I hated practicing.

In the fourth grade I decided I wanted to sing, so I joined the chorus. First it was just the elementary school chorus, and then I signed up for district chorus. This time I didn't even quit. I was so lousy that my music teacher suggested I move onto a wind instrument other than my voice box. I took up the flute. I really liked the flute, and I even knew a few songs. I played the flute during fifth grade. The lessons lasted me a full year before I switched schools again and my catholic school didn't offer music. I decided not to continue because I figured it wasn't worth the hassle, and besides, I wasn't that good.

In high school I moved onto sports. Since I was little I've always been interested in sports from being around my dad. I never played sports until high school. The spring before high school there was a small information session on any sport you wanted to play, so I just tagged along with my friend Kelly who decided she was going to play field hockey. I had never even heard of the sport but I figured I might as well give it a try. That was probably the most fun I ever had in high school, playing field hockey. I was never any good, but I always enjoyed it. I think at the time I might have thought that I was good but looking back I know I wasn't. I was plain dangerous. People trusted me with a stick in my hand. In the five years I played a lot of shins got bruised and fingers crushed by the power of me running with a field hockey stick. I guess I never gave up on field hockey, it just gave up on me when I went away to college.

I tried playing softball my sophomore year in high school. I can actually make contact with the ball and bat, but I can't throw to save my life. Softball only lasted a season. Then I tried to take gymnastics. Now I already told you that I wasn't coordinated enough to dance. Just imagine a five foot four inch tall 120 pound girl (Hey, I was 120 pounds in high school) trying to swing herself on uneven bars or flip over on her arms. It wasn't happening. I stuck with field hockey.

Senior year I got the ingenious idea that I would take up piano lessons, something I always wanted to do. I built my hopes sky-high that I could be an incredible pianist. I took lessons all of my second semester senior year and I was really catching on. I even picked up lessons last semester every Tuesday for $30 a week. I paid for the lessons myself and got on the PVTA once a week to play piano. After about two months I realized that I was too old and if I wanted to take lessons I should have taken them as a kid. I gave up.

Now I've moved onto bigger and better things. Next Patriots Day I will be running the Boston Marathon. I know it sounds ridiculous, especially with all the examples I've given to you about me and my tendency to give up. I've put it in writing that way I won't fall through to spare myself the embarrassment. While I was writing this I learned something. Besides the fact that I'm no prodigy, I've given up on a lot of things. It's important to stick with something and try to make it work. Otherwise life would be too easy. I won't be going back now to gymnastics or dancing or softball, but I'll look ahead to the things that I want to become. I want to run the Boston Marathon, and I want to be a good person.

Longing for village life

ELLIOT G. GARBAUSKAS

Occasionally the thought enters my head that I wish I were living in colonial New England – years of grade school classes on U.S. history have left me with an understanding (fairly accurate, I hope) of what life and society was like for our seventeenth and eighteenth century forefathers, and I'll tell you, it doesn't sound too bad.

There would be much more physical labor to endure, of course, but having no easier life for comparison, the discomfort of this would never really occur to me. There is a temptation to think back through this learned cultural memory and call such a former age "timeless," which is to say that the appeal of the thought for is the idea of that society's permanence and consistency. Pre-industrial history is painted in my mind in broad strokes of happy labor and symbiosis with the environment. Chopping wood becomes a noble pursuit, and all of life is similarly familiar, rhythmic and immediately vital.

"Timeless," however, is perhaps a misapplied word; it indicates a lack of context, an anchorlessness, when what I mean to express is the opposite: that such a world is so anchored in time as to be motionless and secure threatening no change. Village life, by which I mean a life with comfortable boundaries of cares and knowledge, is the center of the appeal of this thought, and our inability to recreate such an arrangement in this modern world is what I most miss about the past before my past.

So where does this leave me? Not in colonial New England, unfortunately, but back in a time and place where the ideas of time as motion and place as a highly subjective construction are painfully visible. How? And what the hell do I mean by that?

I spent some time this afternoon driving around South Hadley and Holyoke. The former has the sort of charm that lets you think only of how much charm it must have had 50 years ago, having now one (or five) too many chain stores and unattractive roads crudely developed over the years, too few trees and too many parking lots. It is my own town in another 50 years, which is itself some other northern town in 50 years, and so forth around the state – all New England towns are visibly moving through this continuum, caught on momentary ledges but all involved in the same tumble out of history.

It is Holyoke, however, that most fascinates me to drive through, especially the half-abandoned industrial district that runs along the Connecticut River, lumped most tightly around the large dam. Block after block of hollowed-out and forgotten red brick factories, interrupted only occasionally by small businesses, stretch out from the river as a museum of sorts, although precisely what is on display is uncertain and the curators don't give a damn.

This was once a village, in the above sense; although industry and commerce connected Holyoke to the larger world, the town knew what it did and what it made. It had an accurate and sustaining self-definition. Such times are past, however, visibly and powerfully so when staring down one of its lonely streets. I did see people as I drove around: two children playing on a new steel-and-plastic playground behind one of the new businesses inhabiting an old factory, and an old bearded man sitting on an aluminum beach chair near his hotdog stand, smoking a cigarette, no customers in sight.

Whatever soul the town once had has been melted and dented and hasn't hardened again yet; the security of village life isn't available any more, and because of the ball-and-chain of socio-economic conditions people don't necessarily have the option of picking up and moving away. You can see this in any town – my own is rapidly being converted into wealthy suburban neighborhoods for people who work in Boston, and with that comes the end of the town as a single social entity. There was once a time when my town made shoes. That was its function, its purpose. You could take it or leave it, but either way it was something to rely on, to use as one of the foundations for understanding the world. As longer-distance commuting became possible and people generally had more money to throw around, however, the nature of the town began to shift. Fine enough – I'm not here to whine about change. But what replaces the anchor previously provided by the town, by one's location?

This is a global world we live in, as college students; we understand events on a large scale and enjoy a familiarity with the larger world culture never before available. With that awareness comes a marvelous horizon of possibilities, but the trade-off is that loss of an immediate anchor. And that is not to say that we can take no comfort in being home, or have no affection for our hometowns, or anything of the sort; it's to say that, being aware of a world, literally, of opportunities, it's nearly impossible to think that we'd be content staying home and inheriting the family business.

So back to the question: what replaces the town, our place and time, as an anchor for self-understanding?

For some people it's money, pure and simple. Money grants the ability to acquire whatever someone may think necessary for happiness, happiness being the fulfillment or satisfaction of self-understanding through how one lives.

That is, while village life provided a sense of completion for people with a limited world-view, money provides the means to alter one's circumstances in life in order achieve (theoretically) that same sense of completion. And so, as New England slips away from its rural history and becomes more interested in its cities, which in turn are becoming more linked to the currents of global culture and economics, money is becoming more important as a means – perhaps an illusory one – of replacing that sense of completion which was once supplied by a self-understanding well-rooted in time and place.

For other people, it's occupation; we live at such a time and in such a nation as allows an unprecedented number of people to make a living doing what they love, whatever that is. There are more trades for tradesmen to chose from, a massive diversification of the service industry, and a wider market for art. Yet other people – and these are the luckiest sort – find self-understanding through other people. Contentment with family and friends makes, to my 22 year-old mind, all other conditions of life bearable. Still other people look entirely inward for definition, something both thrilling and terrifying.

Do I have a point? It's this: Look around. Literally, all the time, look around and acquaint yourself with what you see. Make connections with the streets you walk on, the trees you see in winter, quiet backyards with piles of firewood. Yes, they're all fleeting and falling apart, but without those essential sensations of belonging to something larger than ourselves we fall into selfishness and shortsightedness; we lose sight of the conditions of people we don't know, such sight being the fundamental bricks of society and culture; we fail to perceive the ripples of our actions across the landscape of other actions.

Our minds crave familiarity, so provide it whenever possible. Move through the world with a sense of time and place, because we live, unfortunately, in a time of decaying places, and the final product of that loss can only be callousness and disconnectedness.

Damn dirty hippies! Or, the unwashed masses

Ah spring, when a young man's fancy turns lightly to thoughts of damn dirty hippies. Actually, I use the term hippie as a catch-all for the people that basically piss me off throughout the day. Really, there aren't that many true hippies left. Nobody's sending telegrams of sympathy to Ho Chi Min, nobody's trying to levitate the Pentagon. The day of the 'peace-out hippie' is over. So maybe I should find a new word. For brevity's sake, I will condense the term 'neo-hippie-wannabes' into just 'hippies.' And just hippies I can handle. They're out there, playing their music in the sun, just hanging back. I can "dig" that. That's "groovy, man."

There are some damn dirty hippies out there ruining the classic hippie reputation. It's the damn dirty hippies, with their chalking and incense and their ability to not discover the shower that I'm talking about.

Actually, no, it's not groovy. See, I have a lot of older friends, and at least one remembers being spit on as he walked, well, on crutches across the tarmac at Logan after coming back from an all expenses paid tour of Southeast Asia. That I can't "dig." But we'll leave that 'til later.

There are some damn dirty hippies out there ruining the classic hippie reputation. It's the damn dirty hippies, with their chalking and incense and their ability to not discover the shower that I'm talking about. Normally, I'm a happy-go-lucky kinda guy. Nah, that's a lie. I'm a vicious, bitter old man trapped in a young man's body. Anyway, the other day I was feeling pretty good, and it was the first day of the Collegian photo contest. So I went down there to help man the table, get people to vote, try and help people out.

There were several photos submitted. If Johnny UMass saw one he liked, then he told the bright young staffers at the table what photo and how many votes he wished to cast. One vote was equal to one cent. All proceeds go to charity. Charity. You know, good things for people.

At least, that was the theory, and for the most part, that's what happened. People would come up, look at the photos, laugh at the one of a guy with his head stuck in the cannon, vote, and leave. We sat and tried to get people to vote, tried to sell autographed copies of the Collegian, planned to overthrow Cuba, the usual stuff.

Suddenly, a young woman appeared in front of the table. For lack of a better word, she was a hippie. She stared at the photos, commented on a few. My friend and colleague, lets call him Harrison, explained the voting procedure. But this particular neo-hippie wanted no part of it. Why?

"I don't like the way it's based on money." Then she walked away.

I'll pause and let that sink in.

We're doing this for charity. What do you think we're going to base it on? Twigs and squirrel droppings? What the hell is the Amherst Survival Center going to do with good intentions?

Of course it's based on money. You know why, because money truly runs the world. Not love, not hippie good vibrations. Money, cash, dead presidents, yo.

See, the new breed of hippies hasn't learned what the old ones did. The old hippies became the new liberals, which is fine with me. True liberals – all shades, from Democrat right on to Communist, believe in a system. All of those systems deal with money – whether it's the taxation of it or redistribution of it, each deals with money. Regardless of the fact that our currency is essentially worthless – no gold standard any more – it still fuels the fires of world trade.

Yikes. Another subject which the new hippies get all prissy about. Trade of any kind seems to upset them. God forbid somebody tries to better themselves and advance their financial situation by negotiation and bartering.

They cite environmental concerns. Industry destroys the precious ecosystem. Yeah. But it also puts food on somebody's table, and clothes on somebody's back. If it comes down to Bambi or Bob, Bob will be eating venison for a few days.

The other thing that gets me is that the hippies today, unlike their hippie ancestors, don't have a CAUSE. Then folks were protesting the Showdown in Saigon. The protestors realized that. They realized that the freedom they had to speak out against the government was because people before them had died for it, had consecrated that right beyond any efforts of man to add or detract.

But then again, there was something worth while to protest.

Now? Oh dear the cartoon. The freakin' baby seal-North Atlantic Fuzzy Squid, and the Upper Eastern Lumps Clam. Won't somebody please think of the cutesy-wootsey animals and trees?

Sit down, hippies. Throwing things at the WTO, giving Bill Gates the finger, all nice safe things not worth dying over. Sure you can protest, but don't make fools of yourselves. Money is here to stay. And thinking that you can change the world, no matter how many inspirational folk songs you sing, is a fairy tale.

Side note: lots of Irish Americans in Massachusetts: I'm one. All the folk songs we've got deal with drinking and dying. So a hell of lot of inspiration there. Yeah Jimmy; let's get tanked and go mess up some English exchange students. That's our destiny.

So you can't change the world. But you can change your neighborhood. You can change your community. One way is through charity. Oh, but that's based on money. Well, as long as your principles are upheld. You don't believe in money. Well, how about homeless, the hungry, the poor wretched masses yearning to breathe free? Nah. Screw them. We got trees to save. Peace, man.

Reflective 2pac on vault release

By Esteban Argüello
Collegian Staff

2PAC
Until the End of Time
Interscope

Some work out in jail, others read, but 2pac, on the other hand, wrote lyrics. Enough so that, even five years after his death, he's still coming out with albums. Until the End of Time is 2pac's fifth since he died, and it's a double album. In his final year of his life, his Machiavellian period, he saw thug life wasn't all it was cracked up to be.

In Until the End of Time, 2pac has a different tone of voice. 2pac was arrogant in 2pacalypse and Strictly 4 My N.I.G.G.A.Z. He was having fun dissing Badboy, glamorizing thug life, glamorizing drugs and romanticizing guns. There is little of that in Until the End of Time. 2pac shows his mature side, an obvious effect of jail on his life. Songs like "Ballad of a Dead Soulja," "Letter to My Unborn," and "When Thugz Cry" deal with the let downs of life as thug. It's as if he regrets getting caught up in all of it, and wants it to change.

2pac often refers to his "soulijas," his group of thugs and dogs who have to survive in the streets. He tells stories of their rise, of their cash and women, but the story always ends the same: the brothers die at the hands of another gang or thug. Some tales are autobiographical, such as "This Ain't Living," where he talks about when he left jail, others, such as "Lil Hommies," are fictional stories based on experiences. Since 2pac died shortly after recording these songs, Until the End of Time can turn depressing as every song foreshadows his death.

The subject matter is presented more maturely in contrast to 2pac's other albums. Until the End of Time is in no way a party hip-hop album. There are few songs that have an up-beat tempo. "Thug N U Thug N Me remix" is one of the few, and it's a classic 2pac blaze em up song. Despite all his previous warnings about thug life, he feels the need to sell it. "World Wide MOB Figgaz" also speaks about the small time that thug life seemed to be the top of the world. The chorus belts, "We got homies on the front line livin' it up/ we got ladies in the back, spread, givin' it up," glamorizing thug life. Despite the obvious contradiction in message, the party songs provide a little of the much needed variety.

The constant stories of gang-banging, shooting, and drug use get old quickly, especially since fortunately very few people can relate. It shows that at least his message is getting through. Yet it can get to be too much of the same thing over and over again, seeing as how every song in the album mentions the word "thug." The repetition takes away from the album's strong points. With each passing song, 2pac's harsh voice and clever flow grow duller, the lyrics and the beat become muddled, and one can easily lose interest. Yet the songs are great by themselves. I imagine that if 2pac were alive he wouldn't have thrown all the songs into the same recording; but instead have provided more party song to balance out his more serious songs as he did with his previous albums.

Despite the poor compilation, the album provides good songs. They're all of a high quality, which clearly shows why 2pac is still regarded as one of the greatest rappers of all time. His socially conscious lyrics give it a strong mature tone, giving the album merit; Until the End of Time won't merely get discarded as though it were a passing fad. The beats come out strong and the songs are composed well enough to give the listener his money's worth. Unfortunately 2pac is no longer around to hear his masterpieces completed, but his mark on the rap world will be remembered.

Sound and Fury: signifying rock

By Michael Delano

CLUTCH
Pure Rock Fury
Atlantic

With a title like Pure Rock Fury, Maryland's Clutch better be ready to deliver the goods with their new album. Not that there should be worries, as their expansive blues-driven sludge metal has been keeping the Sabbath dream alive since the early 90s. Albums like Transnational Speedway: Anthems, Anecdotes, and Undeniable Truths were for the most part no-frills thumpers, expanded upon on subsequent albums like Clutch before giving headway to roots music influences on 1998's The Elephant Riders and Jam Room.

Pure Rock Fury plays like the perfect bridge between Clutch's headbanging early days and their current rootsy slow nod. A history lesson kicks off the album, though, as the one-two punch of "American Sleep" and the title track feel like a time warp back to the full throttle "A Shotgun Named Marcus" days.

While the band's slow burn psychedelic crunchers are as much a part of the Clutch sound, I've always been partial to the full-on rockers that seem that much more dangerous with the gritty dynamics of the band's sound. Neil Fallon's off-the-wall lyrics don't exactly pull many heartstrings, but his cocksure delivery and Southern madman howl sound like a werewolf post a bottle of Jack Daniels (a compliment). The confident rhythm section of Dan Maines (bass) and Jean Paul Gaster (drums) has always been an asset, especially Gaster's often blazing skins work. Guitarist Tim Sult can conjure nearly Master of Reality-sized riffs and toss them around with reckless abandon.

The thick bass and extended jams keep the listener knee deep throughout the album, but not unable to pick out favorites. "Red Horse Rainbow" is a sprawling Sabbath-like slab of blues-rock, and "Drink To The Dead," with its 'everybody now' chorus, sounds like an anthem right out of The Elephant Riders.

There are slight signs of wear, however, as Fallon's self-assured looniness gets grating at times, especially on the stream-of-consciousness "Careful With That Mic..." The band as a whole also doesn't seem quite as anxious here as on previous releases, but an album this assured and powerful has a lot to teach today's younger bands.

It's wise to be wary of releases from bands fairly deep into their discography with overblown titles and cover/booklet images consisting of nothing but photos of themselves. But Clutch pulls it off; they've earned the right to travel wherever they wish, and by staying fairly close to the path they've blazed, Pure Rock Fury lives up to its namesake.

NOW 6 plows top ten for mixed bag of pop hits and misses

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

VARIOUS ARTISTS
NOW That's What I Call Music! 6
Epic

Backed by what was a strong holiday season for music retail, NOW That's What I call Music! 6 is chock full of huge hits that were churned out from mega-selling albums from the past six months. The NOW brand has snowballed into a lucrative franchise and has become the world's most popular hits compilation album, a respectable feat in a crowded market of collection albums. The sixth volume of the world's biggest multi-artist album series was released last week and moved an astonishing half million units in its debut week. Building on the success of NOW 5, which sold an impressive 3.6 million units to date since it's November release, NOW 6 is sure to exceed the numbers of it's predecessor.

But how did a compilation album become one of the biggest releases this spring?

Aggressive marketing including an extensive media campaign, retail, press and publicity promotion, all helped NOW 6 shoot straight to No. 1 on the Billboard 200. The chart topping hits make the record nearly critic proof and an easy sell to fickle teens who don't want to shell out the bucks for an entire album when all they are looking for are select singles from many artists which will become one-hit wonders. The fact that most of the songs were "TRL" favorites doesn't hurt either.

NOW 6 features nineteen Billboard hits spanning the Pop, R&B, and Modern Rock genres. But how do they measure on a quality scale? ATC's annoying "Around the World (La La La La La)" would have been better suited on a dance compilation album and Jennifer Lopez's cheesy "Love Don't Cost a Thing" would have been better if it was altogether left off the album. Creed's overplayed, irritating "With Arms Wide Open" further weakens the album's credence.

But most of the tracks are good pop songs that are well representative of the current music scene. Britney Spears' and Destiny's Childs' catchy, girl-power anthems "Stronger" and "Independent Women Pt. 1," respectively, are notable inclusions.

The Modern Rock tracks are lesser known, such as Incubus's "Drive" and Everclear's "AM Radio," but are nonetheless, worthy additions. They are otherworldly huge songs, however, and introduce the listener to music they may not have typically sought out by exposing the lesser-known artists to a wider buying audience.

The album's inclusion of R&B and Modern Rock makes it a welcome relief from all the bubblegum pop, which kicks off the record. Coldplay's fledgling single "Yellow" and U2's Grammy winning "Beautiful Day" serve as gems on the album.

It's interesting to note, however, that 'N Sync's "Bye Bye Bye" also makes the album, even after it's release more than a year ago. But even titles that are still in the Billboard Hot 100 make the over-played tracks seem irrelevant in this disposable singles market.

But if you're not a fan of all three genres of Pop, R&B and Modern Rock, hop scotching around the album may prove to be an annoyance. Nevertheless, there seems to be enough here to please fans whose tastes gravitate to the mainstream or kiddy-pop realm.

If you're a lover of Top 40 radio with a liking to different genres of music, NOW 6 is a must-have. The affinity of the tracks will make it apparent that much of today's music is recycled. But that's not NOW's fault. They just compile the latest hits, and we buy them.

THE NEW YEAR
April 7

Despite getting only two hours of sleep the previous night, I'm completely awake albeit completely disoriented, which will teach me not to attempt substituting sleep with coffee in the future. My sinuses have started clearing courtesy of some antihistamines and my outlook on life is already better. It's 5:30 p.m. and my friend Will, the acting photographer for the night's festivities, just got off work, picked up some film, and soon we're barreling down the Mass Pike at 85 with the slight euphoria that can only come from anticipation.

The queue stretches a good thirty feet from the door as we walk into the Middle East. It's early, about 7:30, and the late dinner crowd consisting mainly of Cambridge's indie chic is heartily eating their hummus, falafel and shish kebab. They open the doors. I tell them "we're on the list," flash some ID and we're in the door, which means it's time to get a drink.

Fifteen minutes after opening the doors, the opener goes on. Rosa Chance Well is a sweet blend of sugary, slow, dreamy pop riffs and little else. Short of amazing, but certainly fun – I have to admit I'm won over. This, however, may be either the second beer speaking to me, or the gaze of the cutest female singer that has me swooning. Other than the obligatory upbeat song, their set goes down well, much like my second beer.

My friend Mike shows up with his friend John. We shake hands and he tells us all about his night out yesterday. Apparently they started talking to a group of girls and they went up to the bar to grab a few drinks leaving their friend Jay hand to keep the girls company. They turn around to find the girls grabbing their coats and bolting toward the door. They're pissed, because they have no Idea what just happened, but apparently Jay had said something completely and ridiculously offensive and the girls weren't going to stand for it. Not so funny in retrospect, but in my current state of exhaustion and confusion, it's hilarious. With the mild concoction of alcohol and cold medication taking hold and making me feel rather well at this point, I'm ready for The New Year and cardiac arrest. Does anyone have a cigarette?

This is going to be an early night. It's about quarter after eight. Sheepishly, the band takes the stage in front of a standing-room-only crowd. Reticent to even face the audience, the band keeps any banter to a minimum, Fender Telecasters in hand, their eyes placed firmly on fretboards and shoelaces to avoid detecting the gaze of disapproval from their following. However, they have no reason to be sad or scared. One look into the audience reveals the hypnotic power of their music. Sensitive, scruffy-headed boys and girls bob their heads in unison to convoluted time signatures and sweet melodies, while their feelings manifest themselves in the expressions on their faces. They latch onto every note, every word, attentive and heartfelt. They sway with every nuance in the music.

The New Year's performance is terse. They play with candor through just about every song on the album, plus a couple that aren't. They say very little to the audience and go through the set with rehearsed precision and sincere emotion. The three guitars, bass, drums and two vocalists weave together to form an audible cloth that covers the entire room. Songs like "Reconstruction," and "Gasoline" seem to stir the crowd a little, but never to the point of frenzy. This night, there are no wild lights, no backup dancers, no stage props, no tough guy posturing and no crazy costumes. Just five very average looking guys doing what they do best, playing their instruments and pouring out their feelings.

As the set comes to a close and the band walks off stage, they are summoned back by the audience's enraptured clapping. In a no-nonsense kind of way, they play through the last three songs of the night. As they march off the stage for the second time, I shake hands with both Matt and Bubba Kandane, and apologize for my inability to make the previously scheduled interview. But they're in a hurry, and I'm not all there, so I ask them if I can maybe meet with them tomorrow (which, by the way, never materializes). Four beers, a couple Sudafed, and two bands later, I'm starting to feel decent. The New Year is finally upon us, and it Is looking brighter every day.

Newness brings tinged melancholy

THE NEW YEAR
Newness Ends
Touch 'N Go Records

The New Year is always a time to reflect, resolve, look toward the future and improve upon one's ways. For brothers Matt and Bubba Kandane, this couldn't be truer.

Previous to their most recent project, the brothers Kandane were two-sixths of the band Bedhead, one of the most highly acclaimed bands in the "slow-core" sub-genre. With The New Year we find another noteworthy album in the spirit of Bedhead with more pop subtleties.

Recorded by the musical Mad Hatter of Chicago, Steve Albini (whose better known production credits include Nirvana's In Utero and Bush's Razorblade Suitcase), and produced by the Kandane bros., the album is far less lackadaisical than Its Bedhead brethren. The songwriting seems to have been upped a notch, with the brothers experimenting more with different styles, while retaining much of the same ethos that garnered them a strong following to begin with.

Songs like "Reconstruction" and "Half a Day" are very much in the vain of Bedhead, but offer better musicianship and a more polished sound. Something to be expected considering that all of the players on this album are Indie scene veterans who can also be found playing with bands like Come, Codeine, and Saturnine. Whereas songs like "Gasoline" and "Newness Ends" are obvious forays into different styles and tempos that emulate the better characteristics of contemporaries like Built to Spill and Apples in Stereo and evidence that these boys from Texas have some good wholesome pop riffs In them. Most importantly, the album plays through with rarely a dull moment.

But this is not to say that the album is completely faultless. The vocals are not so much sung as they are spoken tonally, and as great as this is in conveying the demure attitudes of the songwriters, the slight whininess is not totally desirable. It is a complaint that is often leveled against bands like Luna and Mercury Rev, both excellent bands with whiny vocalization, and if anything, this critique proves that the band is In good company.

Also, some of the lyrics tend to have a certain undesirable triteness. Lines like, "Now I'm Lying in the fetal position/I knew I never should have been a muslin" while not cringe worthy, are certainly short of literary superlative. In actuality, it is more hit than miss for most of the lyrics, and none of the criticisms are enough to take away significantly from this otherwise completely enjoyable record.

More emotive than any emo album and more upbeat than previous "slow core" efforts, Newness Ends goes well with tea and pastry. It is a grab bag of good melancholia, and this ability to really vary styles while maintaining continuity is a quality that seems unique these days. Though it is probably not for everyone, it is certainly not to be overlooked. A prince in pauper's clothes, The New Year will certainly charm and beguile given the opportunity.

Busy weekend for jam band fans

By David Siegel
Collegian Staff

We have had, as unusual as it may sound, a drought in live jamband music in the Northampton/Amherst area. However, as the temperature is rising, so is the anticipation for what as many old favorites, along with some new bands, make their way to the Pioneer Valley this, most sacred of weekends. Beginning last night with the Slip and the Gordon Stone Band opening at Pearl Street, we are in store for a fantastic weekend that will surely be jam-packed.

On Friday night, the 20th day in the month of April, you will have to make a decision as to what you are in the mood for. Playing here at UMass at the Skybox at the top of the Campus Center is the jazzed up, funky Percy Hill. After taking a short break in the recent months, Percy Hill is now beginning what should be a very prosperous summer. In the past they have played the Skybox, most recently last semester, to a packed house. The Princes of Babylon will open the show, scheduled to begin at 8:30 p.m.

For those who wish to have a more horn-driven 4/20 experience, Granola Funk Express will be playing at the downstairs Clubroom at Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton. The show will be opened by the local funk band, Addison Groove Project (AGP), who is coming off a great performance earlier this semester at the Iron Horse. AGP is a high-energy ensemble that hails from Wellesley, MA. Both of these bands are sure to put on a hell of a show. It starts at 8:30 p.m. and tickets will be around $10. Also of interest is Connecticut based jamband Rane, headlining at the Iron Horse with Missing Joe opening. This will be the second show at the Horse beginning at 10 p.m.

The music doesn't stop on Saturday, though, as again you will have a few options to choose from. Playing at the Clubroom at Pearl will be the jazzy New Deal with opener Wax Poetic. This show begins at 8:30 p.m. with a cover charge of $8.

Also of interest is a proverbial unknown on the local jamband scene. From our very own UMass comes the four-piece group known as Smooth Lewis. These guys have played at the Pub in uptown Amherst, as well as at the Hadley Pub on Route 9 in Hadley, where they will be taking up residency every Wednesday night. Smooth Lewis is a jam/jazz ensemble comprised of Doug Lubowitz on guitar, Brain Factor on drums, Michael Fitzpatrick on bass guitar and Jimmy White on keyboards. They put on a great show bringing together a mixed bag of influences including the Beatles, Stones, Floyd, Velvet Underground and Steely Dan. They play some solid originals with a few well-placed covers from some of their influences. Be sure to bring your dancing shoes, as they will be opening for Granola Funk Express at the Spring Dale Turn Hall on Veron St. off of Exit 14 from Rt. 91. They will be going on at 8 p.m. with the Funk Express headlining. Whatever your choices this weekend, be sure to spark it up in celebration of some great music.

Easy Vick-tory?

Draft order unclear

The NFL Draft, a.k.a. "from no money and a bent car to mo' money and a Bentley," will take place this Saturday and Sunday in New York. While the talk is at the top of the draft – where Michael Vick should still be the number one pick of the Chargers if they get the contract situation under control – those picked in the first do not necessarily make the biggest impacts.

Before we get to my top ten, let's revisit some of these impact players taken from the lower half of the draft board.

One of the greatest quarterbacks in NFL history wasn't the second pick in the draft like busts Ryan Leaf and Rick Mirer were. In fact, Joe Montana was not selected until the third round of the 1979 NFL draft. With his magical performances at Notre Dame, he had the knack for winning. The knack for winning continued with four Super Bowl titles with the 49ers in the 1980s and over 40,000 yards in a historic career. That is what the 49ers got out of a quarterback who people thought best impersonated a beanstalk out of college rather than a Hall of Fame quarterback.

Two of the running backs that have dominated the NFL in recent memory looked like they were going to be no more than a memory in the Draft. Curtis Martin of the New York Jets and Terrell Davis of the Denver Broncos were selected in the third and sixth rounds of the 1995 draft, respectively. They established themselves as forces immediately as Martin ran for 1487 yards his rookie year and has rushed for 1,000 in every year of his career. As for Davis, he became the lowest drafted rookie to ever rush for 1,000 yards. He then became the lowest drafted back to rush for 2,000 yards in one season. Considering there have only been four backs to rush for 2,000 yards in one season in NFL history, I do not think that he will mind that distinction. Though injuries have hampered his last two years, two Super Bowl titles and a Super Bowl MVP is comfort enough for Davis.

Hell, forget about Davis, how about every Broncos running back on the roster? This includes Olandis Gary and Mike Anderson. The past two seasons without Davis, both Gary and Anderson have gone from late round picks to 1,000-yard rushers. Anderson even ran for 251 in a game last year.

The San Francisco 49ers had just a 6-10 season last year, but their new top gun at wide receiver, Terrell Owens did nothing to diminish his athletic ability. He, just like Martin, was a third round selection. In 2000, he broke the NFL record with 20 catches in one game and finished with a career high 97 receptions on the season. He has over 300 catches so far in his career, he also has a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame – nah that wasn't the Walk of Fame, that was Texas Stadium – don't be stupid.

While the lower half of the draft has created great players in the past, the talk in the last 24 to 48 hours has been about the top of the draft. As I said earlier, Vick should be the slam-dunk, no doubt about number one draft pick going to the Bolts. However, contract talks have stalled between the two sides and the Chargers are now considering taking Texas Christian University running back LaDainian Tomlinson with the first pick. People are asking, "Why are the Chargers even thinking about anybody else other than Vick for the first pick?" here are a couple of possible reasons:

1.) The fact that Vick and his agents are asking for a $12 million signing bonus and a contract that could be close to $60 million in worth. The Chargers were burnt by Leaf after three years of horror and released him. The question is, do they want to give $60 million to a player who probably won't play a significant role in the NFL for two to three years?

2.) On that subject, Tomlinson would be an impact player now. He is not from Penn State, so that lessens the chances of him being a bust (Blair Thomas, Ki-Jana Carter, Curtis Enis). He is 5-foot-10 and at 220 pounds can withstand the pounding of NFL defenses immediately.

While I still feel that Vick should be the number one pick, the NFL Draft turns into a free for all if Paul Tagliabue announces Tomlison first.

Temple stands in the way of tennis crown

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

In terms of success, the Massachusetts women's tennis team has had plenty this season.

Three freshmen have come into the program and played extremely well in the new environment. The Minutewomen reeled off six straight wins toward the end of the season, while head coach Judy Dixon notched her 100th career victory this month.

However, the Minutewomen hope that these accomplishments will be mere footnotes on the season since they are looking for something much greater: an Atlantic 10 title. Despite a setback earlier this week against Williams College that ended a six-match winning streak, the team doesn't feel like it has lost any speed toward attaining that elusive first conference championship.

"I don't think the loss will ruin their confidence level," said Dixon. "They feel that this is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity."

"I think we're going in confident as a team, but it will be a bit tougher this time since Temple is getting its No. 1 player back," added freshman Susan Hyams.

The aforementioned foe from Philadelphia presents possibly the toughest opposition that stands in UMass's way of the conference crown. Although the Minutewomen defeated Temple 5-2 on April 1, the Owls had only four competing players, which automatically gave the Maroon and White two wins by default. With Temple bringing five players this time around, the Minutewomen will have to work that much harder to come out on top.

"Temple's going to be a problem because when healthy, they're a different kettle of fish," said Dixon. "They're really difficult because their 1-2-3 is the best in the league."

However, by winning one match automatically through default (due to Temple only bringing five players), UMass will only need to capture two of the singles matches – should they win the doubles point.

"There definitely will be more room to breathe if we win doubles, but we don't want to be too overconfident," said Hyams.

With a 17-7 overall record and an undefeated 4-0 mark in Atlantic 10 play, the Minutewomen enjoyed the most successful campaign since the team went 15-4 and captured the New England Championships in the 1995-96 season. Hyams, junior Lindsey Gillooly, and freshman Francesca Mancini have all consistently provided the Maroon and White with outstanding play since the campaign began in September.

Still, even though the team has the talent to emerge with that first championship and automatic berth to the NCAA Championships, the road will not be easy. Temple will not be the only strong squad in the field, as there will be plenty of other teams eager to knock off the Minutewomen.

"We can't look ahead; in order to get to Temple, we have to get by schools like George Washington and Xavier," said Dixon.

There's no denying that the Maroon and White has the talent to emerge victorious, as long as the team remains focused. Dixon feels it can win it all as long as it goes into the tourney relaxed and focused.

"I'm just worried that the pressure will be so great that they won't play their best," she said. "I just want to keep them loose so that when we get down there they don't succumb to the pressure.

The championships kick off today on the campus of Princeton University.

'We want to race the truck'

In the pits with Matt Brady

After having Easter Sunday off, NASCAR drivers will be back to the grind as they head to the circuit's biggest track – Talladega.

Most known for the spectacular crashes that happen there, the superspeedway has come into criticism lately, especially on the wake of Dale Earnhardt's death earlier this year at Daytona. But as all fans know, if the Intimidator was still with us today, he'd be whining about how restrictor plate racing was "for sissies" and working his way through the field.

With Earnhardt gone, the field is wide open for this week's race. Obviously Dale Jarrett is the favorite, considering the fact that he is the points leader and has found a way to win races that nobody thought he could pull out. The #88 UPS car has been the strongest on the track this year, and Jarrett showed his presence two weeks ago at Martinsville when he roared to his third victory of the year.

Jeff Gordon is still second in the points race, but he sometimes struggles on the mammoth tracks, as is evidenced by his 30th place finish at Daytona earlier this year. Don't expect the Rainbow Warrior to pull out this one.

Sterling Marlin and Johnny Benson are tied for third in the points. Both have looked good this season, but both are with new crews, so their finishes will depend on the amount of testing they've done.

The driver who, in my opinion, has been right behind Jarrett this year has been Steve Park. Despite getting less attention than fellow DEI drivers Dale Jr. and Michael Waltrip, Park has had a spectacular season and his car has been among the fastest in many races. But he needs to get high up in the pack early in this race, something he failed to do at Daytona. If he doesn't, then he could get swallowed up in a wreck.

Jeff Burton, who finished third in the points last year, was finally a blip on the radar screen at Martinsville, finishing in third. If he can avoid being snake bit again this week, look for him in the top five.

Defending Cup champion Bobby Labonte continues to disappoint this season. Of course, he did have one of his best showings of the season in finishing eighth at Martinsville. He'll be toward the front of the pack and challenging for the checkered flag this week barring a wreck.

But the most impressive racer I've seen this season has been the youngster, Kevin Harvick. Stepping in to drive for Richard Childress after Earnhardt's passing, the rookie has raced like he is driving with the spirit of his mentor. Even though he didn't race at Daytona, the leading candidate for Rookie of the Year sits 12th in the point standings.

Brady's pick: Harvick. I love the kid, and if he's racing with Earnhardt's spirit, he's got the guy with the most wins ever at Talladega on his side.

Ram-bunctious A-10 foes awaiting

Baseball stares key conference matches

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Everybody looks forward to the weekend. For most, it means relaxing and enjoying themselves after a hard-fought week.

But for the Massachusetts baseball team, and teams throughout the Atlantic 10, it means getting down to business for all-important conference games.

This weekend, the Minutemen (12-12, 6-3 A-10) play four games against A-10 foes, as they travel to the Bronx for a pair against Fordham on Friday and return home for a doubleheader against URI on Saturday.

"It's a big weekend for us," said UMass coach Mike Stone. "We're excited about having some competition and being challenged."

The Rams enter the weekend sporting a .500 record overall at 15-15 (3-6 A-10). Coach Dan Gallagher's squad started the season slowly, getting off to a 1-7 start, but has come on as of late.

On offense, they are led by sophomore outfielder Bob Kingsbury, who has torn it up at the plate and on the basepaths. He leads the team in average, home runs, RBI, runs and even stolen bases. His .28 steals in 30 games ranks him first in the A-10, and his .376 average is good enough to put him in the top 10 in the league. He is supported by second baseman Jason Conlinsk, whose .337 average and strong fielding have provided good leadership for the team. The sophomore switch hitter is also 9-for-9 in stolen bases.

But the base warriors will have trouble this week, as they will have to deal with the gunner behind the plate in Tom Ellerbrook. The sophomore has thrown out 13 out of 43 runners who have tried to steal on him so far this season.

On the mound, Fordham is led by freshman middle reliever Anthony Paolillo, who is second in the conference in ERA among qualifiers. Paolillo has also turned in two starts to post his 5-5 record and 2.13 ERA.

Craig Szado will go for the Maroon and White in game one while fellow junior Jesse Santos will be the hurler in the second contest. Szado's last outing was a dominating performance against Saint Bonaventure that put him on the short end of a 3-2 nailbiter. Santos pitched the second half of that doubleheader, showing strong in his six innings of work to preserve UMass' 8-4 win.

Saturday will bring Rams of a different breed as New England rival URI rolls into town. The Rams (16-18, 2-7 A-10) have struggled in A-10 play this season, but still remain among the leaders in both offense and pitching in the conference. As a team, they rank fifth in the conference in batting average and third in team ERA.

Rhody is led on offense by senior shortstop Mike LaBarbera, who sits just behind Minuteman Nick Gorneault on the A-10 individual leaders list with his .421 batting average. The leadoff man was voted a first team All-Atlantic 10 member last year, and has 25 steals on 33 attempts this season.

As a team, though, the Rams are having trouble with their power numbers, as they only have 10 long balls on the year, with Mike Schiappia leading the way with three. As a whole, URI is only slugging at a .397 clip (sixth in the A-10). But its main strength is on the base paths, where it registers four men in the top 10 in steals.

Reid Willett leads the pitchers for the Rams. In his seven starts this season, he has gone 3-4 with a 3.86 ERA, a respectable statistic in a league where aluminum bats are used. The freshman phenom from Nashua, N.H. has been a pleasant surprise for URI this year, as the Rams lost two members of its rotation to graduation and one to the bullpen.

The ball will be in Nick Skirkanich's hands for the first game on Saturday, but according to Stone, the starter of the second game is still in doubt.

"It could be [David] Loonie, it could be [Eric] Chown, it could be [Brian] Hourigan – we'll have to wait and see," he said.

The Minutemen have rattled off four wins in a row, mainly because of some strong pitching and tremendous hitting. The Maroon and White now ranks third in the Atlantic 10 in batting average, at .315, and its .459 slugging percentage is tops in the conference.

In each of the three A-10 series it has played this year, UMass has taken two of three from its opponents. But in order to continue that success, the Minutemen will have to continue to play strong baseball.

"We need to play very well and make things happen," Stone said. "If we continue to be aggressive, we'll have a great weekend."

UMass crew paddles into rematch

By Katie Landers
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's crew team rowed on the choppy waters of the Potomac River to a ninth place finish last weekend in the George Washington Invitational.

The Minutewomen faced several of the top teams in the country in the race, including Navy and Columbia who they will see again this weekend. The women's second varsity eight boat took third place at 6:05.35 in its race, behind first-place Virginia (5:55.30) and runner-up Navy (6:04.24).

The varsity eight lightweight boat and the varsity eight petite boat both took top finishes in their races to defeat defending champion Georgetown.

The Minutewomen have had a tough start to the season because of minimal water time due to weather and flooding on the Connecticut River.

The nation's capital was no better, where the Potomac was spilling over the edge. And coach Jim Dietz said the results of the regatta in Washington were not representative of the team's potential.

"It was a beautiful day but it's not what we'd like," Dietz said.

The Maroon and White will look forward to better waters in Travis Island, NY for this weekend's regatta. The crew team will head to the Empire State to take on Navy and Columbia in a rematch from last weekend, along with state rival Northeastern University.

Navy is expected to be the top competitor this weekend, coming off a third place finish at the GW Invitational Regatta. Navy previously held the GW Regatta title for ten straight years before it was captured by Temple and Georgetown two years ago.

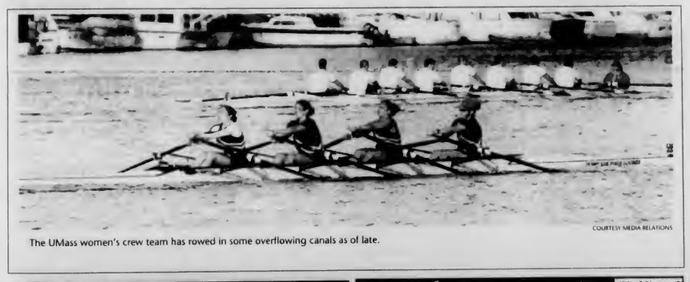
"Navy is the team we're going to have to be gunning for," Dietz said.

Columbia is another tough team that faces the Minutewomen. The Lions finished second last weekend in Washington just behind Virginia.

"Columbia could be the fastest," Dietz said.

Northeastern University is a team that UMass knows little about. The Huskies recently placed third in the Orange Cup on the Schuylkill River – their first time not earning a top finish in the past six seasons.

The Minutewomen continue to seat race for spots in this weekend's regatta. The constant competition for a seat has left the final lineup for Saturday to be undetermined. The varsity race is set to start on Orchard Beach at 11:15 Saturday.



The UMass women's crew team has rowed in some overflowing canals as of late.

game when junior outfielder Teri Rooney singled home sophomore outfielder Anna Perez. Once again "Scooter" came up big and singled up the middle later in the inning, driving in two runs after the centerfielder let the ball go through her legs to make the score 4-2.

UMass continues play this weekend when they face off in a very important trio of games against Atlantic 10 foe Dayton in Amherst.

Horoscopes

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Try to keep your anger in check today, or you may find yourself saying things you'll regret later.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You're likely to attract a great deal of attention today – just by being yourself! Your charisma is increasing.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) –Your compatibility with a friend, co-worker or teammate may come under suspicion today, but you can defend yourself easily.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Get out there and exercise your mind and your body today. The more active you are, the more likely you will be to enjoy what comes your way.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Give yourself a little more room to maneuver today and you'll enjoy the results. Evening brings an opportunity to explore something hidden.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You are more interested in satisfying your won curiosity at this time than you are in solving a problem for others. Remember to get the facts!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may be able to overturn a decision that the authorities have handed down recently – simply because you're willing to do the legwork.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may be hiding things unnecessarily at this time. Don't waste time keeping secrets from those who are on your side!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may be quite impulsive today, and not everyone will react favorably to your passionate expressions.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You may feel that the pace is too slow and leisurely for you today, but the fact is that you are in need of a little more time to contemplate.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Repetition can allow you to become more accustomed to something that may have been completely foreign to you as the day opened.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – The competition may be stiff today, but you have what it takes to come out on top despite any limitations of which you may currently be aware.

The UMass men's lacrosse team battles Georgetown Saturday for bragging rights in the ECAC.

Lacrosse showdown at Garber

No. 8 Georgetown biggest test thus far for No. 4 Maroon and White

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

In the hours leading up to the Massachusetts versus Georgetown lacrosse battle, sports journalists and broadcasters across the Pioneer Valley will undoubtedly be spewing the cheesy jargon for which they are famous.

Well let us, at least for one weekend, bury the "big game" terminology and sink the "must win" lingo so, for quite possibly the most entertaining contest of the year, one can just sit back and admire top notch college lacrosse at its best.

Unfortunately for Coach Greg Canella and his squad, there will be no sitting back and certainly no relaxing after an 11-5 waxing of regional foe Harvard on Wednesday.

The prospects of this game are limitless for both the Minutemen (10-0, 4-0 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference) and the visiting Hoyas (9-1, 3-1 ECAC).

No. 8 Georgetown, the defending conference champions, comes into this game in a different position than what it's used to. For the first time in the young life of the ECAC, the Hoyas inhabit the underdog role, as they prepare to take on the No. 4 Minutemen.

Last year's game in the nation's capital was a lacrosse classic that put the offensive skills of both teams on center stage, as 57 total goals were scored.

"We really don't know what to expect," Canella said mid-week.

With that 19-18 Hoya win in mind, the Maroon and White must prepare for both an offensive explosion and a physically demanding conference battle.

The revenge factor will undoubtedly return to the UMass locker room with the 2000 contest in mind but when the Minutemen look at their hated rivals from D.C., it may feel a little eerie, like they are staring straight into a mirror.

G-Town boasts a very similar offensive style to the Minutemen. The Hoyas like to run and gun and with such a balanced crop of skill to choose from, they are able to achieve success.

Unlike a Stony Brook or a Rutgers, there are numerous players on the field that can be equally lethal in the offensive zone. Just like the Maroon and White has its Kevin Leveille's, Rich Kunkel's and Don Little's, the Hoyas have their Steve Dusseau's, Mike Henehan's and Scott Doyle's.

Like its Amherst counterparts, G-Town boasts five players with 20 points or more and four players with 10 goals or more so it's no wonder that only Navy has been able to hold the Hoyas to single digits.

"They have a lot of players who can score the ball," Canella said.

Also like the Minutemen, Georgetown fields a very talented faceoff man in Sean Cartin. Cartin will have his hands full with nationally ranked ace Jeff Seals, but with a .559 win percentage it is clear that he is up to the challenge.

The Hoyas and the Minutemen also share the luxury of solid goaltending. Senior Chris Campollettano has regained top form in 2001 posting a .642 save percentage through ten games. The Hoyas Scott Schroeder, who equals the Maroon and White keeper in save efficiency, has held opponents to fewer than seven goals per game in nine games played.

With two teams that are so evenly matched there is no reason for the Amherst faithful to expect anything less than a thrilling college lacrosse showdown. With so much on the line in just one game it is clear that a rivalry is on the brink of full blossom.

Rivalries are sacred in college athletics – just think of Duke-Carolina in March or Michigan-Ohio State on the gridiron. Well, how about adding UMass-Georgetown to that list...excitement guaranteed.

Women's lax cruises to 19-2 victory over Albany

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

With Saturday's all-important Atlantic 10 finale with LaSalle less than 48 hours away, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team cruised to a 19-2 victory over the University of Albany at Totman Field.

Jada Emery, Rachel Ingraffea and Leslie Pollock each had four goals on the afternoon, as the Minutewomen (4-8, 2-2 A-10) recorded its second straight victory for the first time this season.

"Offensively it was our most consistent effort of the year," said UMass coach Phil Barnes following the victory. "We had goals from all different areas, it was a great job."

The game was pretty much over before it began, as UMass jumped out to 3-0 lead inside the first five minutes of the game. Goals from Ingraffea, Pollock and Emery were all that the Maroon and White needed on the afternoon as the Great Danes could never mount a serious offensive attack on the UMass cage.

Emery was the first of the Minutewoman trio to finish off her hat trick when she fired a shot past Albany's freshman goalie Liz Gress-Byrd off a feed from Pollock 13:56 into the opening half. The goal was Emery's 12th of the season and she added her 13th late in the second half. It's the sophomore's third hat trick of the season.

The Minutewomen got into halftime leading 12-1 and refused to take their foot off the gas when the second half resumed. Pollock completed her the first hat trick of her career less than three minutes into the second half when she took a pass from freshman Miriam Godfrey and snapped a shot past Gress-Byrd. The assist was the first of Godfrey's career and she then added a goal exactly three minutes later, her eighth of the season. Pollock finished with six points (four goals and two assists) on the afternoon to lead the way for UMass.

"It was very important [for me to play well]," said Pollock, a native of Watervilet, N.Y. (a suburb of Albany). "I know a couple players on their team, and I know the coach so it was important for me to come out and show that I can play on this field. I couldn't have hoped for a better game."

The Great Danes came into the game with a 5-6 record but were clearly overmatched against the Minutewomen. They managed just 12 shots on the UMass net, 10 stopped by the UMass goaltending duo of Jen Nardi and Cyndi Doyle.

Sophomore Maria Ferrucci, Albany's leading scorer with 32 goals this season, failed to find the net as she was constantly smothered by the defensive pair of Denise Brey and Bridget Byrne. Sophomore Andrea Esposito notched the lone first half tally for Albany while freshman Alexis DiDomenico scored her 17th of the season for the Great Danes in the second half.

While the UMass defense constantly found an answer for Albany's top scorer, the Great Danes had no such luck in containing the Minutewomen's top scorer, Ingraffea.

She tallied her fifth consecutive hat trick of the season and seventh overall, pushing her season goal total to 28. All four of the midfielder's goals came in the first half with the first two being assisted on by fellow senior Fay Naber. Naber had a goal and four assists on the day to push her season point total to 19. She is currently second on the team in points as well as assists, trailing just Kara DePaula in that category. DePaula has a goal and three assists yesterday giving her three goals and 11 helpers for 14 points on the season.

One pleasant surprise for Coach Barnes was the play of sophomore Lori Kain. Kain came into the game with just one goal to her credit but scored a pair in the Maroon and White's 12 goal first half. It was her first career two-goal game.

"Practice has been going really well for me lately," Kain said. "So it was good to get a few goals, it was just fun."

Kain and the rest of the Minutewomen will look to carry this fun over into Saturday afternoon's encounter with the Explorers of LaSalle (6-6, 1-2 A-10). While the Minutewomen have won the last two meetings rather handily, they must be wary this time of LaSalle's Jami Wilus. Wilus leads the A-10 with 57 goals and 75 points through just 11 games this season.

"If we can put it together [on Saturday] both offensively and defensively like we did today, it will really set a tone going into A-10's," Barnes said.

Surviving those 'dog days'

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

Major League Baseball players use the term "dog days" to describe the time of the season when fatigue has set in. It usually occurs around early August.

For the Massachusetts softball team (28-9 overall, 12-0 A-10), they are experiencing the "dog days" right now.

Yesterday at the UMass Softball Complex, the Minutewomen pulled out two hard-fought victories over last year's Ivy League champions, Harvard University (14-18, 5-3 Ivy League).

Although they were able to keep their winning streak alive – now at 22 games – there were definite signs of a team that is slowing down due to a grueling, hectic schedule.

"We are tired," said coach Elaine Sortino. "We haven't had any rest or practice in about eight days and it has taken a toll."

Game 1: UMass 4, Harvard 3

Junior flame-thrower Jen Hadley got the start for UMass, and throughout the game she delivered the goods.

For the game she allowed eight hits and one walk, striking out five en route to her fourth victory in six games. The victory improved her record to 10-5. She did not allow a Harvard run to cross the plate until the sixth inning, when the Crimson made a late game 3-run rally.

"[Hadley] did alright," said Sortino. "It wasn't her best game, but neither was it her worst game."

Hadley had the comfort of a four-run lead going into the sixth inning thanks to some inspired hitting from the heart of the Maroon and White lineup.

Sophomore first baseman Brandi Cross and junior outfielder Ashley Bakken both had run-scoring singles in the first inning, making the score 2-0 after one.

Then, in the third inning, UMass' best hitter this year, Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler, led off the inning with her fifth home run of the season. Massachusetts got its last run of the game when Bakken scored off an infield error later that inning.

"[Wheeler] has been our most consistent bat," said Sortino. "She comes up big for us and always gives us a good performance."

Game 2: UMass 4, Harvard 2

After dodging a late game comeback from the Crimson, the Minutewomen had to play catch-up in the nightcap of the twin bill. Senior right-hander Carrie Jeffries took her team-best 1.68 ERA and 7-3 record into the contest.

Harvard jumped on the board early when it scored a run in the first inning off Jeffries.

After Harvard scored another run in the top of the third inning, UMass found itself down 2-0, searching for a way to break through Harvard's starting pitcher, junior Sarah Koppel, who had kept the UMass hitting attack in check.

However, Crimson coach Jenny Allard made a pitching change in the fourth, which cost her team.

In the bottom of the fourth, sophomore Kaila Holtz hit a bomb to left field for her third home run of the year, making the score 2-1 after four.

"I think before they made the pitching change we had two very good at-bats," said Sortino. "It was a move they made sensing that they knew something was coming."

In the fifth inning, UMass tied the

Junior Celli captures Goldwater Scholarship

The University of Massachusetts has a new point of pride. Jonathan Celli, a junior physics and music major, has won a Goldwater Scholarship. Celli was one of just 302 students in the United States to win the award.

Over 1,000 students are nominated annually for the award, which is selected on the basis of academic merit. Most of the applicants intend to pursue careers in science, mathematics or engineering.

The scholarships cover the cost of tuition, fees, books and room and board up to $7,500 a year. The 13-year-old scholarship program honors United States' Senator Barry M. Goldwater, and is designed to foster and encourage outstanding students pursuing careers in mathematics, the natural sciences and engineering.

"I was pretty shocked, I didn't expect to get it at all," Celli said. "I thought it was a total long shot and didn't really think it was going to pan out at all."

Celli, who plays the organ, hopes to earn a Ph.D. in high-energy physics, and become a physics professor at a research university. He says the physics Professor Ed Chang deserves some of the credit.

"He was really helpful," Celli said. "He nominated me for it and also really encouraging in helping revise my essays."

Finding support in the Physics Department isn't hard, Celli explained.

"Professors in the Physics Department are really helpful and really generous with their time and never turn away when you walk into their office to ask a question," Celli said. "I owe a lot of the fact that I've been doing well to them, they've been really helpful."

Professor Susan Whitbourne, the coordinator of the Office of National Scholarship Advancement expressed her pleasure at Celli's success.

"It is wonderful for the student and the University that Jon has received this important award," said Whitbourne. "The Goldwater Scholarship Committee is building a strong record of success and they deserve great credit for finding and supporting our best students in the sciences."

More praise came from interim dean of the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics Robert Hallock.

"We are very proud that Jon's academic achievements and outstanding commitment to research in high energy physics have been recognized by the Goldwater Scholarship Program," Hallock said. "Jon's serious involvement in research as an undergraduate was clearly an important element in his scholarship application."

A painful past memorialized

"Every nation has shaped the Holocaust"

COURTESY HOLOCAUST MUSEUM

Memorials such as this one, which stands alongside the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C., are part of a new generation's effort to assign a singular meaning to a very complex event.

By Khara Nicholson
Collegian Correspondent

Every nation has its own Holocaust, and how nations choose to remember them can be almost as tragic and complex as the events themselves, said University of Massachusetts Professor James E. Young as he spoke in Memorial Hall on April 18 as part of Holocaust Memorial Week.

"I am interested in not only the events, but the way these events are passed down," Young said. "The twin object of my study is both what happened and how I've come to know it."

A renowned Holocaust scholar, Young is head of the University of Massachusetts Judaic and Near Eastern Studies Department.

Young began his presentation with the revelation he gives his students on the first day of class, "Because I was born in 1951, I don't remember the Holocaust."

Young explained that he "remembers" the event secondhand, through diaries, memoirs, novels, photographs, films, video testimonies and the hundreds of hours that he has spent in the company of Holocaust survivors.

Young explained that these life stories have become grafted onto his own Holocaust experience.

"In every place, I've literally found a different Holocaust," he said, "and [I've found] that every nation has shaped the Holocaust nationally in its own national commemorative forms, according to its own experiences."

This idea is what led him to study how every nation tells its own story of the Holocaust, depending on its own myths of origin and self-idealization. Germans, he explained, wanted to build a memorial in 1997 to recognize the third of three colloquia that were called upon to address where to go from there. The Germans insisted that a memorial be built, but Young told them that he did not agree.

"I simply told them, 'I don't think you should be doing anything. I think you should have a competition every year and debate this endlessly.'"

He discussed how difficult it is and has been for a nation to commemorate the people who were murdered, and rewrite itself on the bedrock memory of its crimes. This is what he believed was the fundamental problem for Germany.

"Every nation has its 'memorial demons,'" Young said. "Where on the U.S. National Wall in Washington, D.C., are memorials to the genocide of Native Americans, or slavery?"

Young explained that such memorials do not exist. He mentioned how the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in D.C. brought rise to two new institutions near the wall, which relate to Native American History and an African American History. He said that America must now begin to build itself on crimes it perpetuated.

He continued to discuss the new generation of artists who have begun to produce memorial forms unlike any others we have seen before. He said that they are trying to assign a singular meaning to a very complex event. He presented various slides of these new alternative ways of remembering the Holocaust through memorials.

One of the slides included a remembrance of a book burning that occurred. There is now an empty library room with empty shelves that can be seen through a window in the ground. Another slide, which was a favorite of Young's, showed a bus stop in Berlin where, instead of a monument, there would be 600 double-decker buses scheduled daily to visit the places of destruction. This was not accepted because, "it was not to become a playground for contempo-

Students argue both sides of union debates

By Katy LaConte
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts's students had mixed reactions to their Resident Assistants' attempts to form the first undergraduate student labor union.

Pedro Feliz, a senior finance major and Brett resident felt that the unionization of the RAs was a positive thing.

"I definitely think they should unionize because it'll provide RAs with a better way for them to deal with concerns and problems or interests they have, meaning their pay rate and benefits offered to them," Feliz said.

Crystal Rochelo, a senior Wildlife and Fisheries Conservation major, also believed that the RA union would be beneficial.

"As a concept I think unionizing is great," Rochelo said. "That's how you become a greater voice to be heard."

In general, student opinions about RAs on campus varied.

"I think most of them are doing a great job and it's not an easy one," Feliz said. "Dealing with students is tough and involves taking time out of their student life."

Rochelo had mixed feelings about the RAs on campus.

"Thinking back when I was there, I had experiences with both good and bad RA's," Rochelo said. "And the good RAs definitely went above and beyond what they're required to do."

Tony Lopez, a junior computer science and math major, also commented on the fact that the RAs have a responsibility and a tough job to do.

"I guess I basically agree with the union, being an RA is a harder job than I would want," Lopez said.

Hearings on Columbia U. TAs' right to unionize start unfolding

By Amba Datta
Columbia Daily Spectator (Columbia U.)

(U-WIRE) NEW YORK – Two years ago, Rhonda Gottlieb, National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) hearings officer, could have heard the same lawyers as she did Thursday in the Federal Plaza building presenting the same issue as they did then – whether teaching and research assistants have the right to unionize at a private university. The only difference was that this time the university challenging that right is Columbia University, not New York University.

Hearings began Thursday between the University and United Auto Workers (UAW) Local 2110, which is affiliated with Graduate Student Employees Unified (GSEU) at Columbia. The hearings will ultimately determine if there will be a union representation election at Columbia, a vote that could certify a union of teaching and research assistants.

Columbia is represented by lawyers from Proskauer Rose LLP, which has an anti-union reputation and represented New York University (NYU) throughout its 43 days of hearings. The UAW is represented by the lawyers from Levy, Ratner and Behroozi, P.C., which represented UAW in the NYU case as well.

In a departure from the NYU case, the UAW is planning to argue that undergraduate teaching and research assistants should be included in the union at Columbia, and as such would be eligible to vote in an election.

But there are many similarities between the NYU and Columbia hearings, most of which are not limited to the universities' choices of outside legal counsel. Yesterday's proceedings demonstrated that the precedent set by the case at NYU, which recently became the first private university to grant graduate student union recognition, will heavily influence both counsels' legal arguments on the question of whether graduate students can be deemed employees under Section 2(3) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA).

Columbia maintains that its case is different from the NYU case in the hope that the NLRB will reverse the regional director's decision, and subsequent failed appeal, that mandated an election at NYU.

"We are fully cognizant of the NYU case... Our position is that the NYU decision is not applicable here," said Edward Brill, a Proskauer Rose attorney representing the University at Thursday's hearings. "Columbia is not NYU."

The UAW maintains that the board's decision to recognize the employee status of teaching and research assistants at NYU should be upheld with respect to Columbia's undergraduate and graduate TAs and research assistants.

Owing to the large inpact that the NYU ruling will have upon the Columbia hearings, any differences between teaching and research assistants at NYU and Columbia could be potentially significant. Two issues that could prove important are the level of

Swift angers the gay community

Newly appointed Acting Governor Jane Swift raised questions among the Massachusetts gay community and her gay supporters last week with her off the cuff remarks to a Boston newspaper about same-sex marriages.

Swift, who took a stance against same-sex unions, now refuses to state her position at all on the issue.

"I'm proud of my record in supporting protections for same-sex couples," Swift said to the Boston Globe. "I'm being candid that I'd extend domestic partnership benefits but I would not go so far as to support same-sex marriage."

Following the comments, Swift became concerned about the impact that her thoughts would have on the community as a whole and sent an aide out to top members of the gay community to explain her position. It was explained that she supported domestic partnership benefits, and would consider supporting benefits beyond government employees.

"I was hoping Jane would listen before she jumped to a reflex Jesse Helms-type position," said state Sen. Cheryl Jacques, D-Needham, who favors same-sex unions to the Globe. "As a mother, you would think she'd be moved to worry about (gay) families too."

Police arrest suspects in Eastern Mass. store and restaurant robberies

Three men were arrested in Needham on Saturday following the robbery of a video store.

The three men, Christopher Brooks, 32 of Randolph, Leonardo Johnson, 38 of Dorchester, and Ken Davis 28 of Cambridge were apprehended after one of the men confessed and implicated another.

Two of the three were suspects in the recent string of robberies of McDonald's restaurants in Weymouth, Randolph, Somerville, Natick, Norwood, Bedford, and a Burger King was also robbed in Burlington.

The robberies involved both knives and guns, although no one was hurt in the incidents.

The men are each being held on $25,000 bail respectively and will be arraigned today on the count of armed robbery. Johnson will also be facing drug charges based on the large amount of cocaine that was found on his person.

Raytheon to lay off 100 workers

One hundred workers will be laid off from Raytheon Corp. in Andover, Ma. this week.

Workers from the water fabrication unit of the company, machine operators, welders and metal sheet workers are among those expected to be unemployed.

The company has already told 30 to 35 workers that they are out of jobs and it is expected that they will inform an additional 100 that they need to seek new employment.

The company employs a total of 13,000 workers.

National Briefs

Alaska- A United Airlines flight to China was diverted to Anchorage after two twin sisters got into a fight with the flight crew. The 22-year-olds, Cynthia and Crystal Mikuta of Michigan, were arrested by Federal Bureau of Investigation agents upon landing in Alaska.

The two women began a screaming fight about four hours after the plane took off in San Francisco and continued to yell obscenities throughout the rest of the argument and plane ride.

Flight attendants tried to calm the women down but when an attendant attempted to get one sister back into her seat, the sister hit her in the face. Later, one of the pilots went into the cabin to try and control the situation, but Cynthia hit him in the head. When a different attendant tried to put the women into flexible handcuffs, Crystal put her in a chokehold.

The scuffle grew until the pilots decided to make an emergency landing in Anchorage. United Airlines released a statement to the press stating that its employees "take the issue of air rage very seriously."

The rest of the 255 passengers were put up in Anchorage hotels for the night and given a Glacier tour the next day. Meanwhile, the flight crew met with Airline officials to take mandatory tests and briefs. The flight was to resume as scheduled on Friday evening. The Mikuta sisters are in FBI custody and must appear in front of a federal magistrate.

Iowa- After another snowy winter and massive springtime rains, the eastern portion of the state is under a flood watch, and many people have voluntarily evacuated their homes.

Residents continued their sandbagging efforts on Saturday as the Mississippi reached its expected crest. One levee began to seep near Davenport's waterfront after a water pump sprung a leak. However, the National Guard stepped in and had the problem fixed within two hours.

Ninety miles away in Dubuque, over 100 homes have been voluntarily evacuated.

On Saturday, the water level was at 20.7 feet and expected to crest between 22 and 22.5 feet on Tuesday. Davenport has already constructed 23-foot dykes and the mayor told reporters that he is confident that the city is protected.

However, there are more rains in the forecast. The Federal Emergency Management Agency continues to monitor the floods. Almost half a million sandbags have been filled and distributed along the river's edge. Waters in Wisconsin and Minnesota have already crested.

Idaho- An earthquake measuring 5.3 on the Richter Scale hit southeastern Idaho on Saturday. Tremors were felt through Yellowstone National Park and all the way to Salt Lake City, Utah.

The quake hit at approximately 11:18 a.m. on Saturday, according to the United States Geological Survey. Seismologists from the University of Utah said that they do not expect severe damages because the quake was centered in a remote area. The epicenter was 27 miles northwest of Afton, Wyoming, not too far from Grand Teton National Park.

Kansas- One person is dead and 26 injured after a tornado ripped through Hoisington, a town near Witchita on Saturday night. According to CNN reports, the tornado destroyed 20 percent of the town, including 300 to 400 homes. The town has a population of about 3,100 and is only about one and a fourth miles long.

Some of the injured people had to be transferred to hospitals in Witchita after the tornado ripped the roof off of the local hospital. The roof was also ripped off of the high school gymnasium.

Residents of damaged homes have been given shelter. Some homes that had particularly terrible damage have been quarantined by the city. Residents of those homes will be allowed back onto their property as soon as the city has declared them secure.

Power was also knocked out of most of the town. Fire and Safety officials continue to search for survivors in the wreckage. The city's crews were unable to act fast because the wind from the tornado blew nails into the tires of the emergency vehicles.

Pennsylvania- Over 25 college students were arrested at Penn State on Saturday after rushing the football field before a scrimmage to draw attention to death threats made to black students.

The students were released by university police but will be charged with misdemeanor trespassing and defying the order to leave. The students said that they were engaged in passive resistance during their protest.

In October, the president of the Penn State Black Caucus received a threatening letter. Since then, letters have also been sent to members of the board of trustees, the out of state home of a black football player, and the caucus claims that both black students and their parents have been threatened. The latest threat came from a letter that threatened to bomb a black graduation ceremony.

The president of Penn State has taken possession of the letters and the FBI is also investigating.

Leaders support free trade at Americas summit

Following a two-day summit in Canada, 34 leaders from countries all over the Western Hemisphere backed an outlined proposal for regional free trade.

The summit of the Americas ended with a request for a free trade zone across the hemisphere by the year 2005 for Democratic States. Within the Western Hemisphere this eliminates only Communist China from the free trade proposal.

The proposed treaty is to break trade barriers across the Americas and also to improve health care, education and participation in democratic institutions.

The proposal was not favored by everyone, drawing nearly 30,000 protestors to Quebec on the grounds that free trade will hinder workers rights and damage the environment.

The protestors were fairly violent featuring a series of battles with the police, which resulted in a tear gas infested convention area. Several windows were shattered and fires started before a total of 406 area protestors were arrested. Forty-six police officers and 45 protestors were injured as a result of the violence.

Democrats criticize Bush's environmental policies

Democratic Rep. David Bonior of Michigan fears that Bush's environmental stance may undermine the 31 years of anti-pollution legislation that was developed as a part of Earth Day.

"America's made a lot of progress since that first Earth Day. But if the president and his allies have their way, the pollution of the past will become a part of the future," Bonior told CNN. "When it comes to the public's health and the environment, President Bush and the Republicans are willing to let the big polluters have their way."

In a pro-environmental move, this week Bush upheld Clinton's proposal to requiring thousands of additional businesses to disclose potentially toxic lead emissions and also explained that the United States would sign a global treaty aimed at reducing toxic chemicals.

Funding squabbles delay education plan

Democrats and Republicans are trying to smooth out differences in opinion in order to pass through President George W. Bush's education reform bill.

The compromise reached allows for students attending chronically failing schools to use funding for private tutoring and allowing others to transfer to another public school.

The bill also requires mandatory testing and gives the individual states more discretion on how funding for education is spent.

funding that each school gives to its graduate students, and the teaching requirements those graduates face at each school.

The University will contest the claim that undergraduate TAs can be grouped with their graduate student counterparts, according to Patricia Catapano, Columbia's associate general counsel.

"The NLRB did not rule on that [in the NYU decision] because at NYU the [undergraduates] weren't part of the bargaining unit," she said. "The University's position is that undergraduates are very different from the graduates."

The University will try to show, in what is commonly called the "educational relatedness" argument, that teaching duties the assistants perform are directly related to the education they receive as students; therefore no distinction can be made between an assistant's role as student or the assistant's role as teacher.

Interim Dean of the Graduate School of the Arts and Sciences Gillian Lindt said graduate students are not employees of the University because the teaching they do is a part of their education and training.

"Graduate students are primarily students in that they are training to become faculty members," she said.

UAW's counsel, on the other hand, will try to show that TAs and research assistants are employees because they fall under two broad criteria that the NLRA uses to define employees, according to Julie Kushner, a sub-regional director for UAW. The first is that employees provide a service to the employer and are compensated for that service. The other stipulation is that the service they perform is under the control and direction of the employer.

David Carpio, a graduate student in the biological sciences and GSFU member, said the nature of the work that TAs and research assistants perform is not at issue.

"The nature of the work does not determine if one is an employee or not," he said.

Carpio referred to a statement that Gottlieb made on the topic. "I thought it was very important that the hearing officer came out and said upfront [that] to argue the definition of what an employee is, you're going to have to stick with the legal definition."

Kushner is confident the UAW will be able to demonstrate that Columbia graduate students are employees.

"In this case," she said, "there's lots of evidence in the documentation that supports the employee status."

The scope of the bargaining unit is also a subject of contention. The UAW is not including the majority of TAs and research assistants at the Health Sciences Campus uptown and those in the Medical, Dental, Nursing, and Public Health schools and Lamont-Nevis laboratories.

Brill of Proskauer Rose argued that, if the right to unionize is granted by the NLRB, the bargaining unit should include all graduate students who are TAs and research assistants, including those in the excluded schools.

Dan Ratner, representing UAW, said some graduate students in the different schools do not have the same "community of interest" that GSAS students at Morningside do, and should therefore not be included in a union. He argued that many non-GSAS graduate students are working on their own dissertations or other research and are not providing a service to the University.

Each side had their opinions about the ultimate outcome of the case.

"I believe that the regional director will find that they are employees," Rainer said.

University counsel Catapano had a similar opinion, but said Columbia's beliefs on the matter still differed.

"My prediction is that the regional director will follow NYU in applying the law but the University believes that there are differences [between the two schools]," Catapano said.

Panel makes pitch for women in sport

By Stephanie O'Donal

The Women in Sport Management Club (WISM) held a discussion panel with perspectives from many successful women in the sports industry at Memorial Hall on the University of Massachusetts campus on Wednesday, April 4.

Guest speakers included the president of i-glow.com, Jamie Eslinger; Mount Holyoke College's Assistant Athletic Director Carol Ann Beach; and Professor Lisa Pike Masteralexis, a sport agent, lawyer and the department head of UMass Sport Management. Other UMass faculty included Dr. Carol Barr, WISM advisor from the same department, and Ginger Goldsbury, Career Counselor for the College of Food and Natural Resources.

The women shared their career histories. They discussed topics including how to make professional contacts, and form connections with various people outside the industry, as well. Related topics were the differences between various career and internship opportunities. A key issue to the panelists was how women are judged in the workplace. A common theme to the panel participants was, "As a woman, you are always being reviewed, so you must be professional."

Jamie Eslinger, a graduate of Smith College, manages and markets i-glow.com, a website that is directed toward girls in sports. Eslinger started the business in 1999, using her marketing and advertising backgrounds from her work in Washington, D.C. and the University of Michigan. Her website includes information on different sports and new equipment, training advice and even message boards.

Carol Ann Beach, a graduate of Colby College, is a former basketball and soccer player. Since graduation, Beach has coached basketball at Colby College and Connecticut College, and done publicity and promotion for women's sports. She is currently an Assistant Athletic Director at Mount Holyoke College.

Lisa Pike Masteralexis is a professor of labor relations and sport law at UMass. She, along with her husband, is a sports agent representing professional baseball players.

WISM has been extant since 1990 and is open to all women. It was started as a means for females to gather together in the male-dominated field of Sport Management, via panels and guest speakers, such as this event. The goal is to gain practical knowledge while advancing the role of women in Sport Management. This year's club is run by Carol Barr, a faculty advisor, and Co-Presidents Alyson Baker, a senior, and Lindsey Kegel, a junior.

Editor's note: Stephanie O'Donal is the secretary of WISM.

Many other slides were presented before he made his conclusion, in which he asked the question, "Is it possible to be a good German now, a patriotic German, and remember the crimes once perpetrated in your name?" He continued to explain that there is now a generation of Germans being asked to make this part of their national identification.

Young believes that it is impossible to make the Holocaust, which is such a fragile part of history, a part of Germany's identity. The Holocaust remains a source of memorial tension for both the citizens of Germany, and the artists and architects.

■ union

Lopez also mentioned that RAs have to face vastly different situations depending on where they are living and working. "It seems to be that RAs in Northeast Sylvan and Orchard Hill have less work to do than RAs in Southwest, maybe there should be compensation," Lopez said.

Rochelo expressed similar sentiments, explaining that some living areas are more dangerous to work in than others.

"Being an RA in Northeast is different from being an RA in a tower. In certain dorms there's more of a risk," Rochelo said. "It would be a personal risk to their safety to be constantly dealing with people who are challenging their authority. What that does is change their job description from student support to enforcement."

Lopez seemed unsure about the amount of respect a union would provide for RAs.

"By unionizing I think it'll be in their favor because it'll provide them with more strength and ability to cope with their concerns," Lopez said. "I don't think a Union is going to get them (the RAs) respect. I don't know how much respect they get from management but I'd assume the respect they want is from the students."

However, this is not the opinion of all of the students on campus. Zach Spilman, a sophomore School of Management major, does not believe that unionizing will benefit RAs.

"I think maybe they're shooting themselves in the foot," Spilman said. "I think maybe they deserve more money and better standards, but a union is not the way to do it."

RAs in this union wouldn't be able to take place in any political developments or activities, Spilman asserted.

"In exchange for a little more money they're giving up their freedom to political speech," Spilman said. "It's a terrible idea because the RA's want to be recognized by the University as all the time employees, but when you're an all the time employee everything you say reflects on your employer."

"Right now they're not held to that standard," Spilman said. "But if they're unionized they're going to be held to every standard in the book."

Spilman continued, and pointed out that they have the RA council and they should take advantage of it so as to avoid joining a union. He felt that with the RA grievance committee in place the resident assistants should use that to go to the University to bargain instead of forming the Union.

By forming a union the RAs who are in the majority would be being unfair to those who are not in favor, he explained.

"In a union, once 51 percent decide to make a union, everyone has to join," he said. "Even if they (the RAs) don't want any part of the union they take part of their paycheck. You have to pay dues if you're in and it's not fair to people who don't want to join and there are people who don't."

There's a reason why there are no RA unions anywhere else," Spilman said. "It's because it is a bad idea, not a good idea that no one thought of."

Protest voices in Quebec falling on deaf ears

This weekend, an estimated 20,000 protesters marched in Quebec, to protest the Summit of the Americas, a pow-wow to advance the cause of free trade in the Western Hemisphere. They had driven, walked, flown and bicycled to exercise their right to public demonstration. Some came from as far away as Europe to protest what they see as a move toward globalization that will endanger workers' rights and the environment.

For the most part, the protesters behaved with admirable civility. Admittedly, there was some poor behavior, including the throwing of Molotov cocktails. At least eight police officers and many journalists and protesters were injured. However, overall, the protesters' behavior was admirable in the context of the Summit's haughty response to their dissent.

The city had erected a fence as a barricade to keep protesters "safely" away from the Summit. A Globe article yesterday described the result of the military-style preparation by Quebec for the expected protests: "Political leaders and trade negotiators seemed nearly oblivious of the volleys of tear gas and yowling police-dogs only a few blocks from the main convention center."

The police officers were doing their jobs to protect the Summit, and the city of Quebec, from specific acts of violence not representative of the generally peaceful protest. To prevent protesters from entering the summit area, police used tear gas and water cannons, and heaved non-lethal flash grenades to disorient aggressive crowds. Roughly 100 arrests were made.

The problem lay not in the behavior of police, but in the systematic silencing, in advance, of tens of thousands of voices that disagreed with the mission of the Summit. The preparations made to subvert the effectiveness of the demonstrations revealed that the Summit's attendees had little to no interest in changing their mission.

George W. Bush said he had come to Quebec to listen "to voices inside this hall and those outside this hall who want to join us in constructive dialogue." He sounded like a kindergarten teacher: "J-hnny can join us at the art table when he wants to color within the lines."

Bush's statement mocks the idea of dissent by its implication that "constructive dialogue" is necessarily pro-free trade.

Courteously approaching the campus tours:
The tour guides really don't like being mooned

RYAN BENHARRIS

Well, it's official. Instant oatmeal made with water is much better than instant oatmeal with made with milk. I'm not quite sure how this is possible. Most heated things cooked in the microwave are clearly better when their liquid structure is composed of milk. Think about it. The instructions on the back of powdered hot chocolate always read, "Mix with 2/3 cup of water and heat in microwave. For a thicker viscosity, use milk instead of water." Do you ever not use milk instead water? Of course you use milk; it's clearly better, and improves the taste, texture and overall essence of the hot chocolate. And that's what you really want out of hot chocolate: essence! This was my logic when I read the same instructions on the package of Quaker instant oatmeal. My assumption was so, so wrong. It was easily the most disgusting thing I've ever put in my mouth. I don't understand it though. How could milk not be better than water? It works with everything else. I think that somehow, in this inhumane and cruel world, the suggestion to use milk was just a sick joke created by the inventors of one-minute oatmeal. It's sad, and not fair. But I'll get over it.

I need to stop settling into assumptions so easily though. Instant oatmeal isn't that important, but some aspects of my life actually are. Having an assumption about one thing can make the truth seem so much more substantially blurred. I think it was Con Air, in which John Malcovich's character said, "Assumptions are the mother of all screw ups" (Well that's at least how he says it on the clean version NBC shows on Sunday nights).

I had another assumption proven wrong to me last week at my other job. Besides being a hardworking, scumbag journalist, I am a University Tour Guide. So in case you were wondering, yes that was me you saw, waving my arms like a mad man, telling perspective freshmen about my 1.15 record in intramural basketball and how I had to be pulled out of the pool during my water polo class because I, "don't really know how to swim." (And when I say I "don't really know how to swim," I actually do the "finger quotation mark" thing. So don't "mess with me," because I'm "serious.") Before I gave campus tours, I certainly didn't assume that all students on campus would have a sense of common decency. Of course there are those bad apples that never cease to amaze me. I know UMass has its share of the loony population. I just didn't realize that there are so many of y'all.

Here's a question, and maybe if you're an active participant in this activity you can call me on my cell phone, with a firm substantial answer. Why do you yell at the tours? Why! Why! Why!? Why do you yell things like: "Don't come here, it sucks," and, "Zoomass, yeah zoomass!" You're not creative. Everyone who does it thinks they're the only person to ever yell at a tour in the history of vocal chords. Guess what. it's been done before. Find a new angle.

There are only about two acceptable reasons to be yelling things at a campus tour. Either you're a tour guide, or you have a really bad case of Tourette's. I know of only about 20 tour guides, and there just can't be that many people in one area with Tourette's Syndrome. God simply isn't that pitiless.

So why yell something obnoxious at the tours? No one can have a really pressing need to yell at a group of people. There aren't any classes on campus like "Yelling at the tours 101," or "Being a jackass in front of perspective students 300 (that one would fulfill your Junior writing requirement)." So you shouldn't have to yell at the tours as a homework assignment or part of a class project, so it must be an outside hobby. Hey, we do have over 230 registered student organizations on campus; maybe one of them is the Tour Group Harassment Club. I would assume that no one does it for a specific reason though. It's a spur of the moment thing. It's like eating a Twinkie. You never plan to sit down and eat a Twinkie, but it stares at you in its little cowboy hat and rope saying, "come here big boy and bite my fat filled unnutritious body." Well, let me give you a little pointer. My tours are not Twinkies, so go find a Ho-Ho or something and leave me alone.

One quick observation I made was about the gender of the catcall experts. It is only men who harass the tours. I've never seen a petite, 95lb. sophomore woman yell, "Hey freshmen! Freshmen! Woooooo!" And then belch loudly while pointing at her crotch. It just doesn't happen. No, it's always the guys who seem to do it. The worst are the guys who yell, "Don't come here! It's hell!" My big question to them is, why are you here then dumbass? No one's forcing you to be here. Man, you must be really stupid if you hate it so much and yet still stay here. What does that say about you? Do you go to church and yell at passers by, "Jesus sucks, He really, really sucks. Don't believe in Jesus man! Down with Jesus!"

Men like to yell at the tours, but both men and women seem to enjoy pulling their pants down. In 21 years I haven't been mooned more than a few times. In the last week, I was mooned twice. How old are we? Mooning someone was funny in high school, but if you're 20 years old, it's not funny anymore, it's just sad. To the mooning population, In case you haven't notice, we're an advanced society now. We got our license to be normal, so you can knock it off. You don't have to reduce yourself to mooning people anymore as a function of entertainment. We have TV and Internet porn. Go play with that.

Your ass really isn't that interesting or funny. I suppose I could make it interesting though. "There on your right is the library; it's the tallest red brick building in the country. And on your left you'll see the largest exposed backside in New England. As you can easily see, the young gentleman doesn't do a very good job at keeping the sculpture clean anymore. He just doesn't care."

And while we're on the subject of mooning, I'd just like to give my regards to the mammoth whale of a woman who mooned my tour last week. Yes, I said woman). Not that I'm any prize to look at, but this was the most revolting human being I've ever seen in my life. When she stuck here planet-sized rump with it's tiny white underwear (much too small) riding up a very conspicuous place, out of the driver's side of her Jeep Wrangler with the top down, I got hit in the face with chunks of something. Thanks a lot queen of class.

I guess I don't understand why certain people have a distinct desire to annoy an entire group of people with their own personal stupidity. Now, don't get me wrong, there are a lot of very good people on this campus who go out of their way to make our guests feel comfortable. Mad props to SGA Student Trustee elect Ion Laubinger, who I seem to run into during every tour I give. He's always pleasant and more than friendly enough to at least wave at the people walking by and tell them how great of a place it is. And I do know that the majority of students out there are like him.

I guess the most important thing to point out to the few idiots that get their jollies from harassing the tours is that the people looking at the school do not find you in the least bit charming. When you yell things like, "It sucks here," they don't believe you. Why would they listen to your crappy advice when they have a perfectly good tour guide who is trained to know more about this place than you? Note that when you're acting like a jerk, that tour is laughing at you, not with you. No one thinks you're funny. They just think you're a worthless poon with so little of a life that you need to resort to making a fool of yourself to gain some sort of acceptance from others.

If you do see a tour on campus, just give them a smile, and at least try to act like there is a reason you're here. Think about it: something motivated you to come to the University of Massachusetts. Prospective students will certainly appreciate you displaying that incentive. And the least you could do is show a little pride in the place that you're fortunate enough to be spending a very short part of your life.

High school and other perspective students have a lot of positive and wonderful assumptions about this University before they actually get here to check it out. As members of this community, it's our duty to, not only keep our pants up, but to make sure that those hopes and postulations are not turned into a bowl full of oatmeal made with milk.

Preachers still tethered to their prior material

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

MANIC STREET PREACHERS
Know Your Enemy
Virgin

With Know Your Enemy, it's clear that Manic Street Preachers, Wales's premiere three-piece rock outfit, wanted to energize their music out of their well-established plaintive, wounded style (which, this being their sixth album, is ever threatening to become a rut). But it's also clear that while they successfully mastered the rudiments of a thrashier sound, they needed some more time to develop the songwriting end of the equation.

Many of the songs sound like a blend of watery punk and latter-day Pearl Jam, especially the album-opening "Found that Soul." The second track, "Ocean Spray," finds them comfortably back in the old familiar melodies, notwithstanding the occasional super-chunky transition and a bridge of spacey horns, we've heard the song a dozen other times on previous MSP releases. This sort of lapse occurs from time to time across the album's impressive 16-song length, but most of the tracks find the Preachers feeling out new territory one awkward step at a time, hitting and missing and never straying too far from the old routine.

Sometimes this experimentation comes in the songwriting itself, as in the excellent "Intravenous Agnostic," a punk-fast, riff-packed rocker, and "Miss Europa Disco Dance," which inexplicably but successfully channels the Beegees, mingling in MSP's burdened-with-emotion sensibility (and just in case the irony doesn't sink in, an outro mantra of "brain dead motherfuckers" hammers the point home).

Most of the songs, however, cling to some degree to the Preachers' signature soaring melodies and mid-tempo beats, looking instead to the production for novelty. Most of this – the speech clips of "Let Robeson Sing," the Nintendo-era beatbox loop of "Wattsville Blues" – doesn't do much to improve things, and the songs are enjoyable in spite of, not because of, these studio embellishments. Add to this the fact that some of the songs, apart from whatever wrapping paper was used to record them, simply aren't that interesting, and Know Your Enemy can be a hard album to sit still through.

Lyrically, the Preachers continue their directionless, often impenetrable political ranting as the album title indicates. There's little here for your mind to latch onto, but their words have never been the real appeal anyway – vocalist/guitarist James Dean Bradfield has always had more success putting across the emotion of their songs through the desperate reaches of his melodies than through any lyrical punch, and his rubber band enunciation often renders words incomprehensible.

Ultimately, Know Your Enemy suffers from the same thing as all MSP albums: a sameness of tone and the sense that the band has once gain reworked the same four songs into a lengthy album with as much repetition as true innovation. The steps taken at expanding their sound in more visceral directions aren't played out sufficiently, although the stage is now certainly set for more ground-breaking releases down the road. In the meantime, Know Your Enemy will let you hear the latest permutations of the MSP sound with another scoop or two of adrenaline thrown in for fun.

A rainbow of possibilities: the colors of our wardrobes

Style File
WITH SHAUNA BILLINGS

For all those people who have enough trouble just picking out the style of shirt or pants they want, I have another issue to throw into the mix. Color. Yes, different people like different colors, but did you know that the color you wear could give people certain attitudes toward you? See if the meaning of the color you wear most matches your personality, or check out what color combination might make that Fortune 500 company hire you or that hot Journalism and German major you always see on campus stop and talk to you.

Red – Culturally, it symbolizes love, health and long life. Chinese brides traditionally wear this color on their wedding day for luck, and if you're in love it's all about the red roses. But red also symbolizes energy (you too can be a fireball!), determination and passion.

Pink – My bedroom at home is still pink from when I picked out the color at age 4, despite my brother's taunting of "Pink, pink, you stink." While many young girls' favorite color is pink, at some point we all declare we hate the color, because it makes us seem more mature. But it's okay to like pink again! Pink stands for faith, compassion and friendship, which you can never outgrow. And hot pink is all grown up, with people thinking "outrageous," "imaginative" and "innovative" when they see that sparkly one-shouldered magenta tank top.

Orange – If you're looking for the perfect color shirt to impress your girlfriend's parents when the come for brunch next weekend, orange is the way to go. It symbolizes happiness, courage, adventure, success and wholesomeness. All factors that make a perfect combination to impress even the most frightening of fathers. But beware – In some studies, women have ranked orange as their least favorite color. So you might find yourself chilling with her dad, as your girlfriend and her mom are off talking to someone in a more appealing color.

Yellow – Like the sun, yellow stands for warmth, happiness, playfulness, optimism and an easygoing nature. It's a perfect color for spring, but beware of it's negative attributes... yellow is also associated with aging, jealousy, illness, treachery, cowardice and aging. Ew, not so good.

Green – I don't know about anyone else, but when I think green, I think M&Ms, because we all know that the green ones stand for "heightened sexuality" (oh, the technical terms!). This idea didn't come from some nutty Idaho resident, since pagan times green has long been the symbol of fertility. Green is a very natural color, so calling all crunchy people who want to appear vital, abundant and full of growth, get your Earth Day shirts on! The color green has also been proven to be a healing color, so wearing a bit o' green can keep you feeling healthy and can lessen pain in you and those around you.

Blue – Blue is everybody's favorite color. Some people say it's because it symbolizes masculinity, but I say it's because it represents all that we want from love and from our friends and family. The color blue represents loyalty, sincerity, peace, affection, trust, intuition and sensitivity. The color is also one of the most tranquil and calming of the palette, which may be why jeans are our nations favorite kicking-back staple.

Purple – Long ago, only royalty could wear purple, as purple dye was the most expensive. Now with $4.99 Wal-Mart shirts available, the color is available to everyone, but the connotations remain. Deep purple is associated with leadership, respect and power. Bright purple is compassionate and spiritual, while lavender is romantic and imaginative. So, girls with purple coats rock! (Yes, I love myself.)

Black – There are two very opposite popular ideas of the color black. There's the death, evil and Goth mindset. Black is the absence of all light, thus the reason it is often worn by witches, as it draws energy in. But it is by no stretch of the imagination cheery, and represents prudence and constancy, and so it is worn when a loved one dies. Then there's the sophisticated side of black. Beatniks, Wall Street executives and supermodels all have closets full of black. It's chic, without drawing too much attention. Black can be worn to almost any function and look fantastic, and black represents a no-nonsense attitude. Whichever your personal opinions of the color, it's one of the most popular clothing colors of our time. It's slimming, and if you're apt to drop food on your shirt at every meal, then you're golden with a shirt that hides all stains.

Brown – Brown clothes get dismissed pretty often. Sure khaki is always a popular staple, but no one ever remembers it. And what about chocolate brown? It's a great color! This spring, the military look is hot, which is bringing forth lots of olive, khaki and brown, so embrace the color! It stands for the earthy, stable and reliable, which many find boring, but is a great image to put forth when interviewing for a job.

White – It's clean and pure, and looks fantastic with every color. As the reflection of light, it represents goodness, peace, calmness and innocence. It's a classic and can be worn year round now, so forget the Memorial Day through Labor Day rule, and bust out some white!

Take a look in your closet before you go shopping next time, and check out what colors are missing from your closet. My roommate last year's entire closet was at one point blue and gray, by picking up a few new shirts in red and yellow, she made her wardrobe ten times more vibrant. So try a color you've never tried before; be romantic in red, healing in green or beatnik in black, and see what happens to your attitude and those around you!

Third Dundee film not a charm

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

CROCODILE DUNDEE IN L.A.
directed by with Paul Hogan, Linda Kozlowski playing at Cinemark, Hadley

Paul Hogan as Mick Dundee.

COURTESY IMDB.COM

It's difficult to explain what made the first two Crocodile Dundee movies so entertaining. The jokes were only marginally funny (especially in the first) the plots were only marginally plausible (especially in the second) and both films suffered from horrible supporting casts, awkward writing and a general clumsiness. The fish-out-of-water routine was never these films' appeal, being merely an excuse to set up gag after lukewarm gag of Mick not understanding American culture. Instead, these films most shone when the fish was in its water – when Mick was leading Sue through the Australian outback, first on tour for Sue's magazine piece, and later as a means of escaping a rampaging drug cartel.

Whatever the films may have suffered from, and the list is long and colorful, Paul Hogan had an authenticity and charm that kept us watching, if only to find out which bit of Aussi wilderness lore (whether real or fabricated) he would demonstrate next.

And so now we have a third one, and, regrettably and inevitably, it has none of its older siblings' ability to alternate between decent action flick and unaccountable effective comedy.

Right from the beginning everything about the film feels wrong. It starts off in Walkabout Creek, Australia, Mick and Sue (Linda Kozlowski) having settled down (although not formally married) to raise their son, 9 year-old Mickey. We get to see the familiar locals going through the familiar routines, and it all feels tired and awkward; the film tries too hard to recreate the old charm, brightly repackaging and shoving in our laps something that we gladly bought the first two times around. The 13 years that have passed since the last film are visible in most of the characters, especially Kozlowski, who, never a great actress to begin with, has spent too long out of the saddle and can't manage to create a complete character for herself. Paul Hogan, however, looks not much worse for wear – the man has always had skin like a baked potato; Mick first appears in a croc hunting scene unpalatably sweetened with physical comedy, and although in a way it's great to see the character again, there's an inescapable sense of being cheated by the film, of being offered some street vendor knock off of a once-familiar cast of characters.

Linda and Paul, rounding the hill.

COURTESY YAHOO.COM

Here's the real kicker: not 20 minutes after the begins some plot contrivance has put Mick, Sue and Mickey on a plane bound for L.A., and they don't return to Australia until the very final scene of the film. The formula of one-half-outback, one-half-U.S. that worked so well for the first two movies is thus thrown out the window, and the rest of the film follows Mick and son on their unfunny misadventures in L.A. while a stupid, stupid storyline involving stolen art develops.

That "unfunny" part cannot be stressed enough – these jokes stink. Paul Hogan is no comedian, and except for a few scenes with him and his buddy Jacko (fellow Aussi and Dundee film alum Alec Wilson), who flies out from Australia to act as nanny for Mickey, there's nothing worth laughing at in this movie. A few of the touchy-feely scenes hold their own, kind of, especially the so-ludicrous-I-might-as-well-just-go-with-it romance between Jacko and Mickey's man-hungry teacher; Hogan and Kozlowski also put across convincing love vibes, being married in real life.

These tiny slivers of entertainment come later in the film, which in general improves from beginning to end. That, however, is sort of like saying that dog vomit doesn't smell so bad after it's been drying in the sun for a few hours. It still smells pretty bad.

Fans of the first two might not be able to resist the temptation of a new Crocodile Dundee film. My advice? Try harder to resist.

Trick's southern beats

TRICK DADDY
Thugs Are Us
Atlantic Records

From Compton to NYC to New Orleans to St. Louis, hip hop nation has a trend of different geographic locations taking it over for short periods at a time, some to be quickly forgotten, others not. But what about Miami? Well, except for Will Smith's song "Miami" (yeah, I know that doesn't really count), South Beach has barely even made a blip on the rap radar. But the pilot of that one small plane showing up on the radar is one man: Miami native Trick Daddy.

Formerly known as Trick Daddy Dollar, the Florida rapper has actually been at the game for some time now, since 1997 to be exact. His first few albums with such clever titles as www.thugs.com and Book of Thugs didn't exactly set the rap world on fire, or even create much of a spark. His sound, although not far to other dirty south rappers, was generally considered underdeveloped in comparison with his peers.

Thugs Are Us continues the trend of the clever name for Trick, but this time around there is some cleverness in the music itself. In the album's opener "I'm a Thug" (really? thanks for clearing that up), Trick Daddy's combination of comical urban slang over raw, danceable beats makes for a catchy track. The same holds true for the majority of the album.

After listening to tracks called "Have My Cheese" and "Bricks and Marijuana," it's obvious this isn't The Marshall Mathers LP when it comes to dreariness, or social commentary. Well, unless you consider talking about being a thug, having sex with as many "hos" as possible and how many cars one owns to be important social issues that warrant more discussion. One issue in particular – sex – Trick Daddy seems to prefer above all others. Several tracks, from "Pull Over" where Trick proclaims "Pull that ass over bitch," to "For All My Ladies," serve as tributes to fornication.

The main strength of the album lies in its clever use of urban street slang and its catchy, lighthearted hooks. Tracks like "The Hotness" and the album's first single "Take it to Da House," are perfect examples of fun, if not somewhat inane, rap songs, that function best as party jams, not as anything to be taken seriously. Still, it's not as if Trick Daddy is trying get on BET's Comicview anytime soon like some current rappers appear to be (i.e. Project Pat: "Chickenheads"). Although Thugs Are Us includes party jams a-plenty, Trick Daddy didn't totally shed his street appeal, as his rhyming style is still hard and raw in tracks like "The N Word" and "Surviving The Drought."

While Trick does a solid job of mixing pop hop with hip hop, the feel that one is listening to a true hip hop album that isn't being tailored for radio still remains. While the beats are rather simple, dirty south style canned beats, the one aspect that sets Trick apart from pop hoppers like Nelly or Ja Rule is his more advanced rhyming. At times his words can be hard to ascertain. Meanwhile, his beats, while bounceable, are not crying out "radio, play me!" like, say, "Ride Wit Me" or "Put It On Me" do. Rather, many of the beats don't sound clean or sharply produced enough for a mainstream audience.

This is probably the result of the absence of the usual cast of A-Team producers like Manny Freah, Dre, or Swizz Beats. Instead, Trick gets the B-team with the likes of Styles Live, Digital Underground, and ROC first time producing a major record. Because of this, Trick Daddy is in the position of being somewhere in between hardcore and radio ready rap.

Another important aspect of this album was to get Trick's Slip-And Slide Records off the ground as a label to be reckoned with. Guest Spots from label mates Duece Poppi and R&B crooner Trina are present mainly for publicity purposes. Will Trick Daddy, Slip and Slide Records and Miami, Florida become hip hop's capital anytime soon? Probably not.

Trick Daddy may be one of the most mediocre and indistinguishable rappers in the game. Not as good as Outcast, or Ludicris, but better than many of the Cash Money and No Limit crew, Trick stands out as the best of the second tier of southern rappers. Overall, Trick Daddy's contribution to hip hop is providing some fun, often very catchy southern style beats and rhymes. So, as Trick puts it himself, "Don't Fuck With the South."

OutKast alum tries to go it solo

SLIMM CALHOUN
The Skinny
Elektra

The plight of Slimm Calhoun brings to mind the Snapcase song "Caboose" that asks, "do you know yourself...can you pull the weight that rides on another's shoulders?" The presence of Calhoun's high-profile buddies, OutKast, begs the inquiry of whether Slimm is a rapper to be taken seriously or a coattail rider living large off the accolades of his ATL affiliations. The evidence presented in his debut The Skinny concludes that Slimm's style isn't the result of progression through unlearning, but rather a studied and lively offshoot of the OutKast sound that doesn't stray too far from the source. But why would one want to?

"Back on the scene, a sack of green sitting on chrome and rubber bands/ Paint looking like Candyland, it's Slimm the South Paw triggerman." Such was Slimm's introduction to many on Outkast's "Gangsta Shit." His jumpy yet smooth flow and references to cars, guns and money all in a few lines put him squarely in the Big Boi school of hip-hop. With a full album to expand upon these ideas, the reference material is unfortunately much the same. But Slimm does take time out to philosophize a la Andre 3000 at times, and it's this forward thinking, combined with funky street tales and stellar production from Earthtone III that puts meat on The Skinny's bones.

Slimm's flow is torn between the Nquil drawl of the likes of Project Pat and the more aggressive, "something to prove" spitfire of 2pac. He never seems overly eager to please, and that fits with the overall feel of the album, which works much more as a hip party disc than an impressive display of rhyming or lyrical proficiency.

Slimm seems just as at home with introspective street tales like "Timelock" and "Lil' Buddy (Til Death Do Us Part)" as he does with sex anthems like "It's OK" and "The Cut Song." It's clear that Slimm has a lot more fun as a lover than a hustler, so it's the silly chorus of the latter song and the sly attitude of the former that stand out from the sometimes tedious stories of making ends meet.

Andre and Big Boi from OutKast are revved up to help out Slimm, and positively ignite their respective tracks. Andre's "Red Velvet"-esque vocal distortion on "It's OK" is as funny as it is fast, and Big Boi's contribution to "Dirt Work" is reminiscent of Raekwon's verse on "Skew It on the Bar-B."

Slimm Calhoun of the OutKast family.

COURTESY JONATHAN MANNION

The production is above average throughout, even if it does seem to be OutKast lite much of the time. The smooth and confident sounds of "Worldly Ways" and "On the Grind" aren't so flashy as to detract from Slimm, which would be great if he had more to say. The soulful vocals in the chorus of "The Skinny" and the red-eyed guitar swirls of "How Much Can I" are high points that are unfortunately too far apart.

I would argue that The Skinny is a decent album from a decent artist. Slimm is definitely a cool character, and his sharp flow is more than welcome in small doses, like guesting on other people's tracks. But what's the verdict on a whole album worth of Cutta? It's OK.

span of the final frame.

Marc Morley book ended the run with a right wing rope and a shortside-marker that he deflected off keeper Scott Schroeder and into the net.

During the interim, the visitors were mere inches from bringing the UMass streak to a screeching halt.

After the Minutemen closed the gap to 12-10, G-Town's Sean Cartin won the ensuing face off and immediately rushed the net. His shot was initially saved by a diving Campollettano who proceeded to snuff a rebound attempt from his stomach.

Alex Racioppi followed the brilliant effort with his first goal in two games, while Morley's game-tying score came just three minutes later.

As the junior's shot hit the turf just beyond the goal line, a moment of elation was triggered in the faces of the Maroon-clad cheering section. The tally had a converse effect on the bodily secretions of the portly Georgetown skipper.

"They're awfully powerful offensively," Urick said. "We thought our defense was going to have their stiffest test of the year, and we were right: they did."

Unfortunately for senior Rich Kunkel and his teammates, Dusseau's floater spoiled one of the greatest comebacks this side of the '86 Mets.

"It's hard to put it behind you," he said. "It was very competitive lacrosse; they scored with something like 10 seconds left. We were pretty much looking forward to the overtime at that point."

The one-goal margin that read clearly on the final scoreboard could not have been more indicative of the tightness of the contest itself.

Although the visiting Hoyas (10-1, 4-1 ECAC) managed to take a six-goal lead in the final quarter, Georgetown eventually relinquished that lead and as it turned out a single bounce could have re-determined the games outcome.

Maybe the factor that loomed largest over the final result was the play of Schroeder.

"We had a lot of opportunities to score," Canella said. "[Schroeder] just stepped up and made some saves."

The Summit, N. J. native stifled the UMass guns and was the most outstanding reason for a 5-5 halftime knot. Schroeder (14 saves) out dueled one of the nations best in Campollettano who managed only five stops on the afternoon.

"I think we made him look a lot better than [Schroeder] actually was in the first half," Kunkel said.

In terms of momentum the Maroon and White certainly held the edge in the first 30 minutes. UMass out shot its opponents by a 26-17 margin in the first two quarters but a late goal by Mike Hammer gave the Minutemen nothing to show for it.

The set back is obviously a tough one to take for the previously undefeated Minutemen. On it's home turf, in front of a great crowd and with revenge in mind (a 19-18 G-Town win in 2000), UMass fell one goal and 11 seconds short of an 11-0 record.

But with a loss such as this one – with the six-goal comeback – a team may learn a lot about itself and it may educate those who were present only to doubt.

"This is the first time we have really been down in a game," co-captain Chris Gabrielli said. "This team has been through a lot though, we can handle adversity."

No matter what quantifying values a squad can take from a 13-12 loss, no matter what improvement can be achieved through a narrow defeat, zero satisfaction can be had.

"Initially the guys are really disappointed and I am not going to try and stop that," Canella said. "If losing makes you better I would rather stay the same."

Kevin Leveille is in the wrong place at the wrong time as the referee calls Tom Fallon (not pictured) for elbowing and hits the sophomore in the process.

– because Syracuse is coming to town. And now they have reason to believe their Minutemen have a shot at the defending National Champions.

"Being 10-0 kind of garners that we deserve respect and I think we have it," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Certainly coming out of this game, the Georgetown guys will say it and we'll say that about Georgetown. But we can't worry about that stuff. We just have to play our games and do as well as we can."

UMass (10-1, 4-1 ECAC) lacrosse nation drew a big red circle around Saturday's match with the visiting No. 8 Hoyas (10-1, 4-1 ECAC) when the 2001 schedule was first released. It was a focal point. After beating Harvard Wednesday, junior Matt McFarland said he knew his Minutemen could be 10-0 going into the game, and they were. It was then time, he said, "for the all important one."

The rankings didn't matter; both teams knew this one was going to be close. Last year, in the teams first-ever meeting, Georgetown defeated UMass 19-18 on its home turf in Washington, D.C.

This year, the teams came in with one loss between them – playing a very similar run-and-gun style of lacrosse. The team's respective offenses showcased that technique in the second half.

Two scoring runs defined the contest. Georgetown's 7-1 run, beginning in the third quarter, and UMass's 6-0 run in the middle of the fourth.

Down six with just over 12 minutes remaining in the final stanza, the Minutemen pulled out their version of the old "Refuse to Lose" attitude displayed by the Massachusetts men's basketball team in the early 1990s, scoring six straight goals in just over seven minutes to tie the game at 12-12, sending Garber into frenzy.

"I just couldn't believe it," Dusseau said. "We were on such a roll. I have to hand it to their offense – they played extremely well."

"This game is all about momentum," he continued. "If the other team has momentum you just have to score that one goal to stop it, and we just couldn't find the back of the net. We had some good opportunities, but we just couldn't do it. We probably shouldn't have held onto the ball. We kind of wanted to take time off the clock and that just got us out of our offense. We should have just attacked."

It was arguably one of the greatest comebacks in UMass history. But two minutes later, after a Georgetown takeaway, Dusseau activated the final laser.

"We were on the verge of getting blown out there," Cannella said. "And the guys really fought through some fatigue and made some great plays. It's hard to lose on play like we lost on. You can't say it was a great shot – it was a ball that was sort of deflected and it kind of floated into the goal."

Despite Saturday's defeat, the Minutemen are still on pace to grab an at-large bid in May's NCAA tournament – a place they haven't been since 1997.

Barring immense collapses against No. 2 Syracuse, No. 18 Rutgers and Brown, UMass's convincing victories over Hofstra, Navy, and the University of Maryland-Baltimore County – along with the respectable performance against the Hoyas – might be enough to get the team in right now.

Regardless, UMass has proved itself. And after three tough years of struggling, the Minutemen seem ready to make a run. Netting six goals in seven minutes to tie the game up in the final minutes is darn impressive.

The Georgetown loss will only make this team more focused.

"I don't know if I want to meet up with them again, to tell you the truth," Dusseau said. "But it would be great to see them again in the tournament, hopefully the finals."

Minutemen take two from Rams on road

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Any team at the college level loves to play at home. But sometimes, when a team goes on the road after a long homestand, it can fall apart.

This was far from the case for the Massachusetts baseball team as it traveled to the Bronx and took a doubleheader from conference foe Fordham on Friday.

The Minutemen won the first game in convincing fashion, 10-4, behind two home runs from senior captain Nick Gorneault, and took the second game as they have many games this year, on a come from behind victory. The Maroon and White used a two-run single from junior Mike Kulak in the top of the seventh inning to propel it to a 9-7 triumph.

JESSE SANTOS

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

"We played pretty well, but we were still pretty sloppy defensively and on the mound a little bit," coach Mike Stone said. "It almost cost us, but we hit the ball well."

Junior righthander Jesse Santos got the nod for the Minutemen in the second game, and pitched a complete seven innings, allowing eight hits and only two earned runs while striking out six to go to 3-3 on the season. Sophomore Derek Hucke (2-3) picked up the loss for Fordham.

The Minuteman offense was headed by Kulak, junior Aaron Senez and sophomore Jeff Altieri. Kulak had three hits in the game, including the go-ahead single, to go along with two RBI and two runs scored. Senez hit a double and a single in his four times to the plate, and scored two of UMass's nine runs. Altieri continued his torrid hitting by smashing his fifth homerun of the season and adding two more to his team-leading RBI totals.

The Maroon and White got to Anthony Paolillo early, scoring six runs on eight hits in his three and one-third innings of work. But the strength of the Rams' balanced offense and yet more defensive woes for the Minutemen (both Altieri and senior right fielder Gavin Clark committed errors) kept things interesting.

In the first game, Craig Szado went the distance for UMass to improve his record on the season to 2-3. The senior allowed eight hits and two walks in his seven innings pitched, striking out two along the way. Freshman John Baco continued his mound woes to drop to 0-6 on the season for Fordham. Baco allowed nine runs in his six innings of action.

This time, it was Gorneault and the Clark brothers doing the damage for the Maroon and White. The elder Clark went 2-for-3 on the game, slamming his team-leading eighth home run in the process. Younger brother Connell also had two hits, scoring two runs to help the cause.

But UMass' fielding woes continued despite the victory. It made four errors on the game, three by the infield. Fortunately for the Minutemen, the miscues were not enough to propel the Rams to victory.

"I think we make things much too difficult for ourselves," Stone said after the double-header with URI. "I'm not talking about tough balls, they're not hit that hard, and we're just being sloppy. I don't know if it's mental focus or not."

The Minutemen were in action again Saturday as they hosted URI for a doubleheader. For information on those games, see the related story.

9-3 on the season.

"They have a good team and we did a pretty good job against them," Sortino said. "[Saturday]'s games were well played by both teams."

Heading into Sunday's match-up, UMass had won 23 consecutive games, one shy of the school's record.

Hadley's winning streak looked in danger in the first inning as leadoff hitter Angie Barney hit a blooper over third base for a single.

After a sacrifice bunt by Erin Wiedemann, Dayton's No. 3 hitter, Kerry White, nearly unlaced the ball into right-centerfield, scoring the runner and giving UD an early 1-0 lead.

The Flyers then made a mistake they wouldn't learn from: they underestimated Perey. White tried to stretch the base hit into a triple, but Perey threw a laser beam to Robustelli at short. Robustelli then made a perfect throw to third, where Wheeler applied the tag for the out.

Hadley settled down after the early trouble. The Stamford, Conn. native retired the next 14 batters. Each one had trouble even making contact and when they did it resulted in lazy fly balls and insignificant grounders.

UMass didn't allow Dayton to keep the lead for long. After two quick outs in the second inning, junior Ashley Bakken and freshman Jamie Cahalan roped back-to-back singles.

Fan favorite Perey stepped up to the plate. The young lefty's diminutive stature had the Flyers' outfield taking four or five steps toward the infield.

"I love it (when opponents play me shallow)!" Perey said. "Bring it on!"

Dayton didn't learn its lesson from the previous inning and Perey made the Flyers regret underrating her yet again. With two strikes in the count, the Chino Valley, Ariz. native roped a double to the wall in left-centerfield scoring Bakken and Cahalan. Perey's power is never surprising to Sortino.

"Anna will hit the ball out of here before she leaves," Sortino said. "She has great power."

UMass doubled its lead in the fourth when Robustelli ripped a double down the third base line, scoring freshman pinch runner K.C. Budrewicz and Bakken.

With a three-run lead, Hadley continued her dominance until the sixth. After striking out the leadoff batter Maegan Swisher, a single followed by a walk put the tying run at the plate with just one out.

Hadley got the second out on a spectacular diving stop by Robustelli on a ball destined for the outfield. The short-stop snagged the grounder and landed her glove on second base for the, getting the force out and saving a run. She got the next batter to ground out to Robustelli to end the threat, Dayton's final one of the weekend.

The victory was Hadley's 12th of the season (12-5). She went the distance on the mound, allowing only five base runners (four hits, one walk) and striking out five.

While it was a record-tying victory, Sortino and her players know that the victory was even more important because of its post-season ramifications.

"This brought us through the doorway and to the conference championships," Sortino said. "It assured us of getting a spot and that's the first step toward our goal."

The potential record-breaking game will take place on Wednesday when UMass takes its 24-game win streak into Storrs, Conn. for a single game against UConn.

Perey's small but carries big stick

In person, Anna Perey is not intimidating. The 20-year-old sophomore stands at 4-foot-11 and is certainly not what you would call stocky.

An opposing third base coach is likely to run on the right fielder's arm, and will almost definitely pay for it.

An opposing outfielder will probably play shallow when they see No. 3 stepping up to the plate, and will more than likely pay for it as well.

Don't let her size fool you – this native of Chino Valley, Ariz. has more than enough power. Coach Elaine Sortino has expressed her belief that Perey will go yard at least once before she is done playing ball here in Amherst.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
ANNA PEREY

"I will," Perey agrees. "Hopefully more than once."

Perey will also admit that she likes being taken for granted. In this weekend's matchup with Dayton, the underclassman accounted for the two biggest plays in Sunday's win, each because the other team didn't see her as a threat on offense or defense.

First, the right fielder threw out Kerry White trying to stretch a double into a triple – the out killed the Flyers' momentum. The lefty followed that up the next inning, when she smoked a double past center fielder Megan Dunton, who was playing much too shallow. The clutch hit gave UMass the lead for good – its school-record tying 24th straight victory.

Not only has Perey proved that she can do the job on the field to Sortino, she has also showed it to the fans, quickly becoming the crowd favorite at the UMass Softball Complex. Every time she comes to the plate, there is an enthusiasm that comes over the crowd that undoubtedly fuels her competitive fire.

Perey is just one of a handful of underclassmen making major contributions to a very solid softball team. With a nice combination of youth (like Perey) learning more and more with each game played and the experience of the upperclassmen the Massachusetts softball team has meshed perfectly and been literally unbeatable for 24 games.

Minutewomen net 19 goals in rout of Explorers; secure first winning streak

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

For most of the year, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team had been playing below its potential.

However, after the team dismantled conference rival LaSalle by a score of 19-8 at Totman Field on Saturday to push its winning streak to three games, the inconsistent play of the Minutewomen seems to have finally gone the way of the dinosaur. UMass improved to 5-8 (3-2 Atlantic 10) on the season with the victory.

In addition, the Maroon and White also qualified for the A-10 tournament at the end of the year, which is attended by the top four teams in the conference.

"We have progressed through the season," coach Phil Barnes said. "To play the way we did against one of the best teams in the conference speaks loudly about what we did. And we did everything good."

Fifteen minutes into the contest, the scoreboard read only 3-2 UMass, despite the fact that the hometown team had been completely outplaying its Philadelphian counterpart. All of that would soon change, though, as the Minutewomen ripped off a 7-1 run to end the half and to put the Explorers away early.

Leading Maroon and White scorer Rachel Ingraffea started the run by blasting a free position shot into the upper right-hand corner of the net at the 13:31 mark. Less than two minutes later, LaSalle got called for an illegal defense penalty, and Kara DePaula promptly whipped the ball by the stunned Explorer netkeeper.

Ingraffea and DePaula would lead the way all day for the Maroon and White, as they were able to total five and four goals, respectively, outscoring the entire LaSalle team by themselves.

"We are coming together as a team and motivating each other," said UMass sophomore midfielder Jada Emery, who ran amuck on the Explorer defense on the way to four tallies of her own. "We are finally playing like the team we should have been playing like since day one."

At the 9:08 mark, Fay Naber (three goals on the afternoon) put home a nice DePaula pass to push her squad's lead to four, and Emery extended the lead to five a little over a minute later by picking up a loose ball and using her speed to run by the opposing "D."

Explorer superstar Jami Willus (the nation's leading goal scorer) closed the gap to 7-3 with her 59th score of the year at the 6:21 mark of the first half, but for the most part, she would fail to make a significant difference in the outcome of the game, as Denise Brey and the rest of the Minutewomen defense shut her down when it mattered most.

Willus would have four goals to her credit by the end of the game, but the majority of those scores came when the contest was already hopelessly out of reach for LaSalle.

"[Willus] controlled the offense," Brey said, who had the task of matching up against the junior midfielder. "I knew she was going to take it one-on-one every time she touched the ball, and that is what she basically did."

With 3:35 remaining in the first half, Lori Kain wove through some serious Explorer traffic in front of the net and bounced a shot by LaSalle goalie Lianne Dictor to push the lead back up to five.

In the final two minutes of the frame, Emery lined an over-the-shoulder shot into the lower left corner of the opposing cage, and was then one-upped by Ingraffea 40 seconds later, when she finished off a beautiful Hope Zelinger pass exactly one minute before the break.

This gave UMass a 10-3 lead when the halftime buzzer sounded, which was a very good thing considering the team's previous history. So far on the season, the Maroon and White is now 5-0 in games where it totals 10 or more goals, and 0-8 when it is held to single digits.

In the second half, it was more of the same for the Minutewomen, and they were never in any danger of losing the contest.

Ingraffea, Emery, DePaula and Naber continued to lead the attack, and Miriam Godfrey and Jill Blauvelt also contributed a single tally apiece in the second frame.

By game's end, the Minutewomen had busted up the competition for 19 scores for the second time in two games, showing the consistency in both contests that the offensive had previously lacked.

"Scoring 19 goals in consecutive games has never happened to the program since I've been here," said Barnes, who has patrolled the Massachusetts sidelines for four years (two as the head coach).

In net, Jen Nardi had her best game since coming back from an injury for the Maroon and White, making 12 saves and looking like her former self.

"All across the board, things are coming together," the senior goaltender said. "Everything is looking good, and our confidence is high."

UMass is back in action this Wednesday against Connecticut.

Some days, it just isn't in the cards.

One day after convincingly stealing two games away from Atlantic 10 rival Fordham, the Massachusetts baseball team [14-14, 8-5 A-10] fell back to earth on Saturday, dropping a pair to conference rival Rhode Island [19-18, 4-7 A-10]. URI cruised in game one, winning 13-5, and continued the barrage in game two by walking away with a 12-4 victory.

Rhode Island was dominant at the plate all afternoon, sending nine home runs out of Earl Lorden Field, one short of the team's entire season output. For coach Mike Stone, who has watched his club walk a fine line of consistency all season, the losses reflected directly on the inability of his hitters to mount any substantial attack.

"Today we just didn't hit," Stone said. "You can win a lot of games just by swinging the bat, and that didn't happen. [URI] came to play, and you've got to give them credit; they took it to us. We didn't do much right."

URI did plenty right in game one, however, scoring early and often to put the Minutemen away. After trading single runs in the second, URI exploded in the top of the third, putting seven on the board to take a comfortable 8-1 lead.

Center fielder Jon Scullin led off the decisive inning with a walk, and was driven home two batters later, as shortstop Mike LaBarbera singled to left off UMass starter Nick Skirkanich. Skirkanich got catcher Mike Schiappa to ground out, but struggled with the middle of the order, yielding back-to-back singles to Daniel Batz and Matthew Jackson.

Facing a one out situation with runners in scoring position, Skirkanich watched as left fielder Steve Lemieux ripped his offering to deep left, turning it into a double as Batz and Jackson were waved home. Lemieux himself got a ticket home moments later, when right fielder Jonathan Maloney sent his first homerun of the day over the left-centerfield fence for URI's eighth run of the game.

It would take three more URI runs before the Minuteman again got on the scoreboard. Utilizing what has been a potent middle of the order for them in recent weeks, UMass rallied briefly in the bottom of the sixth inning, putting an additional four runs on the board before finally running dry.

Second baseman Sean Sarno led the inning off with a single to short, and was followed onto the base paths by junior Connell Clark, who reached on an error by the URI shortstop. Following a Nick Gorneault strikeout, first baseman Jeff Atieri slapped a bloop single to right, loading the bases for shortstop Aaron Senez. Senez immediately singled to short, driving home Sarno for the Minutemen's second run.

Stepping up to a two out situation, right fielder Gavin Clark again came up with the big swing, sending a three-run shot over the centerfield fence that brought UMass within three, the closest it would get, as URI tacked on an additional two runs in the seventh and final frame to claim the eight-run victory.

Game two of the doubleheader played out to remarkably similar results, as URI sustained its torrid offensive pace and the Minutemen struggled to find a groove they felt comfortable playing in. Also worrisome was the defensive play of UMass, which committed as many errors as it scored runs. Stone again stressed the importance of balanced play, noting that the simple fundamentals of the game must be in place for his team to succeed.

"I think we make things much too difficult for ourselves," Stone said. "We're not talking about balls that have been hit that hard - we've just been sloppy. I don't know if it's mental focus or what. We certainly take enough ground balls in practice. We work hard – we've got to perform in games."

Rhode Island again scored the bulk of its runs early – the Rams were up nine after only two innings of play. URI then slid into cruise control, hammering away at the UMass rotation while riding the strong arm of pitcher Reid Willet, who held the Minutemen to four runs on five hits in his six innings of work.

Much like game one, a single, early inning dictated the mood of the afternoon. Rhode Island used the top of the second inning to pound out six runs, including three of the games six homers.

Freshman righty Eric Chown, who saw his first action of the season as a collegiate starter, allowed two of the first three URI batters to reach base, and paid moments later when LaBarbera homered to put UMass in a 6-0 hole. Chown then watched helplessly as Schiappa went deep in the next at bat. One walk and a homerun later, the Minutemen were behind 9-0, down for the count in a game that never slanted their way.

UMass made a small run late in the game, notching two runs in both the fifth and sixth frames, but that would be all she wrote as URI put it away, 12-4.

Chowns' previous efforts in relief went for naught in his first start, as he took the loss to fall to 2-1 on the season. Chown lasted only 1 1/3 innings, allowing six runs on five hits. Willet picked up the win, bringing his record to an even 4-4 on the season.

Sarno, who has performed well in the leadoff spot this season, left the second game with what Stone said was a concussion. Soon after sliding back into first base, Sarno was visibly shaken, and taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton for precautionary measures. His status is uncertain.

Despite the losses, Stone has his eyes focused on upcoming action, which includes a handful of dates with conference foes that will speak volumes in determining how the remainder of the season unfolds.

"We've still got three more series to go," Stone said. "We've got St. Joe's, [George Washington] and Xavier too, so it's up for grabs."

The Minutemen return to action tomorrow, as they travel to Cambridge to face Harvard. The Crimson [12-20, 7-5 Ivy League] carry four batters hitting over .300 and bring a rotation highlighted by two pitchers – Kenou Roz and John Birtwell – that have winning records and ERAs hovering around two.

Game time is scheduled for 3 p.m.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You may be able to score a major first today – but are the right people paying attention? It's a success, no matter how you look at it.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You won't want to pay a penny more than necessary for anything you need today – so you had better be prepared to shop around.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You'll meet someone who is likely to prove quite influential to you in the days and weeks to come. Do what you can to make the right impression.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Someone has his or her eye on you today, so you had better play by the rules. Any cheating on your part is sure to be noticed and addressed.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – The results of your efforts may not be clear by day's end, but soon you'll begin to enjoy the fruits of your labors – in a subtle, important way.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – This is a good day for talking about just how you feel – particularly when domestic situations become the primary topic. Be honest but tactful.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – What occurred only recently will take on more importance today as a result of your own desires and expectations. Don't leave a friend behind.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – What you think you know may not be entirely accurate today. Trust an outside observer to steer your thinking in the right direction.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You may stumble upon an opportunity that you cannot afford to pass up – no matter what kind of personal sacrifice it may require of you.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You're going to have to control your instincts today if you want to avoid turning someone against you. Friendships must not be sacrificed!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – A slow start may be just the way to go today, though eventually you're going to have to pick up the pace and keep things going very quickly.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – This is a good day to cling to one who understands you with greater strength and commitment. This person may, indeed, be the one!

Comeback falls just short

UMass battles back but Hoyas too much in end

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

William Shakespeare himself could not have scripted it better. With the suspense and trepidation of the tragedies for which the legendary playwright is so famous, the Massachusetts lacrosse team fell prey to the poisoned dagger of Steve Dusseau and his Georgetown Hoyas.

Holding form with all Shakespearean tragedies, Act V (the fourth quarter) pushed all onlookers through the turnstiles and onto an emotional roller coaster that would reach its crescent before crashing into the depths of despair.

With hopes of a Maroon and White victory over the forces of darkness fueled by an improbable six-goal comeback, Dusseau slithered into the right slot, bidding for the deathblow. Unlucky No. 13 then, with admirable villainy, dashed all optimism with a floating stiletto that tickled the twine behind senior goaltender Chris Campolettano.

"I don't know exactly what happened. It was going fast, but it went in – I know that," Dusseau said.

The Dusseau dagger, with 11.6 seconds remaining, secured a 13-12 Georgetown triumph that was not so fortified moments earlier.

After feeling the brunt of a dastardly 7-1 G-town run in the third and fourth stanzas, the Maroon and White was staring up the face of a six-goal mountain.

"In the third quarter I thought we got a little tired and Georgetown's guns really stepped up and made plays," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

The Hoya barrage did not have the effect coach Dave Urick so desired, as his squad merely awoke a sleeping giant.

Cannella took a timeout to gather the troops immediately following Georgetown's 12th goal.

"I told them there's no four, five or six point shot in lacrosse," Cannella said. "Some guys just started to make plays and that's really the difference, making plays."

The Minutemen figured it was about time to flex their own offensive muscles, as an awe inspiring six-goal run in the fourth ignited the 2,000-strong and knotted the game at a dozen.

UMass (10-1, 4-1 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference), with the balance and skill it has exhibited all year, had five different goal scorers in the 10-minute

Questions answered against G-town

ERIC SODERSTROM

Any prey to melancholy might argue that the elation of scoring a last second game-winner expels validity from one's immediate thoughts.

But after Georgetown's Steve Dusseau fit the deciding tally into the net with 11.6 seconds left – to upend the No. 4 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team 13-12 Saturday at Richard F. Garber Field – the excited chap offered up a rather levelheaded summary of the previous 60 minutes.

"There were a lot of questions between our team and UMass's," the junior midfielder said. "Are we for real? Are they for real? I think anyone who saw this game today knows we're both for real."

His coach, Dave Urick, provided the backup.

"A lot of people in the lacrosse world wanted to see what was going to happen in this game and I think it's too bad a lot of them didn't have the chance to see it because it was a great effort by both squads.

"I don't think you could have asked for a whole lot more. I think both teams played as hard they possibly could and played very well. It's one of those things – somebody's got to win. I'm glad it was us, but I think UMass proved that it's one of the best teams in the country."

Sure, Urick's declaration of the Minutemen's prowess seemed rather modest – his Hoyas had just knocked off the No. 4 team in the country (as listed in the STX/USILA poll), and put themselves one win away from wrapping up the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC) title – Georgetown's critics had been silenced.

But on the other side, Maroon and White doubters weren't screaming "I told you they weren't that good."

When Dusseau rang the victory bell Saturday, the 1,800-plus UMass fans (2,113 total) in attendance were thinking about returning next Saturday

Hadley shines on mound as offense comes around

Collegian Staff

After 21 straight wins and a 12-0 start in the Atlantic 10, the Massachusetts softball team saw this weekend as the biggest test of the in-conference season.

When grades were posted, the team had passed with flying colors.

The No. 23 Minutewomen (31-9, 15-0 A-10) came into this critical weekend four games ahead of Dayton for first place. In fact, the last time coach Elaine Sortino's squad lost at home was on April 30 of last year to the Flyers. UMass has since been unbeaten on its home field over the 18 games leading to the weekend series.

The Maroon and White was forced to take on its toughest conference rival without the dominating pitching services of sophomore pitcher Kaila Holtz (10-1).

"Kaila's had a little bit of a knot in her shoulder," Sortino said. "We decided that we would go this weekend and let it rest. This has been nagging her since Georgia [Feb. 23-25] and we need her to be 100 percent or as close as we can."

Saturday was a tough day to score at the UMass Softball Complex. There was a total of 10 scoreless innings to start each game of the doubleheader, but clutch hitting, a continued dominance on the mound and the ability to take advantage of Dayton's mistakes helped the Minutewomen take both contests.

Home plate was a place unreachable through 4 and a half innings in game one. UMass finally broke the scoreless tie in the bottom half of the fifth when sophomore Emily Robustelli's double knocked classmate Anna Perey in from second. The right fielder had reached on a single and then stole second to get herself into scoring position.

Senior Debbie Tomoguchi smacked an RBI-single in the next inning, giving Jen Hadley a little room to breath on the mound although the junior didn't need it.

Hadley went the distance on the mound, scattering eight hits and fanning 10 to earn her 11th victory (11-5). The shutout was her sixth win in UMass's last nine games.

The second game of the twin bill featured some similarities to game one. There was no score until the bottom of the sixth inning, when the Maroon and White took advantage of two Dayton errors to plate all four of its runs.

Robustelli reached on a single and scored what would be the game-winning run when Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler smacked a single. Sophomore Brandi Crons followed across the plate after a miscue by the Flyers' center fielder. Holtz followed with an RBI-double that essentially ended the game.

Senior Carrie Jeffries returned to her dominating ways on the mound, hurling the complete game shutout while walking just one and striking out three. The win improved her record to

Chinua Achebe Speaks Against Censorship

Stories that carry oppressive subtexts should not be censored, but instead taught critically, said Chinua Achebe at an event last night on the University of Massachusetts campus, at which he read from his book Home and Exile, released last year. The author, perhaps best known for his 1958 novel Things Fall Apart, said that his most recent work is "a meditation on my life's work: the business of stories, the importance of stories, the value of stories."

Achebe, a faculty member of the UMass English department from 1972 to 1975, said that he was delighted to revisit the University, which he defined as a sanctuary full of friends. "This is the place where we came when we couldn't bear our home anymore in 1972," he said.

The excerpts he chose to read from Home and Exile contained quotes from Western writers about African stories and culture. A juxtaposition of critical readings on "The Palm Wine Drinkard," a tale by African writer Amos Tutuola, provoked nervous laughter from the crowd. Achebe quoted from a 1954 essay by Elspeth Huxley, whose academic tone belied a pejorative view of the tale, which in her view symbolized "the darkness of the African mind."

On the other hand, in the same decade, Welsh poet Dylan Thomas showed "recognition of Tutuola's merit," according to Achebe, who described Thomas as a "free spirit" able to understand the tale without ever having been to Africa. Conversely, Huxley, who had lived in Kenya, was a noted apologist for the cause of imperialism. Achebe called Huxley's essays that sought to justify dispossession of African lands by whites a crime akin to "forging title deeds."

He read a selection from Home and Exile that touched on his experience as an undergraduate student in Africa, taught by whites, reading books by whites and ultimately dissatisfied with the portrayal of African culture. He described the African protagonist of one critically acclaimed book as "a bumbling idiot. . . that was passed off as a poet."

However, Achebe said that he believes such books have a place in literary history. He disavowed any desire to limit the freedom of writers, even if their ideas offend his sense of dignity as an African and a human.

"I don't want any book banned. I want all books read so people can come to their own judgment," he said, going on to say that he actually teaches many of the books mentioned in his reading for their misrepresentations of African culture.

The book is based on three lectures the distinguished Nigerian novelist gave at Harvard University in 1998. In it, Achebe makes forceful use of his personal experiences to examine the political nature of culture.

Boxes meant to take people out of theirs

By Chanel Dubofsky

From April 23-26, rooms 174-76 of the Campus Center will be transformed into "Boxes and Walls: The Oppression Experiment" an interactive museum exploring the experiences of five groups of people who have faced oppression.

Those who enter the museum will examine the daily and historical lives of Asian Americans, Native Americans, African Americans, women, Jews and the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender communities. The goal of the museum is to encourage participants to ask questions, investigate pre-conceived notions and, ideally, motivate the community to become socially aware through face-to-face confrontations with students who play the roles of oppressors in each room.

For example, in the women's room, students will confront images of women in the media, as well as experience sexist behavior and harassment.

Controversial Connerly visits Ballroom for high noon speech

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Ward Connerly, a controversial leader in the anti-affirmative action movement, will address the campus today at noon in the Student Union Ballroom.

The event, which is sponsored by the UMass Republican Club, is the second in a series of measures by the club to bring conservative speakers to campus, including speaker David Horowitz.

"So far we have gotten a good response, and it has created some discussion," Pat Decourcy, President of the Republican Club explained about the lecture series and both speakers' views on affirmative action. "People are talking about it, people are thinking about it, and people took a stand on the issue."

Known by the public as a rising star among conservatives, Connerly has spread his message on programs such as ABC News, spoken to Rev. Jesse Jackson on "Meet the Press" and has been profiled by the New York Times. He is particularly offensive to many because he is against affirmative action, but is, himself, a minority. In addition to holding a position on the California Chamber of Commerce and serving as chairman of the California Governor's Foundation, Connerly is a published author and has written a number of pieces about his views for a variety of prominent newspapers.

As a member of the University of California Board of Regents, he helped in 1995 to deconstruct the system of race-based affirmative action throughout the school. He has been on the board of Regents since 1993.

Decourcy explained that the club felt that Connerly was a good choice for a speaker to bring to campus because of the current decrease in minority student on campus. According to Decourcy, following the elimination of affirmative action in the University of California system, the enrollment of minorities actually went up.

"We still feel that affirmative action is an important issue on campus and we like the way he approaches it," he explained. "We thought that it would be a good idea to bring him here and that it would serve as an educational experience for everyone."

More controversy was heaped onto Connerly when he angered affirmative action supporters by committing what they felt was a insult to the memory of Martin Luther King Jr. On the birthday of the famous Civil Rights activist, Connerly announced that he was forming a non-profit group to fight against race-based affirmative action worldwide.

Because of the stigma that surrounds Connerly and previous angry incidents on other college campuses, the club has heightened security for the

AMERICAS

Peru – The surviving missionaries of a downed plane arrived back in the United States after being shot down by a Peruvian Military Aircraft on Friday. The plane, which was flying over Inquitos, was gunned down after being spotted by the Peruvian military plane and an adjacent American tracking plane. The United States claims that the Peruvian military did not follow established rules of engagement before firing on the plane.

All in the air at the same time, the American tracking plane, which is generally used to survey and track planes suspected in the drug smuggling, reportedly spotted the missionary plane first, however, it was the Peruvian aircraft which swooped down low to try and identify it.

According to the survivors of the small plane, there was no radio contact between the missionaries and the Peruvians before the attack. However, they did say that their plane had been in contact with Peruvian flight controllers until they were fired upon.

The missionaries told reporters that their plane had standard markings on it, and a giant dove painted on the fuselage.

Peruvian officials claim that they tried to contact the plane three times and tried to speak to it in Spanish to tell it that it was being followed, but heard no response.

One missionary, Veronica Bowers, and her newly adopted seven-month-old daughter, Charity, were both killed by Peruvian gunfire. After the plane suffered the shots, it spiraled to Earth and survivors landed in a river beneath.

American planes are used to track and identify planes that may be trafficking drugs across Latin America. It has been the responsibility of the Peruvian military to shoot down any suspect planes that do not respond to interceptors. The Peruvians claim that they launched a interceptor at the missionaries' plane and decided to shoot it down when they were silent.

President Bush released a statement saying that there will be an investigation launched into the incident, and that he believed that the Peruvians did not follow appropriate protocol. The members of the missionary plane were members of the Association of Baptists for World Evangelism, based out of Pennsylvania.

Colombia – After a month-long manhunt, the leader of a prominent Brazilian drug regime was captured. Luis Fernando Da Costa was captured with his two bodyguards, who were reportedly members of Colombia's biggest rebel group, FARC.

Government and anti-drug officials believe the entrapment of these men together is evidence that the rebels have definite ties to the drug trade. In an effort to spur on the peace process, Colombian president Andres Pastrana has asked the rebels to prove that they are not part of the drug trade.

The rebels insist that they have only received money from the taxation of drug production. However, investigators believe that they have evidence that the rebels were selling cocaine to Da Costa in exchange for weapons. Da Costa denies all ties to the FARC party.

Brazilian Justice Minister Jose Gregori said on Saturday that his country would be pressing for Da Costa's extradition. So far Colombia has not released any information on whether or not they will hand over the drug lord. Colombia continues to be ravaged by a 40-year-old civil war and rampant drug trafficking. It relies on US aid to combat the drugs, but is also trying to work with rebels and paramilitaries to forge a peace and end suffering.

AFRICA

Rwanda – Eugene Rutagarama was one of only six people worldwide to win the Goldman Environmental Prize for risking his life to save endangered mountain gorillas.

Rutagarama is a biologist working for the International Gorilla Conservation Program. He was honored as an "environmental hero" because of his work with gorillas and his efforts to shelter them from the genocide in Rwanda in 1994. He continues to work with these animals today.

Rutagarama and the other five recipients of the prize traveled to San Francisco yesterday. They were each given $125,000. Rutagarama said that he plans to use his money to help national park staff in the Nyungwe forest and the Virunga Mountains Volcano Park.

Rutagarama is in charge of park area land in Uganda, Rwanda and the DR of the Congo. He also is in charge of the staffs that work in the park from those three countries. He said that the rangers in the Congo haven't been paid in six years.

Gorillas are the world's rarest primates, with only 650 alive globally. Half of the gorillas live under the care of Rutagarama's team. The gorilla has become somewhat of a national symbol and Rutagarama would like to see the animal become a cause for which all ethnicities can fight.

The gorilla population has begun to grow under the care of Rutagarama and his staff.

Nigeria – The capital city of Lagos is hosting an African AIDS summit this week. The goal of the meeting is to try and find ways to combat the deadly disease that has reached epidemic proportions on the continent.

According to a 1999 report, one in five Nigerians is living with HIV or AIDS. United Nations officials believe that that two-year-old estimate is conservative now as numbers continue to rise. Officials believe that the forces behind this growing plague are rooted in disregard for safe sexual practices as well as social ignorance of the disease.

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan and former US president Bill Clinton will both be attending the conference. Many African heads of state and local interest groups will also be there.

The news of pharmaceutical battles for patents has dominated recent African and American news; however, last week a victory for the patients was won when a number of pharmaceutical companies dropped their lawsuits.

The infusion of generic or cheap AIDS drugs, or cocktails, may be just on the horizon for sufferers, but the continent continues to be awash in homegrown cures. Earlier, the state assembly in northern Nigeria passed a bill that supports spiritual cures for the disease.

Some of the alleged "cures" include rubbing honey and petroleum on a victim and reciting verses of the Koran.

While some Africans may be partial to holistic cures, the conference is likely to center around curing AIDS with drugs, whether they be generic or not. They are also scheduled to discuss plans to promote AIDS education and safe sex.

ASIA-PACIFIC

Japan – The new Prime Minister may be a reformist member of parliament.

Junichiro Koizumi caused a huge upset in the race for the coveted position when he won 124 out of 141 regional votes in the first phase of provincial voting on Sunday.

The fight is over power of the ruling Liberal Democratic Party. Mr. Koizumi has one a secure position in the race, which has surprised everyone, including his closest rival, Ryutaro Hashimoto. Mr. Hashimoto is only in the lead by 15 votes.

The previous opposition to Mr. Hashimoto was policy chief Shizkua Kamei. He dropped out of the race and now supports Koizumi.

The final decision will be made when 346 of the MPs of the Liberal Democratic Party vote. The winner of the leader of the LDP will most certainly go on to become the Prime Minister because of his dominance over the parliament.

The new Prime Minister will be taking over for Yoshiro Mori, the current Prime Minister, who has already announced his resignation.

Support for Koizumi swelled after he made sweeping economic promises, including tackling the enormous state debt and restructuring economic growth. According to the BBC, many analysts believe that this is the best chance for Japan to get out of its downward economic spiral.

However, there are other critics who question if Koizumi's plan is realistic and effect change.

Voting within parliament is to take place today.

The Asian American Students Association held its annual Asian Night on Friday night in the Campus Center basement. The event, "Vocal Imprints," brought together over 2000 people from the surrounding area.

Prospect Street holds no treasure

Amherst – Amherst Police Department officer Gabe Ting responded to a noise complaint last Saturday night, and discovered a party underway. A dramatic scenario ensued according to houseguests at the party, and residents of the house.

"Shit went down," said Danielle Bonnici, resident of the house on North Prospect Street. "He searched stuff. He went into a cabinet and found a bong. He yelled at guests."

The officer arrived at the house at approximately 1:00 a.m. on Sunday morning, April 22, according to a police report filed with the APD. He was responding to a noise complaint from a neighbor.

Officer Ting may have been provoked when a houseguest "grabbed his ass," according to Patrick Roche, resident of the house, and senior BDIC major at UMass. "He got wicked pissed after that," Roche said.

The officer went into the house to break up the party, after a resident's attempts were not effective.

"Allow me to help you," Ting said to one of the residents.

The officer went outside and spoke with residents of the house. He later returned into the house, went into a cabinet and found drug paraphernalia. The item was confiscated by Ting.

According to police officials, officer Ting had the right to arrest residents of the house; however, nobody was ultimately arrested as a result of Sunday's incident.

"They said they could search the whole house for drugs and paraphenalia, but they said, 'We won't. We're just going to give you a warning,'" said Bonnici.

An officer is allowed to enter a house, and arrest residents if they are "acting on a legitimate complaint" said APD officer Steve Zahn. He explained that police officers try to use their authority appropriately without taking advantage of it.

"We try to do it reasonably," said Zahn.

The residents had purchased a keg of beer, and needed a permit to have it at their house. Anyone in the town of Amherst buying a keg needs to have a permit for the keg first according to officer Zahn.

Upon leaving the North Prospect St. residence, officer Ting said, "We recommend that you don't have any more parties.

in 1993, and has spread to colleges and universities across the country. The UMass museum is the work of a one credit course at UMass Hillel called "Boxes and Walls" led by Sarah Raful, a programmer for Jewish students at UMass Hillel, and Chris Rue, a UMass student.

In the course, students participated in hands-on exercises such as role-playing and heard lectures, in addition to learning the histories and experiences of each group. The goal of the class, according to Rue, is "to make everyone more aware."

Raful, who worked on the Boxes and Walls project in Chicago during her time as a student at the University of Illinois Urbana Champaign, said that the museum is an important experience to all students.

"[It will] open your eyes to something you've never seen or felt, something you didn't think happened anymore," she said. "Oppression, hatred and bigotry still exist, and this is an important step forward in causing an end to hatred across the world."

Rue, a junior Political Science major and the co-instructor of the Boxes and Walls course, explained that the project reflects one of his life goals: to encourage diversity.

"[I want to] make this world as diverse as possible," he said. "A lot of oppressed groups don't realize how close they are to one another."

Ultimately, the experience of Boxes and Walls, according to Rue is to give people "a way of thinking outside their box, to put these experiences right in your face. If you don't deal with it, your thoughts are never going to change."

Tours taking participants through each room will be led for groups of 7-9 will leave every half hour and will last about an hour. The museum will be open on Monday from 4-6 p.m., Tuesday from 4-7 p.m., Wednesday from 4-8 p.m. and Thursday from 4-9 p.m.

event. The last time that Connerly was invited to speak in the area was in 1998 when he addressed the Amherst College campus. However, protests from Amherst College and UMass students made it difficult for him to speak. Decourcy explained that in order to prevent such incidents from occurring again that there would be students working as security, as well as off-duty police officers, who would check bags and pat down individuals at the door to search for weapons. Food and drink are also prohibited for the event.

The event is free and open to the public.

A firebrand?
An instigator?
A reasoned individual?
He might be all of these and more and the campus will have a chance to judge today.

Today's speech by California Board of Regents member Ward Connerly will not only be divisive – he is anti-affirmative action and will speak on a campus that tends to have a different view – but it will also be interesting. It will present an excellent opportunity for this campus to show its willingness to hear a different point of view.

Connerly, the President and CEO of Connerly & Associates, a land-use consulting firm. After studying political theory at California State University, he served as the Chairman of the California Civil Rights Initiative. That organization campaigned for the passage of Proposition 209, legislation banning affirmative action policies. He serves on the California Chamber of Commerce, and is serving a 12-year term as a Regent.

We certainly don't endorse Connerly's belief on Affirmative Action, but we welcome his opinion and respect his right to express it. The things that he says in today's speech will be considered inflammatory by a campus community that's certainly more liberal than it is conservative.

But his speech will underline and embolden those very specific differences between individuals.

For the few conservatives present on this campus, Connerly is a breath of fresh air. Individuals who never get to hear such talk on this campus will no doubt appreciate his ardent anti-liberal stances. His views are quite legitimate and are too rarely heard around here.

For the liberals, Connerly serves as fodder for the internal fires. The things that Connerly says in today's speech will poke and prod at campus liberals who are too rarely opposed. Instead of simply espousing a party line, Connerly's going to provide a legitimate critique and offer, instead, a different road.

Connerly supporters are already on that road, cruising with the top down. But those who oppose them won't have to take that particular highway; instead, they need only to consider it. Nobody's forcing anyone to believe what the 'other side' believes. Instead, it is only asked that the 'other side' is understood.

That is what Ward Connerly can provide, a view from the opposing side that doesn't coincide with the UMass politic. But that doesn't mean he doesn't have anything legitimate to say. His political beliefs not only are a salve for conservative individuals on this campus who rarely hear such talk; they are also coals for the fire for liberals who've lost their inspiration to care.

A good give and take, a solid battle over beliefs, strong arguments from both sides: that should be the reality of today's lecture. Connerly might not make everyone happy, but he isn't supposed to.

Does anybody remember laughter?

MELODY ZAGAMI

I would like to talk to you all about something extremely serious. Something that we, as a people, as a nation, hold dear. Something that is threatened everyday and is in danger of extinction. I'm not talking about the rainforest, Alaskan oil fields or ALANA students. No, I'm speaking of something much more important: comedy. Even as we speak, jokes are being killed and laughter is being muffled. And for what?

Nothing in this world is more important to me than humor. When you are a Zagami, you are reared on comedy. You are expected to know obscure SNL sketches and whole episodes of the "Three Stooges." You are called upon to perform at family gatherings and make a total ass out of yourself no matter where you are; church fair, car wash, or a karaoke bar. And you better hope and pray that you are nominated for class clown or you're considered a failure. As I have been nourished by humor my entire life, I have come to the conclusion that without humor, life is unbearable.

In our politically correct society, we have turned humor into a weapon. Today, because society is easily offended and people frequently waste their collective energy searching for something to bitch about, humor is a constant target. And it's a shame, people, a crying shame, because even though we all don't have the same sense of humor, it is something that unites and elates us.

The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, the people who put on the Oscars, have recently issued an apology to the people who received awards for best technical audio work in a picture. They had to say they were sorry because Mike Myers poked fun at their category and made it sound trivial and people laughed at them. Mike Myers is the funniest thing to come out of Canada since the Mckenzie brothers and the word "hoser." He created Dr. Evil and Wayne Campbell for crying out loud. He's not going to give you an award for best audio technical work without making fun of you. Come on – like Hollywood's foremost concern is sensitivity. That's like the water boy on a football team demanding respect.

There are countless examples of people misunderstanding humor because they are offended by it. The problem with this is that it convolutes what real comedy is. And this, in turn, results in even the least edgy material appearing edgy. For instance, name me two shows that are funny on a constant basis to a large percentage of the population. "The Simpsons" and "South Park." What do these two shows have in common? They are cartoons (and I am well aware, dear reader, that "The Simpsons" is so much more). But because their casts consist of two-dimensional characters, they can get away with outrageous subject matter, genius satire and offensive parody. So we see that, because we don't allow an honest mockery of our foolish society anywhere else, people must draw it. These shows are two of the best reflections of society on television or anywhere in the media.

You may have read recently that there are some citizens in The Garden State of Italian descent that are offended by the way they are portrayed on the HBO series "The Sopranos." Now, "The Sopranos" is the best-written series ever on cable television, second only to "Silk Stalkings" on the USA network (that was a joke). These folks are suing because they claim Tony and the gang are false representations of them. I am of Sicilian descent and I can tell you that I have uncles, Bobby, Frankie and Vinnie who look and dress exactly like Paulie – only with a Boston accent. If anything, the characterization of the guys in "The Sopranos" is the comic relief in a very serious show with very important messages regarding many elements in our family lives. Are these people serious? If anything, I want to run out and buy everyone in my family a warm-up suit with a matching cadillac.

We are constantly blurring the lines of humor. We threaten humor when we focus on how it makes us feel. My mom is in a wheelchair, but I find the "Timmy" character on "South Park" hysterical. The whole reason Timmy is on "South Park" is to satire our society's need to embrace the handicapped in every area. And of course I believe we should do so and advocate it fully. But I'm not going to write letters and boycott the show. I'm going to laugh at it because I've found humor makes life better and issues like having a handicapped mom easier to deal with. The funny are losing ground and becoming a dying breed. I feel that I may have to soon go underground to tell jokes. The funny will have to form secret societies where you're only admitted if you know the secret knock. I hate the thoughts of having to look both ways before I open my mouth to make sure I don't offend someone within a thirty-mile radius (I'm loud). I'm not saying you have to be offensive to be funny – no of course not, and those with true comic talent know this. However, it has reached the point where being offensive is what leaves mass audiences gasping with disbelief. On Easter night, I watched Mel Brooks' timeless western spoof, Blazing Saddles. Blazing Saddles is an extremely funny movie that pokes fun at every ethnicity present. I was thinking about how a movie like Blazing Saddles would never be accepted by a mass audience today and while that is a good thing it also signifies that, in becoming more open-minded, we have become less accepting and receptive to humor in all its forms.

Maybe it is because I was listening to George Carlin and Steve Martin records when other children were listening to Raffi. Maybe it's because on Sunday nights my father would yell, "What do you mean you're doing homework, get your ass in here and watch 'The Simpsons'!" But because comedy is so dear to me and so important in my life, I beg you to be aware of it too. So, let us join together in the fight to save comedy. Throw a banana peel off your balcony or out your window and delight as your RA slips. Launch a coconut cream pie in your roommate's face. Prank call Billy Bulger, tell him you've got Whitey in your dorm, then hang up quickly. Do it for your country, do It for your children and your children's children, or better yet, just do it for a laugh.

Diamonds in the rough

RICK VOLPE

I have yet to encounter a fellow student here at ZooMass who thinks that we have a conscientically appealing campus. A lot of people tend think of it as more of an eyesore. For the most part, I agree with this thinking. This campus is a melting pot of different architectural styles, but almost none of them seem to work. A lot of the edifices are simply ugly. Morrill is a disorganized mess, Hasbrouck look ridiculous from all angles and the Campus Center needs to be destroyed by a terrorist bomb (providing people have been given time to evacuate).

I know I'm not saying anything new here. Calling the campus ugly is like saying the food at the dining commons tastes bad. What I would like to do is call attention to the fact that there are diamonds in the rough here. Every other campus I've ever visited for whatever reason has showcased thoughtful and attractive architecture, artistic landscaping or scenic vistas that seems to bring pride and prestige to the school.

Driving onto the campus of Syracuse University in the evening, one is greeted by beautiful and lush gardens illuminated as if it were day and featuring a huge flowing fountain. These gardens lead up to an administrative building that looks like the Lincoln Memorial, except maybe for Honest Abe perched in his chair wearing his famous half grin. The considerably smaller campus of Skidmore University in Saratoga has a small pond at its heart. There are soft lights all along the lip of the pond and a grand gazeebo extends over the water. If your first date with the girl from Botany class is faltering, go for a walk to this destination. This place will give you charm and charisma.

One little spot I visited just recently is a gem nonetheless. Few people know of the Durfee Conservatory found at the base of Orchard Hill, near the UHS building. Inside of this greenhouse is a collection of flowers and plants that come from all over the world. In the humid environment that was as close to a rainforest as I will probably ever come, I saw everything from the tiny bonzai tree made famous by Ralph Macchio to this enormous vine which grew along the ceiling and produced flowers like pink pompoms. The topper in this oasis was a pond – yes, a pond, centered in the largest room of the greenhouse. Colorful koi swam back and forth in roughly a foot of water that was traversed by a bridge. I half expected one of those monkeys with the colorful faces or maybe Toucan Sam to emerge from the ambiance.

A garden leads from the conservatory, and walking through this garden is a very unique experience. While going up and down its stairs and looking at rock sculptures that abound, it is difficult to believe one is still on the campus. Hasbrouck and the Awful Waffle seem light years away in the garden and I have to imagine that when everything's in bloom in about a month, the experience is magnified exponentially.

Goodell is nice. It's better than nice; it is a landmark on campus. It looks exactly like Monticello; in fact, I have been told that it was designed using the same blueprints as Thomas Jefferson himself. The towering columns and the Massachusetts seal give the building a very stately look that is retained inside. The walls are adorned with photos of ZooMass graduates showing off their impressive talents. My favorite one features a bright-eyed fellow holding a mechanical spider of some sort that is obviously of his creation. The look on his face hints at saying "this is the first warrior in my growing army of robot spiders...you will obey me." I may be reading into the photo too much, but every time I see it I have to avert my eyes to the nearby photo of two graceful ballerinas. I know these dancers are probably creations of the robo-spider master as well, but I am comforted nonetheless.

It pains me to admit that even with Goodell, the one building that undoubtedly brings respect and cosmetic beauty to not only ZooMass but to the state, I have to complain. Why is it that the plaque near the entrance states that the Commonwealth College lounge and office are located on the 5th floor, room 504? There aren't even five floors to the entire building and said office is located on the first floor. The plaque also confirms the pre-major advising office to be located on the sixth floor, which strikes me as being even more implausible. Thankfully, there is a sheet of paper tacked up near the stairs declaring the pre-major office to be on the second floor. I don't know what I would have done had I not seen that sheet.

Two other attractions on campus are the Old Chapel and the Conte Polymer Research Center. Thinking about these structures, I find it difficult to believe that they exist in the same time zone, let alone on the same campus. The Old Chapel is a small structure of stone juxtaposed in the center of campus. It looks ancient, as if it has been standing unchanged since long before the first ZooMass professor was born. It looks all the better now that it isn't surrounded by a padlocked fence. Far over to the eastern end of campus lies the sharpest contrast imaginable in the form of the Polymer building. It still looks like it was built yesterday, and even though I have no idea what sort of things go on inside, I know that these things kick ass. The building makes me want to major in conte polymers. Possibly my favorite feature of this research center is the manner in which it is connected to the Lederle tower. Viewed from the Northeast residential area, it actually looks as if the old and decaying Lederle has given birth to a newer and better building, smaller yet more efficient and capable. It's a very affirming image of ZooMass moving onward with the times, rolling with the punches and letting the old give way to the new when necessary.

Take some time to look around, Marvel at ZooMass. You can take a trip to the top of the library during fall foliage. You can watch the sunset from one of the top floors on Orchard Hill, and you can overlook the green athletic pastures bordering the south of campus from one of the Southwest highrises, but you will never see the campus look as picturesque, peaceful, or welcoming as it does at night from the top of the campus center. It is ironic that such beauty can be seen from such an ugly building. Still, it wasn't until I looked out the window and saw the twinkling lights of Central leading all the way to Orchard Hill and spilling out into the calm of the pond that I called this campus "home."

Treasure this time

KEN CAMPBELL

It is quite obvious to even the most obtuse – i.e. me – that this semester is drawing to a rather swift conclusion. This greatly upsets me, because I now realize I have less time in front of me than I have behind me in my college career. Being a junior on 'short time' is a weird thing, and since there's a couple of thousand of us out there, somebody should learn something from this column.

Speaking of learning, classes are dramatically different now. I have classes now that meet once a week for several hours at a time. Any class with a discussion section becomes taboo, and those that slip through the cracks are ignored. Discussion sections have been the bane of this little adventure in academia. I'd much rather just have another lecture. No offense to those hard working TAs out there, and all the offense I can muster at the lazy ones, but sitting in a tiny Herter classroom on Friday afternoon when the sun is shining, the birds are singing and there is Frisbee to be played is a sin right up there with coveting thy neighbor.

Without getting too personal, I will say that joining the graduating class this May are several members of my circle of friends. Some of them I have known since freshman year, when they were the juniors and, in some cases, showed me the ways of UMass. Ah, the memories. But I digress. Others have become a sort of extended family. I am sure, not being very different from your average junior, that most of you have made the same relationships.

Treasure them. Older friends can be one of life's greatest resources, and not just because they can buy alcohol legally. That's just a nice little ancillary benefit.

Older friends have the gift that no 'packie' offers: experience. They know how to deal with the bureaucracy of UMass. They know what classes are good, and which aren't. They can tell you which professors are Jim Carrey crazy, and which are Hannibal Lector crazy.

And sometimes they get you roaring drunk and take pictures.

Waxing nostalgic aside, I still believe that the seniors, and soon to be seniors like a few thousand other "Minutepeople" like me can offer great advice to younger folks.

Older friends have the gift that no 'packie' offers: experience. They know how to deal with the bureaucracy of UMass. They know what classes are good, and which aren't.

For instance, It's always the veterans you see leading tours and the frosh you see mooning the tours. I'm not sure why this happens. The seniors and juniors are out there, leading high school seniors past historic South College, the stately Goodell building, and that monstrosity of a Campus Center. They are trying to impart some knowledge about the campus' history. They are trying to impart on a new batch of students some school pride.

The frosh are trying to impart the best view of their "red eye."

Perhaps I am being a little too hard on the up and comers. I know it is simply a tale of a few bad apples spoiling the bunch. The simple fact is, in a few months, some of those sophomores – deliberate double entendre – are going to be juniors. The new freshmen, of course, will remember how funny it was when the tour got mooned, and will wait with bated breath while fall turns to winter, which last for eight freaking months, or at least it seems like it, till all of a sudden its 80 damn degrees out and its too hot to sleep so you sit there at four in the morning trying to write a cogent opinion about something, anything, when . . .

Sorry. Won't happen again.

But, ah, when spring finally does hit the Pioneer Valley, when the sweet scent of South Amherst perfumes the air with the fine fragrance Eau du Bessie, then it will be time to stalk those tour groups.

Enough of that.

Moving on, the freshmen that become sophomores, will, of course, pester the sophomores turned juniors to buy booze for them. Again, exercising one of those extra benefits. But if they pay attention, and are guided by the juniors turned seniors, they may learn something.

Besides learning the best routes to class, or the best places to eat on and off campus, you can learn many little things that make life a hell of a lot easier.

For instance, you learn that getting involved on campus in anyway shape or form, significantly improves your college experience. I'm not really talking about saving the world, but the little things. The ability to work with others to solve problems is a highly marketable job skill. Organization and responsibility are other bonus to joining one of the many RSOs and agencies on Campus.

You learn that buffalo chicken is a staple of the college diet.

Upper classmen teach by being around and answering questions. They know what offices do what at Whitmore. They know what that grade audit thing you get in the mail means, and how to use the "I have a meeting with my advisor" excuse to get out of any tight situation. They know that Scotch and soda is not an 'old man's drink' and that drinking with Yahweh just isn't cool. They also know never to take a tow from a guy who uses the term "unhappy mommas" more than anyone legally should.

I'm hoping that everyone can take a little something away from this. I'm hoping, most importantly, that the current crop of frosh look forward to being proboth that we have passed down, and that they've earned themselves. Actually, and most importantly, I don't want to be mooned. That's the crucial lesson here.

Secondly, I hope that the juniors and seniors out there take the time out of their day to impart some kind of sage advice on the frosh, Just the little things, like how to get to Northampton without getting lost, or how to use the network of underground tunnels to your advantage.

And lastly, I hope that the seniors important to me know how important they are. I've learned a lot from the veterans, and can pass what I've learned from them on to the new folk that will clutter our campus. I'll miss them, but then again, they'll never be far from my thoughts. And to everyone "losing" a friend through graduation, buck up. After all, we have to set a good example for the kids.

Tom Green crafts an abomination

FREDDY GOT FINGERED directed by Tom Green with Tom Green and Rip Torn playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

Modern-day cinema continues to amaze me. Even though the year isn't even half over, I have already seen images on the screen that I would never fathom laying my eyes upon. In Hannibal, we see Ray Liotta's brain served to him on a plate; Say It Isn't So presents us with the story's good-guy getting his arm stuck in a cow's patook. And in both Joe Dirt and Tomcats, the male genitalia is the focus for gross-out gags. And now there is the vulgar Tom Green feature film Freddy Got Fingered.

It would be unorthodox of Green to not push the envelope for what's in good taste, but in Freddy Got Fingered, he signs, seals and delivers a film that's so downright disgusting and naughty, so coarse and offensive, that even fans of his television show are caught off guard. Many of the nauseating segments, so I hear, were included in the movie just to test the censors, and would most likely be removed from the final project unless an NC-17 rating was donned on It. Much to everyone's surprise, very little was cut, and an R rating remained.

Much like his MTV show (and I assume his original Canadian program), Freddy Got Fingered is a series of vignettes, with only a very vague storyline tying one revolting moment to another. Who is to blame for it? Only Tom Green, since he not only stars in it, but also wrote and directed this embarrassment of a movie. Mr. and Mrs. Green must be so proud.

Green plays Gord Brody, a 28 year-old wannabe animator, who still lives at home with his parents. His father (Rip Torn), despises him for being immature and apathetic, and wasting his time on "doodlings." Gord goes to Hollywood to sell his cartoon, but returns home after no success, bringing Dad to the breaking point. He won't tolerate another minute with his moron of a son, and the two begin to wage war to see whom will be the last man standing.

But before any iota of this plot is revealed and carried out, Green sidetracks immensely, reminding us just how

MTV's Tom Green.
COURTESY YAHOO.COM

The very definition of entertainment.

sordid and twisted his mind can be. It's not as though the obscene acts he performs adds to the development of Gord's shallow character; no, it's just to showcase Green's shocking psyche, like when he stops at a stag farm en route to Hollywood to wag a horse's penis, or licks the open wound of his friend who busts his knee open on a skateboard half-pipe. If this isn't grotesque enough for you, if it isn't sufficient to make you wince and nervously giggle at the same time, then consider the pinnacle of repugnance: Gord visits the aforementioned friend in the hospital, and the lady in the next bed going into labor. Your stomach begins to sink as you realize Green will pull out all the stops on this one. After he tears the baby from the womb, he thinks it is stillborn, so he swings the newborn over his head by the umbilical chord (which he chewed off, mind you), spraying the walls with blood. If you aren't one of the several who walk out of the theatre at this point, even with the baby coming back to life, then you're all set for the remainder of the film, where the obscenities are fewer.

Green's newlywed wife Drew Barrymore shows up in the film (much in the same way Green made a cameo in her most recent film Charlie's Angels), but Gord's love interest is Betty (Marisa Coughlan), a disabled rocket scientist bound to a wheelchair who gets her jollies by being whacked on the knees with a bamboo shoot and giving oral sex. Green wouldn't be the first person in recent years to poke fun at the expense of the handicapped; the Farrelly Brothers (There's Something About Mary) call upon this trend in each of their films, but at least they give it plot relevance and a touch of heart. There's nothing likeable, though, about Betty. She's a bimbo, she's crass and her part has no relevance to the rest of the story, unless you want to think that the only people who would fall in love with the handicapped are morons like Gord. It's cruel, heartless and, most of all, not funny.

Freddy Got Fingered is a joke that only exists in Green's mind. From the title, which refers to Gord accusing his father of molesting his younger brother, to the final scene where an elephant sprays his semen onto dear old dad, the humor of the situation is totally lost upon the audience. In what could have prolonged Green's quickly evaporating career, Freddy Got Fingered only points out just how done with him we truly are.

WMUA showcasing local bands live in the studio

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students Declan Murphy and Randy Kovac had an idea, but a bit of a problem. With their radio show on the campus station, WMUA 91.1 FM, the pair wanted to showcase local music. The exposure would be invited by the band and would offer area listeners to see what the local scene could produce – a break from the daily grind of the Backstreet Boys and Third Eye Blinds of the world.

The problem? The duo didn't really have a lot of local music to showcase. The solution?

"I just sat down one night and emailed 60 or 70 bands," said Murphy, noting he got the addresses from Internet searches, among other places. "The next night Randy did the same thing. I just sent out a note saying that we have a radio show and we're looking for local music to play, and asked if they could send us any. The response was overwhelming."

It wasn't too long before Murphy – who goes by "D. Murph" on the air – and Kovac – "The Mad Samoan" – started getting CDs in the mail from all over New England. And more CDs and more CDs and more CDs. The radio show, "The Rejected Jedis," had music.

Massachusetts bands like Junction 18 and Garrison, both of which will be featured at Boston rock staple WBCN's Battle of the Bands in May, have responded to the students' plea. UMass or Pioneer Valley-based bands like Traveling Matt, Iotm Custody, 2 West and Sgt. Scagnetti also get regular turns on the airwaves.

The Rejected Jedis weren't rejected at all, fortunately.

"We got 50 or 60 CDs," said Murphy. "It gives bands a way to get their music out there. We've played just about every band that we've gotten stuff from."

Added Kovac: "We listen to the CDs they send us and we figure out which songs are the best for airplay. We've played a song from every CD that's come in."

Of the bands a local listener might discover on the show will be groups that will be lending their talent to Southwest Residential Area Battle of the Bands. For one, 2 West can be seen live at the Skybox on April 27 in addition to the aforementioned Battle.

Yesterday, the Amherst band Fire Engine Red granted The Rejected Jedis a live performance which aired from 11:30 p.m. to 1:30 a.m. – the show's weekly allotted time at WMUA.

"It's the first time we've been able to bring a band into the studio to play, because we didn't have the wiring and engineering worked out (previously)," said Murphy. "But we have had other offers."

Perhaps, if the Fire Engine Red performance goes off without too much of a hitch, the Jedis will bring on future local bands for live performances.

In the meantime, Kovac and Murphy will do a bit of scouring work on their own, keeping an eye on events like the Battle of the Bands to get new ideas and new music to play.

To contact The Rejected Jedis about airplay for a local band, send an email to rejectedjedi@hotmail.com.

A look at summer concert season

With spring well underway, the final push into summer has begun. Each year, a soundtrack of both highly overhyped studio music and equally marketed live shows always creates a compilation of memories for the heated season. The summer will be no different. Here is a look at the top-tiered summer musical acts to be mindful of, which could possibly dominate the music world over the next few months.

N'Sync – Let's start with the obvious first. N'Sync is more influential than any other pop phenomenon today. The group is bigger than Britney Spears, Christina Aguilera and Shaggy combined. With a new album due out in May that will probably break the record set by their 2000 release No Strings Attached for the most copies sold in a debut week, N'Sync plans to embark on a summer tour that includes every major football stadium on the planet. Though the Backstreet Boys have spent a good part of 2001 on top of the business, N'Sync will no doubt bring their incredibly prevailing presence back to the radio and music scene that they before have engulfed the market on and made it into their own. And let's face it, with all due respect to the Backstreet Boys who are not to be forsaken, N'Sync are the rulers of the pop world, and that makes you bigger than life.

Backstreet Boys – Though they can't be considered on the top of the game, because N'Sync clearly are the holders of that title, it's impossible to assume that they lay a step behind. The group decided to tour smaller venues (like the Mass Center), instead of huge stadiums, to try to convey a feeling of intimacy and maturity. You need to respect that, even though it is the Backstreet Boys.

Moby – When Moby began his illustrious career years ago it seemed like he actually assumed that he would somehow become a musical powerhouse. He gives off a sense of importance as a leader while being humble at the same time. His album Play is flat-out one of the best records in a very long time, and he has been touring in support of it for almost two full years. One of the reasons Moby is so popular is that he blends musical genres – no two Moby songs are alike. This makes his music very appealing to everyone. Sadly, the most important reason why Moby is so huge is because he has become trendy. His once unique and unprecedented sound has been fed to the mass music audience like a piece of raw meat to a cage of starving bears. How Moby will deal with the popularity is uncertain. His rumored tour with OutKast and Incubus will definitely prey on three acts that have all broken field barriers and are attempting to appeal to more than just one marketable audience. One thing is for sure: Moby now has the responsibility of setting the musical example for those who wish to follow.

U2 – If U2 doesn't ever put out another album again their popularity will still never fade. Ask any U2 fan how many times they plan on seeing the group on tour this summer. The question has a guaranteed response of more than Radiohead –The peak of Radiohead's career came with 1997's Ok Computer. Unlike many pop-icons, that album satisfied the band's fan base as people who actually listened to music for quality rather than visual appeal. Radiohead does not do anything to distract listeners from their music. With a new album due out in June, fans can only hope the band decides to tour this time (they chose not to after the release of last year's Kid A). Regardless of what lead singer Tom York and Radiohead choose to do, they will continue to be music's most interesting and mysterious artists. If they pull this aura off in an appropriate way, they will be the most cherished act this summer has to offer.

Rage Against the Machine and Zach De La Rocha – The ongoing saga of the former, current and future Rage Against the Machine can only get more heated and progressively weirder. Apparently former lead singer Zach De La Rocha is creating a solo project, considered to be a much more hardcore rap version of his former band's work, while guitarist Tom Morello and the rest of the band are apparently combining with former Soundgarden front man Chris Cornell. De La Rocha plans to be very active in the music industry and very vocal about his upcoming production. The rest of the former band has been practically silent, even trying to squelch rumors about Cornell. Either way, anyone affiliated with RATM will be prosperous. Chris Cornell would add a much harder edge to Rage Against the Machine not really seen before. As an addition he would certainly keep the fan base alive. De la Rocha will no doubt be successful in his solo venture, as it is one of the most highly anticipated releases of the year. His album Is due out in the fall.

Destiny's Child – With a new release due out in May, it will be interesting to see how Destiny's Child can adapt to the incredible amount of fame they have encountered. With inner turmoil constantly disrupting the group, they could be set up to prove that popularity only goes so far. However, more than likely their new album Survivor will be an immense success.

Tool – Tool is finally releasing the follow up album to 1998's Aenima. Lead singer Maynard James Keenan is all over the place. He is working with both Tool and A Perfect Circle to develop new music and new tour material at the same time. Tool's huge following is more than desperate to see what Keenan will do next. He has never produced a bad piece of music before, and the stuff he puts out certainly will not be any different.

Eminem – Eminem is quickly becoming the most notoriously spontaneous person in music. Who even knows what his plans are for the summer, or the rest of the year for that matter? It seems likely that he will help develop his protegé group, D12 with their new album, and from there, we can only imagine where Slim Shady and his annoying cohorts will go.

OutKast – OutKast's latest album Stankonia only improved the group's already established success. With two huge singles and more set for release they plan to hit the road with Moby and Incubus. The most appealing part of OutKast is that people like their personalities as much as their excellent music. Their stellar live show will only add to the perseverance they constantly deliver. If the summer is good enough to OutKast, they could be headlining festivals instead of showing as a supporting act someday soon.

Staind – Staind could very well be the breakthrough band of the summer of 2001. Last summer, this band was Creed. After Creed's step up from smaller venues to arenas, coinciding with endless radio airplay and a tremendous sophomore album, they became one of rock's biggest acts. Staind hasn't shot up quickly yet, but has steadily gained support. Their upcoming May release, Break the Cycle, has already produced what is easily the best rock song of the year so far for a first single. After only two weeks of airplay on rock stations, "It's Been A While" skyrocketed to number one nationwide. If the rest of the album is as good as the first single, and their proposed attempt to try headlining an arena tour, (one confirmed stop is at the Meadow's Music Theater in Hartford with Disturbed and Tantric), they could be rock's newest household name. Hopefully Staind becoming this year's Creed won't mean that Aaron Lewis could be this year's Scott Stapp. We really don't need another whining, pompous rock star.

Setzuan is tightly crafted

By Emily Vaconti
Collegian Staff

THE GOOD PERSON OF SETZUAN
Mount Holyoke College
April 18-22

The Good Person of Setzuan is exactly how it sounds. It is about a good person that lives in Setzuan. A young prostitute that lives in China, Shen Te, offers three Gods, who are looking for a good person, a place to stay when they have no other alternative. To thank her, the God's give her a thousand silver dollars after calling Heaven on their cellular phone. So Shen Te opens a tobacco shop, an odd idea. She does this so she can become a good member of society and help others.

Shen Te cannot handle the pressure of helping others so much, so she sends for her cousin, Shui Ta, who looks remarkably like Shen Te. Shui Ta takes over everything, including her debts, and temporarily relieves Shen Te.

Kasey Dresconko, who played Shen Te/Shui Ta, gave an excellent performance, handling the transition from prostitute to store owner masterfully (to assist her transformation, she wore masculine suits and a hat to cover her long hair).

Director Holger Teschke also did a superb job with visual creativity. During one scene it starts raining, and lightly falling sand is used to simulate the rain; the effect is remarkable, actually looking and sounding like rain, without the mess or the wet cast. Teschke also uses a white sheet for scene changes. This sheet works perfectly for scenes with the Gods, since you can barely see them through the sheet, but their presence is known. During the scenes where Wang is sleeping and dreaming, the props are being moved behind the sheet for scene changes, and even for intermission, the sheet is closed as one character announced intermission. It forces you to focus on what is going on in front of the sheet with only a very subtle background. You can physically see the three Gods through the sheet, but they are not in the immediate presence of Wang.

Teschke also had the subject matter immediately incorporated into the audience, even before the house was opened, when everyone waiting in the lobby was offered cigarettes as an introduction to the play (the good person owned a tobacco shop). Next, when the house actually opened, the ushers continued to offer cigarettes until the play began. This was the director's way of incorporating the play into the audience, breaking the fourth wall and easing the audience into a casual theatre environment.

As the show began, Wang The Water Seller, played very well by Ellie Schwetye, showed that even though she had lost her voice the night before, it would not stop her from giving a quality performance – though at one point she needed a microphone. She began with a short narrative that led into a second breaking of the fourth wall. The three Gods were sitting right in the audience with everyone else, and Wang began searching through the audience asking different people if they were Gods. This broke the ice and had the audience laughing, right from the start. She finally found the Gods, who were seated in the back, and proceeded with the scene accordingly.

The play, which was performed on April 19-22, was excellent. The cast gave a touching performance – no small task for such a long play (two hours and forty-five minutes).

Of pain and pastime: MLB injuries

Right off the proverbial bat, how about a moment of silence for Harold "Hal" White.

A pitcher for Detroit and St. Louis in the forties and fifties, White passed away Saturday at a Venice, Fla. Hospital after suffering a stroke. He was 82 years of age.

While White's death does not seem unusual for someone his age, the Utica, N.Y. native was apparently in the middle of another somewhat, uh, uncomfortable procedure when the fatal stroke struck; according to his wife Lenore, White was being catheterized.

After compiling a 16-4 record with the International League's Buffalo Bisons in 1940, White earned a ticket to the majors with the Tigers the following season. He had his best season in 1942, when he posted a 12-12 mark and an ERA of 2.91. White earned a career record of 46-54 through 336 games.

Fans of the Kansas City Royals got quite a scare Saturday night, when pitcher Jose Santiago was struck in the forehead by a liner off the bat of Toronto's Brad Fullmer.

According to Royals manager Tony Muser, Santiago turned or flinched just before impact, saving him from more serious injury. Muser indicated that Santiago did not suffer a concussion despite being cut on the head by the ball.

The 11th-inning liner was hit so hard that it caromed off the right-hander's head into short center field, where it was caught by second baseman Luis Alicea. It was officially scored as a putout by Alicea with an assist from Santiago.

"It's not a Magic Johnson-type assist," Muser said.

Santiago had logged two and one-third scoreless innings before being struck, and was replaced by Roberto Hernandez after being helped off the field. The Royals went on to win 5-4 in 13 innings.

Two National League aces could be headed in different directions thanks to problems with their throwing elbows.

Pittsburgh Pirates right-hander Kris Benson, who sprained a ligament in his elbow on March 19 and has not thrown in game conditions since, is scheduled to throw two innings at extended spring training in Bradenton, Fla. on May 4.

Team officials are hopeful that the 26-year-old can reach a 75-pitch threshold in simulated game conditions next week in preparation for a return to the majors.

The outlook may not be as good for New York Mets southpaw Al Leiter, who underwent an MRI exam on his left elbow Saturday at NYU Medical Center. Leiter had previously been diagnosed with flexor tendonitis in the elbow, and doctors this weekend found evidence of a mild strain but no structural damage.

The 35-year-old New Jersey native will most likely miss his next scheduled start Thursday. He is 0-3 with a 5.87 ERA in four starts so far this season.

Certain injury questions that have swirled around some of the game's biggest stars started to clear up last week, as St. Louis finally placed Mark McGwire on the disabled list. The free-swinging first baseman has been fighting a losing battle with patellar tendonitis in his right knee since the onset of this season.

A clearer, albeit more disturbing picture also began taking shape in regards to the left leg injury suffered late in spring training by Cincinnati's Ken Griffey, Jr. Originally called a strain, Griffey's condition in henceforth being called a partial tear since an MRI conducted last Tuesday.

Despite the more serious diagnoses, the Reds seem reluctant to place Junior on the DL. The 31-year-old multiple All-Star selection has been relegated to DH duty so far in 2001.

MLS vs. XFL: A battle royale?

Hey the Xtreme Football League just had its championship game and the Xtreme won...tell me that's not fixed. Oh, and to add to the Pomp and Circumstance that is obscure sports leagues, Major League Soccer had another exciting weekend of second rate play on the pitch.

I know what all you MLS fanatics and XFL obsessives are thinking – how do I choose? XFL or MLS, aaahhh! Well, when a dilemma such as this arises, there is only one course of action. To follow in the footsteps of everybody's favorite part time sports guy, Nick Bakay – lets go by the numbers.

MATTHEW F. SACCO

The MLS championship game is an event, held annually at a neutral sight in front of a half-capacity non-English speaking crowd, called the MLS Cup. The XFL offers the yearly Million Dollar Game in which the victorious team can divvy up the purse amongst its members. As much as it hurts to give props to Vince McMahon, bribery is a proven formula for excitement – just ask the White Sox.

Advantage: XFL

The MLS Cup trophy is just that: a big cup. The XFL trophy is just that: a big "X." The "X." believe it or not, is probably the most famous "X" in professional sports, while the MLS Cup will never be more than second best.

Advantage: XFL

MLS rosters are filled with has-been old timers who are out of their prime and brash youngsters who are eager to dominate a second rate league. MRI rosters, on the other hand, are filled with has-been old timers who are out of their prime and brash youngsters who are eager to dominate and make their mark on the game.

Advantage: Neither

Major League Soccer showcases grown men who voluntarily take their shirts off after a goal. The XFL meanwhile hires cheerleaders who take their shirts off whether their team scores or not.

Advantage: C'mon, guys

On that same note, MLS totally condones synchronized celebration after a goal. The XFL also encourages coordinated touchdown dances after a score – but at least the MLS players are in shape.

Advantage: MLS

MLS has real soccer announcers. The XFL has "The Body."

Advantage: MLS

MLS is run by a group of poor owners who don't have enough money to buy good players. The XFL is run by a single wealthy tycoon who has more money than God, but still can't buy good players.

Advantage: Pick em'

Well there you have it. Everything is so clear when you break things down rationally. But frankly, when these two fledgling leagues are involved, the American people are likely to let out a collective "who gives a [expletive]?" If you need a suggestion on your personal sports viewing choices when faced with the XFL-MLS dilemma, I have only two words for you: Classic Sports.

NBA playoffs in full swing

Each series is one game deep in the 2001 National Basketball Association playoffs and there are quite a few familiar trends.

For one, after another mediocre season, the Knicks are cruising and, of course, the West is as wild as ever. But what may be the most striking is that the Celtics aren't in the playoffs...but don't worry Boston die-hards, feel free to dwell on your dust-collecting 16 titles.

Okay, that's enough busting on the bitter Bostonians for now, let us instead concentrate on the task in front of us: this year's one-on-one tournament – I mean the playoffs.

Let's start in the Eastern Conference, where four real teams made the playoffs and four others were invited by default.

The Sixers were the first victims of a last second dagger from the accurate fingers of Reggie Miller. Allen Iverson did his best Spike Lee imitation after the game, as he waved his arms in the air calling for a foul but that routine works no better in The First Union Center than it does in the Garden.

So alas "the Answer" did not state his nickname in the form of a question and the Sixers are down 1-0.

Batting second are the surprising Bucks who are led by a trio of dangerous scorers. The Deer let Tracy McGrady drop his 33 points while the rest of Orlando was less than magical from the floor. You can never count out T-Mac and his magicians, even when a UConn alum is Milwaukee's best player.

Next up, we have the Heat, who were very lukewarm against the Bugs who buzzed Pat Riley's squad on their home floor.

MATTHEW F. SACCO

Riley has been in this situation before, so don't count out the Heat until his hair actually shifts out of place.

Rounding out the East first round is the four-five matchup between the Knicks and the Raptors.

Vince Carter could not have been less happy to draw New York in the first round. Vince-anity followed up a Vince-awful performance in last year's postseason with a Vince-unpleasant 5-for-22 performance in Game 1. Hopefully Air Canada won't go Vince-sane by the time this series is over.

Now we move due West to a conference that has eight real teams in the playoffs.

The Spurs didn't exactly handle the Timberwolves in a five-point game one decision. With such a close contest, the decision ended up hinging on which starting power forward had a College Diploma. Tim Duncan, game winning shot...huff said.

Another nail biter followed in the two-seven game between the Kings and Phoenix. The Sun Spots managed a win behind rock solid court general Jason Kidd, who was not so easily mesmerized by fellow one-guard Jason Williams' excessively hideous body art.

The Lakers did not provide the same excitement in their contest against the Blazers. Rasheed Wallace got another technical for being too ugly and the Lakers took advantage in a 106-93 win.

The Jazz ended up being a lot quicker than the Mavericks might have expected, especially considering four of the starting five were equipped with canes or walkers. Experience held suit, however, as Karl Malone's 26 points helped the senior citizens take care of their business.

So the NBA playoffs have been quite interesting so far, and we are only one game in. Just wait until the Knicks face the Heat, if not in the postseason than most certainly in the parking lot. Rumor has it Lennox Lewis is a Heat fan, not surprising considering the 1-0 hole they're in; they certainly know how to take a dive.

Softball seeks record 25th win

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

This afternoon, one of two teams in a bitter rivalry will experience the feeling of defeat for the first time in a long time. Sounds like the kind of stuff that makes the ESPN Sportcenter Showcase game.

Today, the 23rd ranked Massachusetts softball team (31-9, 15-0 A-10) takes it 24-game winning streak on the road to duel with their interstate rival, the Connecticut Huskies (22-18, 8-4 Big East) – a squad that is on a 14-game winning streak themselves.

If the Minutewomen are able to put an end to UConn's winning streak, that will mean that the 2001 Massachusetts softball squad will break the school-record for most consecutive victories.

Although the team is happy to have tied the record on Sunday when it defeated the Dayton Flyers 4-1 at the UMass Softball Complex, it is not focused on any numbers – it is focused instead on winning.

"We need to concentrate on getting the job done and winning games," said shortstop Emily Robustelli. "If we win and the record is broken it will be great, but the win itself is more important."

UMass gets a chance to break its record against one of its most hated rivals – how fitting is that? However, it will not be easy.

UConn is looking to rack up as many wins as possible as it is fighting to keep its record above .500 and make a trip to the Big East Championship tournament.

The Huskies have turned around a season that once looked dismal. With the help of their current 14-game winning streak, they have been able to turn an 8-18 record into a respectable 23-18 mark.

"They are always a great team," said Robustelli. "It's going to be an awesome game."

Senior Jessica Yanosy is the leader of this year's Husky squad. She is leading her team in batting average with a .347 mark and is UConn's most lethal weapon on the offensive and defensive sides. Her fielding percentage is an impressive .925 at the shortstop position.

Massachusetts' last look at this team was back in March when the two teams faced off at the Lady Seminole Invitational in Tallahassee, Fla. In that matchup of regional rivals, behind the stellar pitching of junior Kaila Holtz, UMass got the best of the Huskies – blanking them 3-0.

The Minutewomen just came off an impressive week where they pulled out important victories over last year's Ivy League Champions Harvard University and Atlantic 10 foes St. Joseph's and Dayton. With the sweep of the Flyers this past weekend, Massachusetts moved seven games ahead of Dayton in the A-10 standings.

The perfect 8-0 week was fueled by the sizzling play of the team's shortstop, Robustelli. In the three game set against Dayton, she went 5-for-10. For the week, she went 11-for-26, equaling an amazing .423 batting average with seven extra base hits.

"I just hit some better pitches," said Robustelli. "I got some nice hits in the alley."

For her efforts, the sophomore from Stamford, Conn. was rewarded with the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week honor.

"I am pretty happy with the way I played last week, but I really did not expect the award," said Robustelli.

The sophomore is currently ranked second on her team and third in the A-10 conference in batting average with a .323 mark. Today, she will get a chance to continue her excellent play in her home state.

With either a UMass or UConn win, somebody will go home feeling uneasy. Both teams have come close to forgetting how it feels to lose. It will be another great chapter in the historic UMass-UConn rivalry.

"We are both coming into the game with high confidence," said Robustelli. "We want to kill each other."

ring to the Owls' #4 seed.

"I think we won because we competed the best; I think any of the top three teams could have won," she added. "I also feel that since we beat GW last year and the year before, we held a psychological edge over them."

The road to success began long before the team arrived in New Jersey on Thursday. Through hard work throughout the whole year, especially in the weight room, the Minutewomen were able to arrive in the Garden State the most physically fit team in the grueling three-day affair.

"We put a lot more work than we needed to; we worked on footwork a lot more than the other teams in the Atlantic 10, so I feel we deserved to win," said Depontes.

Dixon echoed these sentiments, giving a special praise to assistant coach Jens Gerlach for his help. "He did a ton of work with the team in the weight room, and he deserves a lot of credit for this win."

The win also means the Maroon and White has secured a bid in the NCAA Tournament, which announces its brackets on May 3. Dixon expressed joy in just being able to participate in the tournament, let alone winning a match. However, she feels that her team has an actual chance to make an impact should the seedings work out.

"It depends where we go; if we play Florida, Stanford, or UCLA, we're in for it," she said. "But there are definitely teams we can beat.

"They feel very confident, and they'll be happy wherever they go," she continued. "If we win one round, I'll be thrilled."

The NCAA Tournament begins on May 12 with regionals at campus sites across the country.

That could be very harmful for the Minutemen as the defense, especially that of the infield, has struggled mightily as of late, committing 11 errors, eight by infielders, in four games over the weekend.

"I think our infielders are working really hard in practice," Gorneault said. "That stuff will clean up as the season goes on. They took extra ground balls today."

Bears can't swim: Water polo sinks Brown

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

The sun was out, the water was just right, and it was a good day to be a graduating senior on the Massachusetts women's water polo team last Wednesday afternoon. It was an even better day to be a certain junior captain, though.

Junior and tri-captain Megan Perry led the charge with three huge goals as UMass went on to drown Brown University (6-4) on Senior Day, the final home game of the season.

"I was just very lucky because my team was really good about getting people open," Perry said.

Perry's three goals came at the height of a UMass offense that seems to be doing everything in its power to get people open and aggressively attack the nets. "We're having to adjust to teams dropping on our hold sets," Perry explained. "That means we're having to drive and pass a lot more."

Perry said that her physical aggression comes along with her ability to contribute all around. "I'm a utility player," she said. "So I can do all sorts of things."

Perry may have stolen the spotlight for most of the game, but the custom of Senior Day still kept afloat. The tradition acknowledges graduating seniors for their contribution to the team both in and out of the pool. Senior Erin Hillier, a graduating Communications major, joined in the festivities, but kept focused on the final stretch of the season.

"Our goal this weekend is to show everyone on the East coast what we can do and prove what we're made of," Hillier said.

Hillier explained that the team is made of "hard work and perseverance."

Wednesday's win against Brown was the first of three in the past week. The second and third were part of a tournament that took place this past Saturday against Harvard and again over Brown. The three wins leave the Minutewomen in a very good position for this weekend's Eastern Championships in Providence, R.I. The team will start by taking on Indiana University Saturday afternoon.

"We feel it'll be a difficult game, but one we can definitely win," said Perry.

Perry continued, saying that if the Maroon and White is to win the contest, it will have to rely on imaginative tactics. "We're trying to create stuff on offense," she said. "That way we don't have to rely on our hold sets so much."

Senior Sarah Newell will join an All-American goalie to lead a defense poised for possible challengers.

Junior goalie Dana Sinkwich appears confident that the team is prepared for this weekend's tournament. "We're just fine tuning our skills," she said. "We just need to get passing and shooting down now. But we're really working more as a team and not just one person."

Sinkwich explained that everyone on the team has been taking more shots, leading to a more diverse distribution of goals, and mentioned that the defense has also been holding extremely well, and even if that hold is broken, the swimmers are prepared. "We usually start out with a strong front and everyone presses on me," she said. "If [the opponent] breaks the front, we just drop back."

The upcoming weekend will be a true test of skills for the team. Only by winning all of its games does it get invited to the inaugural NCAA championship tournament – a tournament that is no doubt the ultimate source of incentive and inspiration.

Shortly after police arrived, Camby's mother Janice was able to escape. Another sister, Mia, was reported to have escaped through a second-floor window with police assistance around the time Camby arrived.

A negotiator from the Capitol Region Emergency Services Team, a cooperative effort of local police departments, was allowed to enter the home around 9 a.m. The negotiator later left the home but remained in contact with the suspect by phone.

Police did not disclose any possible motives leading to the incident, but reported that the suspect was known to the family. They released no other details. Charges and Monica Camby's condition were not immediately available as of press time.

New York Knicks General Manager Scott Layden responded to the South Windsor incident while the team was at its practice facility in New York. Coach Jeff Van Gundy said the incident should not be trivialized, rather, "this is life and death."

"Right now basketball is not a high priority," teammate Glen Rice added. "Everybody's mind is strictly on Marcus."

Knicks' press agents did not discuss whether the incident may have any effect on the outcome of Thursday night's game against the Raptors, a best-of-five series in which the Knicks lead 1-0.

Camby, a Hartford native, purchased the home for $462,000 in 1998, the same year he turned professional after being the second player selected in that year's NBA draft. Drafted to the Toronto Raptors, Camby was traded to the New York Knicks two years later.

Camby has had a troubled history involving accepting improper gifts while playing for the University of Massachusetts in 1990s, that led to the National Collegiate Athletic Association stripping the university of its 1996 regional championship title. The association ordered the team to return the money it had earned by making it to the Final Four of the NCAA tournament.

In another instance, Camby was arrested by South Windsor police for marijuana possession in 1997 when the rental car he was driving turned up marijuana cigarettes.

The incident is still under investigation by the South Windsor police.

Attention
May 2001 Graduates:
If you are a member of the May 2001 graduating class who received a Federal Perkins Loans while enrolled at UMass you should have recently received a certified letter about those loans.
We know this is a very busy time for you so we've mailed this information rather than have you attend a meeting.
However, there are serious consequences if you fail to return these documents by 4/27/01 as instructed in our letter.
If you haven't received our letter but think that you should have or if you have any questions about what you did receive:

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 20-April 19) – Now is not the time to do things in a manner that could be misinterpreted. Be straightforward, direct and honest in all your dealings.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You know how best to promote yourself at this time, but it may be necessary to take a back seat temporarily. Wait your turn!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You may have to leave a certain part of your past behind today in order to embrace a new opportunity that has come up quite unexpectedly.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may not be as forthright and direct as you are wont to be, but later in the day, if the stars are correct and all is well, you'll have a good reason to get more directly involved.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You're going to have to be more direct and clear with others today in asking for what you want. Keeping things secret can only harm you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Don't waste your time today! Once you get started – as early as possible! – you'll want to keep moving continually until you reach your goal.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) –Even the most routine news can affect you in a profound manner today. It's all in the way you look at the world around you. Open your eyes!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Expect the unexpected today – at least during afternoon hours when your ability to second-guess those around you in at a low point.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Reconsider your current motives and you'll discover that something has been missing for some time. Today, you can fill in the blanks.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – This is a good day for you to conduct a test of your own emotions. You are likely to discover that you're ready to take that leap.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You may have to work harder today to understand both friends and family members. The fact is that you may be a little out of touch right now.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – One particular issue may demand a special forum today – and you are likely to be the one responsible for getting all parties together at once.

Tennis brings home title

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

They always say that the first championship is the hardest to get. The Chicago Bulls had won zero championships in their history before they grabbed six during the 1990s. Before last weekend, the Massachusetts women's tennis squad had not won a single Atlantic 10 crown.

But now that it has grabbed its first, and with a solid group of players that will only be getting better, the sky's the limit.

The Minutewomen were able to exorcise the demons of being championshipless since the team started up nine years ago when they knocked off George Washington 4-2 on Sunday. The Maroon and White was able to get through the conference tournament without playing Temple, considered to be one of the best tennis in the Atlantic 10 when completely healthy. However, nothing was going to stop UMass from capturing the crown after coasting through an undefeated regular season in conference play.

"It didn't really matter who we were going to play, whether it was Temple or George Washington," said freshman Jafra Deportes.

In the championship match, the Minutewomen took three of the singles matches, as freshman Francesca Mancini cruised to a 6-2, 6-1 victory. Deportes came out on top in a tough 7-6, 7-6 duel, and junior Lindsay Gillooly showed she deserved her recent honor as Atlantic 10 Player of the Week, clawing her way to a 6-4, 0-6, 6-4 win over her Colonial foe. The Maroon and White also took the doubles point as the teams of Gillooly/Deportes and Helena Horak/Susan Hyams outlasted their opposition. The team had expressed some nervousness going in, but was able to play through it.

"I think knowing that GW had beat Temple [in the semifinals], the team was a bit scared," said head coach Judy Dixon.

"I wasn't sure if we were going to beat GW going in, but once we won the doubles point I knew we were going to win," said Deportes.

To get to the championship match, UMass had to go through Xavier, but the Musketeers proved to be little challenge for this team of destiny, as the Maroon and White cruised to a 4-0 victory. Mancini, Horak, and junior Annie Hamilton all took care of their opponents all in straight sets. By taking the doubles point as well, the Minutewomen did not have to finish the rest of the singles matches as the victory had already been determined.

"I'm always prepared for the worst, but when I watched [Xavier] in the first round, I knew we were the better team," said Dixon.

In the first round on Friday, the Minutewomen were matched against Rhode Island, a team they previously played on April 11 at the Upper Boyden Courts. The Rams put up a fight against the home squad, but still came up on the losing end of a 4-3 match. This time around, UMass came ready to play as it destroyed its conference rival, 4-0. Singles victories were earned rather easily by Horak, Hyams, and Gillooly, and the Minutewomen torched the Rams in the doubles point as they coasted in the first match of the tournament.

While the Minutewomen doubtlessly had the talent to win the title, it took more than just their skill to come out on top. Dixon thinks a number of factors played a role in her team's run to the title.

"The first positive step was to be seeded where we were [second], so we didn't have to play Temple in the semis," said Dixon, refer-

Baseball looks to turn foes Crimson

Prestige. Respect. Tradition. Renown. These are all things that are associated with Harvard University.

Fortunately for the Massachusetts baseball team, baseball is one thing that does not appear on that list, as the Minutemen travel to Cambridge for a matchup with the Crimson today at 3 p.m.

"We're looking to gain some momentum back," senior captain Nick Gorneault said. "The games during the week are important for us so that we can gain momentum going into the weekend. It's a lot easier to play when you're playing well."

The Minutemen (14-14, 8-5 Atlantic 10) are coming off a devastating doubleheader loss to conference opponent URI this weekend. The Rams slammed the door on what was a six-game winning streak for the Maroon and White by defeating it soundly in both contests, 13-5 and 12-4.

"It's kind of strange because it's something that we didn't expect – that we would underestimate a team," Gorneault said. "It shows how little difference there is between two teams if you don't come out and play."

The Crimson (15-21, 10-6 Ivy League) has struggled in non-conference play, as it got out to a 3-11 start this season before getting back on track in Ivy League play.

Harvard's offense is led by junior third baseman Nick Carter, who paces the squad in nearly every offensive category. His .364 average, six homeruns and .598 slugging clip are far and away best among Crimson players. He is supported by shortstop Mark Mager, who has contributed a .314 average to go along with 27 RBI.

As a whole, the Harvard batsmen have struggled mightily, posting a minute .286 average, rather low for college squads. Additionally, they have only posted 19 homeruns in their 37 games.

The pitching has been a different story, as Crimson hurlers have held their opponents to a .267 average on the season, posting a 3.84 ERA on the year. Junior righthander Justin Nyweide leads the way, as he has compiled a 2.11 ERA to go along with his 2-4 record in his five starts this season. Sophomore southpaw Kenon Ronz has also shown strongly in his six starts, going 3-1 with a 2.59 ERA.

The Minuteman hurlers had an up-and-down weekend, as Craig Szado and Jesse Santos had formidable outings against Fordham, but starters Nick Skirkanick and Eric Chown combined for only five innings of work, giving up a remarkable 16 runs in their action. The staff ERA now stands at a staggering 6.18 for the year.

As for UMass' offense, it is hitting .315 on the season, with 25 long balls in just 28 games. Sophomore Jeff Altieri and Gorneault have led the way for the offense. Altieri has hit .363 this season with 32 RBI in his 28 games, good for best on the team. Gorneault is hitting a team-leading .374 with four homers and 21 RBI. However, Gorneault has been delegated mainly to designated hitter duties as an arm injury has kept him out of center field.

"I've been working hard," Gorneault said. "It's one of those things that you just have to take really slowly. I started throwing last week and it's getting better. I'd say I'm at 95 percent. It hasn't affected me at bat, though."

Another concerning injury is that of Sean Sarno, who suffered a concussion on Sunday and likely will not play

Camby's family escapes unscathed

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

A hostage standoff at the home of NBA player Marcus Camby, a former University of Massachusetts Minutemen basketball all-star, ended peacefully after Camby's mother and two sisters were held by a knife-wielding man for nearly eight hours.

The man, identified as 28-year-old Troy Cowan of Hartford, took the family hostage and demanded to speak to the 6-foot-11 center for the New York Knicks.

Minor injuries were reported to Camby's sister, Monica, who was being held with a knife to her throat during the standoff. Police reported that there were blood wounds on Monica Camby, but nothing serious or life-threatening.

Police responded to a 911 call at Camby's home around 3:30 a.m. yesterday morning, but were forced to withdraw, as demanded by the suspect.

Camby, who is in the midst of a first-round playoff series against the Toronto Raptors, was rushed down from New York. Camby arrived to the scene of the incident nearly four and a half hours after police arrived, and approached the home to show the suspect he was there, but did not enter the house to speak with him.

"Apparently, he felt satisfied with Marcus showing up and appearing in the driveway," said Sgt. Matthew Reed of the South Windsor Police department.

First win continues to elude crew team

By Katie Landers
Collegian Staff

"We haven't stuck our nose in front of a boat yet. We always come close but we can't seem to win one yet."

Those were the words of Massachusetts women's crew assistant coach Greg Kruczynski after another heart breaking loss for the first varsity boat at the Orchard Beach Lagoon last Saturday.

The Minutewomen have been frozen on the season for a road win and this weekend placed fourth in a four-team regatta facing up against Navy, Northeastern Columbia.

The Maroon and White, with a time of 6:46.4, fell five seconds behind the first boat, of Columbia, as it crossed the finish line. The team was without Sarah Pollman on Saturday, who was injured last week and was unable to row in the race. Pollman is a stroke for the team and is said to be the strongest rower in the boat.

"She's worth at least five seconds," Kruczynski said.

The Minutewomen have struggled since their opening race at the Jayhawk Invitational in Kansas, and have only been able to capture one top finish this year after dominating the Atlantic 10 in the 2000 season. The first place finish took place during the only home race of the season, when UMass played host to Boston College, Delaware and Connecticut.

The second varsity boat was sunshine for the day, pulling in another first place finish on the waters of Pelham, N.Y. The Minutewomen beat out Navy, who was their top competitor just two weeks ago at the George Washington Invitational. The second boat came out on top with a time of 6:51.6, in plenty of time to see Navy rowing behind.

"It was amazing to cross first and still see Navy rowing because they beat us last weekend and we beat them this weekend badly," coxswain Megan Mastropolo said.

The second boat has had a stellar season, with a first place finish at the only home race of the season and a third place finish at the GW Invitational.

"We're very happy with the J.V.'s performance. This was a turn around for them and a big win," Kruczynski said.

The varsity four boat also had a strong weekend with a top finish, beating out Columbia with a time of 8:06.1.

The Minutewomen will head down to Camden, N.J. this weekend as they look to defend their title as A-10 Champions. UMass women's crew has dominated the water of the conference for the past five seasons. Last season's team beat out George Washington, Rhode Island, St. Joseph's, Temple and Xavier to bring home the Verizon Cup.

Last spring, George Washington fell to the Minutewomen by nine points. This year's GW Invitational let the team face up against some of their toughest competitors.

GW, St. Joseph's and Rhode Island all placed ahead of UMass just two weekends ago. The Minutewomen are looking to regain strength and confidence as they head into the weekend.

"The team is ready to go," Kruczynski said.

The Minutewomen will head to Camden, NJ on Saturday for an all-day meet.

Assault and battery cases reported

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

An intense week for crime left the University of Massachusetts Police Department to deal with several incidents of assault and battery as well as a series of arrests.

There was a report of an incident of assault and battery on Wednesday April 18 in the vicinity of parking lot 25. A woman was walking away from her car at approximately 1:00 a.m. when she was approached by a driver looking for directions, explained UMPD spokesman Jim Lyons.

The suspect then attempted to give her a ride, and when she declined he punched her in the face. The assailant is described as a student-aged caucasian male with dark hair that is short of the sides. He was wearing a white baseball cap. The passenger in the vehicle described as resembling a white 80's model Ford Mustang was also a college-aged male who was wearing glasses.

Police were called to Moore Dormitory four times on Saturday night between the hours of 12 p.m. and 4 a.m. to break up a series of ongoing fights in the building. In one incident the police arrived to find ten males in the hallway fighting. One individual allegedly hit another individual over the head with a golf club. The injured party was taken to Health Services where he was treated and released while police arrested 20-year-old Sean Edwards of East Longmeadow on the charges of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon.

A resident of Moore Dormitory is also seeking charges of assault and battery in conjunction with one of the four incidents that took place that night.

A Domino's delivery person was robbed in Coolidge Dormitory when an individual attempted to steal a pizza.

"The suspect wrestled the driver to the ground from behind, punched him and attempted to steal a pizza," Lyons explained.

When the individual heard the police approaching he fled, disappearing through the Southwest living area. A floor-to-floor search of Coolidge Tower turned up nothing and the individual did not escape with the pizza.

Officers were called in to investigate a noise complaint in a suite in Brown Dormitory when they smelled a strong odor of marijuana emanating from the room. Police entered the open door and encountered the individuals.

"The officer saw a clear plastic baggie containing a green leafy substance," Lyons said.

A juvenile, age 16, was arrested for possession with intent to distribute both class C and D substances. These substances were determined to be mushrooms and marijuana. Matthew Quinn, 20, of Milton was also arrested for the same charges.

Arrests on similar charges occurred on Saturday when officers were called in to investigate an odor of marijuana coming from the basement of Cance Dormitory. People were observed sitting in the lounge area of the building, one of who was smoking what appeared to be marijuana, another had a bag of marijuana on his person.

Both Jeffery Salim, 19, of Norton and John Tripp, 21, of Westport Point were arrested for possession of a class D substance.

An individual reported that damage was done to his vehicle on John Adams Rd. when an individual jumped on top of the hood of his car. The driver exited the vehicle and was pushed by the suspect. The case is still open and under investigation.

Outside of James Dormitory on Saturday four women and a male were in a heated verbal argument. Several of the women are seeking complaints for assault and battery explaining that they had been physically assaulted.

The principle female party involved in the incident refused to speak to the police about the incident.

Connerly speaks on U admissions

COURTESY WORLD WIDE WEB

Ward Connerly was the latest in the Republican Club's series of controversial lectures.

By Mark Ramirez
Collegian Staff

While Ward Connerly's views on affirmative action have stirred up controversy, his visit to the University of Massachusetts yesterday was uneventful, especially compared to the reception David Horowitz received last April 4.

The fenced-off Student Union steps were devoid of protesters, and about 100 people were in the Student Union Ballroom to hear Connerly speak.

"I am not opposed to affirmative action," Connerly said. "I am opposed to race-based affirmative action." He believes that race-based affirmative action is both morally and constitutionally wrong.

Instead, Connerly, who is black, advocates a system of affirmative action based on income and class. He said that because of race-based affirmative action, "there is a presumption that minorities who [get into college] without affirmative action got in because of it."

"One of the greatest achievements of blacks has been bringing a sensitivity to the use of skin color in judging people," he said. "That moral strength is lost when we says it's okay to use it to our own benefit."

Connerly also suggested that universities improve outreach programs. Instead of reaching toward minorities in the ninth grade in the suburbs who are already on the college path, programs should be retailored to underperforming schools, closing the academic gap beginning in the first to third grades.

"Colleges and universities should work with the K-12 school system and not just set standards," Connerly said. "Race-based admissions are going to go. It's dying every day, and schools will be unprepared when the courts strike them down.

"We have to get government out of the business of classifying people according to race," Connerly said, as it has been historically used to discriminate against certain groups.

As a regent for the University of California, Connerly helped end the school's use of race as a basis for admission. He was also chairman of the California Civil Rights Initiative, which campaigned to pass Proposition 209, which outlaws race-based admissions. He is chairman of the American Civil Rights Institute.

Connerly's speech was followed by a question period. In response to a statement that blacks have been systematically disenfranchised and need to be empowered by affirmative action, he said, "You don't empower me by giving me something. I am empowered by taking something I have earned."

The event ended at 1:50 p.m., with less than 40 people in the room. Republican Club President Patrick DeCourcy wasn't too disappointed with the turnout. "It's a nice day outside," he explained, "and the University e-mail didn't go out until this morning.

Mullin lecture to focus on decline of mill town

By Suzanne Furst
Collegian Staff

In the "boom and bust" economy known to New England, the boom is felt in the region's mill towns. This subject was the focus of "The Once and Future New England Mill Town" given by John R. Mullin, professor of urban planning at the University of Massachusetts.

Mullin started out at UMass as an in-state student. He returned to teach in 1978, and he also later became Director of the Center of Economic Development. This author of two books is also the receiver of the distinguished outreach award and at the end of the lecture was honored with the Chancellor's Medal.

The speaker grew up in a Massachusetts mill town himself. He grew up in a highly competitive family and remembers their words. "You'd better be good."

His father once said, "John, you're headed for the mill." He didn't understand this until he actually did go to work at a mill. He recounted make $1.05 and thinking it was a lot of money. Then, one day he asked a man who had been working at the mill for thirty years how much he made. The man answered, "$1.10." After that, he got the point.

The lecture discussed how mill towns fit into our lives, the importance of them, and their future. Mullin reasoned that mill towns are culturally and economically important; they are special places. While they are grim, tired looking, and places of production (which are almost always dirty), they are lived in our collective history.

John R. Mullin continued to explain that it is in towns and cities such as Lowell and Hudson that the death and birth, the revitalization, can be seen. According to the UMass professor, mill towns are more honest to what people are than those manufactured by the elite.

Mullin mentioned that mill communities have never really been accepted, just tolerated. There are many precedents set for those feelings. For instance in Greek mythology, the god Vulcan, a divine smith, is a cripple and not allowed to live among the gods. Even in the bible it is written, quoted from the 23rd psalm, "The devil is a smelter."

The author Thoreau, famous for his warm works about nature, went cold when he described a mill town in Clinton, Massachusetts. His tone became harsh, straight, removed, and questioned the juxtaposition in industry.

It was pointed out in the lecture that the mill towns of New England are not growing as rapidly as the rest at the United States. Two factors that may be the cause is the increase in information flow and the leavening in investment other places. There is still and increase here, but more so in other places.

The assimilation of immigration is another ingredient of mill towns because its jobs are the first ones available to immigrants. It is reported and in our parent's lifetime they will hold one, two, or three jobs. However, the new generation is expected to change jobs between seven and thirteen times. Mullin claims there is no longer any loyalty; one will change for a dime.

The power of unions, which was crucial in creating things such as the New Deal, can be seen in mill towns. Also crucial are speed and movement and technology. Mullin insists that these towns be well respected; these places and communities help shape our communities.

Optional exchange programs in Cuba

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Correspondent

If you wanted to visit Cuba a few years ago, your best bet would have been to hop onto a large, two-dock ferryboat for a few bucks to Isla Cozumel, a small Mexican island in the Caribbean.

You could rent a small red Vespa and ride past the tiny shops dotted with palm trees and a silvery patch of beach. Plastic figurines of the bearded, army-uniformed Castro would gape a wide smile at you from street corners, luring you in to the tobacco stores, to buy imported cigars, forbidden to Americans. Then you could drive to the other side of Cozumel where, they say, one can almost see Cuba on clear days: a distant, elusive spot, a no-no land for anyone holding a U.S. passport.

That's the closest Americans could ever get to Cuba, but not anymore. Recent years opened the opportunity for undergraduates to visit the Caribbean island, and a few early programs had already sent thousands of college students from across the country to Cuba. This semester for the first time, one undergraduate student from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst is studying abroad on a semester program at the University of Havana.

"Clinton was responsive for opening [Cuba] up more for Americans to go there... as part of educational exchanges," said Christina Sosa, Coordinator for study abroad programs in Latin America and Spain.

The University of Massachusetts joined that effort when it signed a staff and faculty exchange agreement with the University of Havana several years ago. Since then, a few UMass professors have been to Cuba, and some Cuban professors came here.

As for undergraduate exchange, UMass doesn't have a direct exchange, but it can send students through other universities that have study abroad programs.

Although she hasn't heard from the student-on-exchange since he went to Havana, Christina knows what visiting Cuba might be like for students. "It's like stepping back to 1959. Surely, there has been a touch of the U.S. But they'll be shocked to see the lines for food... the lines for buses," she said.

American students must get special permission from the U.S. government to spend money there, due to the embargo.

Sosa, who was approached by about twenty students this semester about studying in Cuba, finds the rising interest from students exciting. "I live vicariously through them," said the coordinator, who is Cuban herself but hasn't been back since she was eight years old. "I would like more students to think about Latin America instead of Spain as a study abroad option. I would like them to see Cuba as it is now... a place standing still in time," she said. "I want them to hear the Cuban laughter, see the sun setting over clear blue water, smell the air, taste the fruits of the land and dance to its Afro-Cuban rhythms."

Sosa finds that the thought of studying in Cuba "appeals to the adventurous," as well as to many Political Science and Social Thought and Political Economy majors. In part, she attributes the interest to US policies. "It's a mystery. It's a place that has been forbidden to us for 40 years. Wouldn't you

Tickets are available at B-Side Records in Northampton, For the Record in Amherst, and all Strawberries stores.

EXHIBITIONS
UMASS – "Boxes and Walls: the Oppression Experiment," an interactive museum, will be in the Campus Center Room 174-176 on April 23-26. Tours of 7-9 will be leaving every half hour. The event will be open on Monday 4-6 pm, Tuesday 4-7 p.m., Wednesday 4-8 p.m., and Thursday 4-9 pm. For special needs or more information, contact rafuf@external.umass.edu, or call 549-1710.

UMASS – "Without," a BFA thesis exhibition by Sage Brosseau will be at the Hampden Gallery from May 6-11. Gallery hours are Monday-Thursday from noon to 6:00 p.m., and Sunday 2:00-5:00 p.m.

NORTHAMPTON – Ongoing exhibition "The Strongest of Bonds: William Allan Neilson, Internationalism and Exiles at Smith College" will run through June 30 in the third floor of Neilson Library at Smith College.

NORTHAMPTON – "The Refugees," two life-sized sculptures by artist Judith Peck, can be viewed through May 28 in the third floor of Neilson Library at Smith College.

This calendar, which previews local events of interest to under-represented groups on campus and in the community, runs on Wednesdays. Submit notices of events to Tanya Mannes, Diversity Editor, and Chanel Dubofsky, Assistant Diversity Editor. Standard entry forms are available in the Collegian office.

Peeping toms reported at gyms

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Both Totman and Boyden Gymnasiums have been a hotbed for activity in the past few weeks necessitating the attention of the University of Massachusetts Police Department on several occasions.

On Tuesday, April 17 in Totman there was a report of a suspicious person filed from a woman showering in the gymnasium.

According to Jim Lyons, the spokesman for the UMPD, the woman was taking a shower when she noticed a man in the shower area.

"As she was taking a shower she looked up and there was a man watching her," Lyons said.

When the woman confronted the individual he left the area following the verbal altercation, when the individual left the woman contacted the police department.

The suspect was a white male with short dark hair and a moustache that fell below the corners of his mouth. The individual was wearing a blue or teal colored shirt at the time of the incident. Nothing else is known about the individual.

Police were unable to find the suspect; they did an extensive search of the area but it did not reveal anyone matching the description of the suspect.

The investigation is still open and police are seeking new information and are continuing to do extensive interviews regarding the issue.

There have also been several incidents during the spring that relate to the theft of unsecured property in the gymnasiums. Many students who have left their property unattended have come back to find it missing.

An incident of larceny occurred on Wednesday April 18 in Boyden at approximately 6 p.m. in which a wallet was stolen from an unlocked locker. In two other unrelated incidents in the gymnasium other items were stolen.

Also on the April 18, there was a report of a suspicious person wandering around at nearly 3 p.m. in Boyden Gymnasium, police were called in to investigate the situation.

A coat with a passport and keys were stolen from an individual that had left the possessions unattended on the second floor men's bathroom in the building. Another incident occurred when a jacket left hanging in the basement had a cell phone stolen from the pocket.

Two incidents were recently reported in Totman Gymnasium during the past month. In the first both cash and credit cards were stolen from a pocketbook that was located in the office. A Sony Discman was stolen from an unlocked locker in the gym during the second incident of larceny. Police are still investigating all of the reported incidents.

Police urge all students to secure all of their personal belongings when using lockers in either gym and suggest that offices not be left unattended in the gym.

People loitering in the area of either gymnasium should be reported to the police immediately. The UMPD hopes that these measures will prevent incidents like this from occurring in the future.

'To Work' day Thursday

By Chanel Dubofsky
Collegian Staff

On Thursday, April 26, girls and young women will converge on the Mullins Center at UMass for the ninth annual Take Our Daughters to Work Day, an event begun by the Ms. Foundation for Women, and presented at UMass by the Faculty Senate Council on the Status on Women.

The motivation for Take Our Daughters to Work is to help girls maintain and develop their self-esteem, concentrating on their natural strengths rather than their appearance. This year, the theme of Take Our Daughters to Work is "Girl Force," promoting a focus on hopes and dreams, and nurturing talents that will encourage them to enter the work force with conviction and confidence.

The event will begin at 8:30 a.m. in the Mullins Center with a breakfast, followed by an Information Fair where various programs and departments at UMass will present themselves and where participants may sign up for a variety of activities to take place throughout the day.

At 10:00 a.m., Professor Stella Volpe will be speaking. Volpe is Assistant Professor of Nutrition and Director of the Center for Nutrition in Sports and Human Performance. She is a recent recipient of the University's Distinguished Teaching Award. Participants can also purchase tickets to a raffle for one dollar, the proceeds of which will go to fund Take Our Daughters to Work Day in the future.

Following the events in the Mullins Center, participants can take advantage of a wide variety of activities planned throughout the University. The College of Engineering will present "Build Your Own Bubble Machine," offering girls a glimpse of engineering principles and careers. The International Programs Office will be offering a "world tour," giving the group passports and visas, as well as a crash course in languages as they explore each country. In the W.E.B. Du Bois Library, girls can create their own books, using computers to assemble texts and pictures.

Professor Joyce Berkman of the Women's Studies Department will be opening her U.S. Women's History 1890-present course. In addition, girls will be able to add to a mural entitled "What I Will Contribute to this World" at the Everywoman's Center.

All UMass employees are encouraged to bring their daughters, nieces, cousins and sisters to this program, which celebrates women's accomplishments in the work place and the unfathomable potential of young girls. For more information and a schedule, visit www.umass.edu/eod.

"The lecture was good, civil. We'd rather have less people and more civility than more people and less civility."

Three UMass police officers kept an eye on the proceedings.

Connerly understood the relatively low turnout.

"It's a great day outside," he said. "I wouldn't be here myself." He said that it is often hard for him to speak on college campuses.

Usually, the students come with their minds made up," he said. In this case he says "the questions were excellent, the quality of discussion was excellent."

Connerly spoke at Amherst College in March of 1999.

"They didn't let me speak," he said. "Their social mores matched their qualities of discussion. They drowned me out."

According to DeCoursy, Connerly's speaking fee is $8,000-$9,000. The Republican Club paid $5,000, while the Young America's Foundation, a conservative organization, covered the rest.

want to go there?"

"There's a great difference in thinking between people of [the younger] generation [and mine]," she said. "My family left Cuba with five bucks and a suitcase." Sosa adds that the younger generation never lived through Fidel's revolution, and may not be as affected by political rivalry between the two countries.

But not everything is smooth for students who may want to go. Currently there are less than ten U.S. programs sending students to Cuba, and administrators on the island cancelled at least two of them at the last minute.

Barbara Burn, the associate provost of international programs, understands these difficulties. "The Cubans were signing things that they weren't politically ready to implement," she says. "I don't blame them for not being happy with the U.S. So I don't blame them for not being one hundred percent cooperative."

Also, Cuban authorities generally don't allow students to live with local families and keep them in relative isolation, which compromises their experience.

Burn is also not happy with the cost many Cuban study abroad programs charge. "I think it's too expensive. They charge too much money. If we can only send rich kids to Cuba, I'm not encouraging that."

Even with all the problems, the new opportunities students have in Cuba encourage both Burn and Sosa. For Sosa, opening up the border to student exchange may mean even more than a professional ambition. "It is still my home after 40 years in exile," she says. "I guess I want them to see my home."

Help our nurses
Their sanity, our lives

File this under 'Restating the obvious.'

It was reported in the Boston Globe today that a study has linked the number of nurses on call to the quality of care in a hospital. Evidently, when there are more nurses, people die less frequently and there are fewer preventable complications among the patients.

Is this a surprise?

Nurses are among the most essential trained workers in the United States today. They heal us, they help us, and they do it all with little or no appreciation. The job that they perform is one of the most stressful in the world. The hours can be terribly awful. The patients are demanding, justifiably, but that doesn't take away from the fact that simply human rudeness and inconsideration are in integral part of the nursing profession.

Still, with the cost-cutting ways of modern hospitals and the push to make the greatest profit from HMOs and other medical organizations, the nursing job has been scaled back relentlessly and unconscionably.

There aren't fewer sick people in America, by any means, but the amount of quality nursing care being provided to them has shrunk beyond acceptable standards. Nurses have to work nights, balancing the needs of too many patients at once, trying to keep everyone happy and healthy, and are simply stretched too thin. The demands and rigors of the job are immense for someone who is working within their means; for someone who simply has more to handle than they are capable of, it can become a nightmare.

It isn't simply the nurses themselves who suffer for this trend. Patients who need attention may be forced to wait for it, may receive substandard care from a nurse who is overworked or simply too distracted by too many things at once to deal correctly with a problem. It makes perfect sense, really.

Which is why this recent study by the Vanderbilt School of Nursing is so amusing. Do we really need an academic study to show us what is directly in front of our eyes?

Of course more nurses equals better care. Of course better care equals fewer fatalities and complications. The nurses can work better and maintain their personal sanity, and the patients can be more comfortable and have a better chance of a happy, healthy hospital stay.

The abuse of nurses has to stop. In the Globe story, it is mentioned that one option is to mandate a certain number of nurses at all times. This has its pros and cons (simply physically having more people working eases the burden and increases personal attention, but of course there is no way to mandate skill), but at least it is a step in the direction of giving nurses their due.

What price can we put in quality medical care? What price can we put on all our lives, since no one knows when they will be the next one in the emergency room? What price is there to let values professionals lead their lives with some sanity? No price is too high.

Its time to give our nations nurses some relief. For all of our sakes.

Back into the quagmire

Does anyone in Congress remember Vietnam? Do they realize how close that tiny country brought the colossus of the world to violent change? One would think that if the answers to these questions were yes, then they wouldn't make the same mistake twice, but it seems as if they are about to (or already have) done exactly that.

I am referring to the passing of the aid package to Colombia, known as Plan Colombia, which provides the violence-ridden country with $2.2 million per day (a total of $1.6 billion) and has done nothing to alleviate the hardships of life of the millions of peasants in that country. The program was developed by the Clinton administration and continued by Bush, whose grinning photo graces the wall of Commanding Gen. Gustavo Socha's office.

The ostentatious goal of the plan is to wipe out half of the 300,000 acres of the Colombian coca fields in five years. Of course, given the US government's own history of injecting into the inner cities the very drugs they spend countless taxpayer dollars a year combating, this sounds suspect.

Critics of the program hit the nail right on the head, just as the critics of Vietnam knew the war had nothing to do with combating the spread of Communism. As Marc Cooper of The Nation writes, "critics claim Plan Colombia is a blueprint for war. They argue that Colombia has a surplus of violence and warfare and that the last thing it needs is another military-based program, especially one that embroils the United States in armed conflict with Colombian guerrillas who have their strongholds in the coca-growing countryside."

Colombia's national human rights ombudsman, Eduardo Cifuentes, describes the situation in his country as "no less than a generalized humanitarian crisis." Indeed, the situation today may be the lowest point in a very long time, with unemployment approaching 20 percent, a devastating recession, and an environment where the rule of law has disappeared, replaced by rampaging violence.

Along with U.S. monetary aid comes the symbol of the Vietnam War – helicopters, to be used by the military in the fighting. Some are even flown by U.S. pilots. Many of the leaders of the Colombian military have been trained at the U.S. Army's "School of the Americas (SOA)," whose 60,000 graduates include such infamous names as "Manuel Noriega and Omar Torrijos of Panama, Leopoldo Galtieri and Roberto Viola of Argentina, Juan Velasco Alvarado of Peru, Guillermo Rodriguez of Ecuador, and Hugo Banzer Suarez of Bolivia."

SIMON PONGRATZ

Colombia, in its third year of a recession, is being crushed under the weight of violence. As David Bultrago, legal director of Pais Libre, states in The Nation, "Hardly anyone feels safe here anymore,' he says as he pulls out a sheet with the latest tallies. 'In ten years we have gone from 100 kidnappings a year to 3,700 during the year 2000.'" On a typical day in Bogota, the capital, 26 people are massacred and 10 disappear.

In the classic U.S. fashion of subverting legal, popular governments, the solution to this problem is to provide the country with enormous amounts of military aid that will be used to tie Colombia to the United States and to ensure control; and since the SOA trained recipients of that aid are no less than a generalized humanitarian crisis." Indeed, the situation today may be the lowest point in a very long time, with unemployment approaching 20 percent, a devastating recession, and an environment where the rule of law has disappeared, replaced by rampaging violence.

Along with U.S. monetary aid comes the symbol of the Vietnam War – helicopters, to be used by the military in the fighting. Some are even flown by U.S. pilots. 'In ten years we have gone from 100 kidnappings a year to 3,700 during the year 2000.'" On a typical day in Bogota, the capital, 26 people are massacred and 10 disappear.

In the classic U.S. fashion of subverting legal, popular governments, the solution to this problem is to provide the country with enormous amounts of military aid that will be used to tie Colombia to the United States and to ensure control; and since the SOA trained recipients of that aid commit the same crimes as their opposites in the cartels, the problems will only get worse.

That destination of the aid, as Cooper writes, is obvious when one visits Bogota. He points to the "gleaming and heavily fortified buildings that are, in effect, Colombia's Pentagon," and the "incestuous relationship between Washington and Colombia's military machine." These are juxtaposed against "the legendary Ciudad Bolivar, a sprawling and violent Casbah-like ghetto whose inhabitants boast that it's too dangerous even for the army to enter."

And when (not if) the Colombian military cannot win the conflict against the cartels, the United States will be forced to give more and more aid, and eventually 'advisers' will start showing up to instruct the military on how to fight. Soon they'll be taking part in the fighting, and the U.S. will sink faster and faster as it did in Vietnam.

There are a few reasons why the United States lost the Vietnam War. One was that, as the military historians say, an army always fights it's previous war: so in Vietnam and Korea, U.S. generals were still thinking about Blitzkrieg and tanks on the flatlands of Europe and North Africa. Despite a bitter war in Asia, the army seemed to have forgotten everything when fighting there began again.

Another was that the U.S. had never fought against that kind of a popular enemy, not even in Korea. Before Vietnam, battles had been fought in Napoleonic style, with the object of destroying the other guy's army. But as they say in Full Metal Jacket, there was never really a North Vietnamese army regular - only irregulars, or guerilla troops. These same problems plagued Cornwallis in America and the Soviet Union in Afghanistan.

Sadly, after Vietnam we did learn some lessons, but they were the wrong ones. Instead of asking ourselves why we got into Vietnam, and were we right in doing so, we have asked "what did we do wrong to lose the war?" For a long time war was taboo – and then came the test in Iraq, and what a success! The establishment found that we could fight and win a war, with a few small considerations, such as very few U.S. casualties. But the war in Iraq, despite the electronic weapons, looked strangely like 1942 in North Africa, with sweeping tank columns and decisive battles. In Colombia (as in Vietnam), that model doesn't work.

The United States cannot win a war in Colombia. If the trend works out along the same lines as Vietnam, we will find ourselves in the same situation – an impossible war abroad and increasing social unrest at home. But maybe, at least on the domestic side, that's a good thing. Given the tremendous amount of social progress in the 1960s, which since then has been slowed, stopped, and reversed, it might force us to take a good look at ourselves and realize the need for change.

LIFE IN HELL
©2000 BM MATT GROENING
YOU REMIND ME OF MY MOTHER.
SHE FELT NO JOY IN LIFE.
SHE WAS BITTER, BORED, DEPRESSED, AND RESENTFUL.
SHE DEFINED HERSELF BY WHAT SHE HATED: DOGS, CATS, NEIGHBORS, KIDS, AND FUN.
SHE HAD ZERO CURIOSITY ABOUT ANYTHING DEEP OR IMPORTANT.
SHE WAS UTTERLY SELFISH, HUMORLESS, AND MANIPULATIVE.
SHE TRIED TO SQUELCH THE HAPPINESS OF EVERYONE AROUND HER.
WHAT ARE YOU TRYING TO SAY?
WILL YOU MARRY ME?

C'mon, admit it. Saying "You are the weakest link" in a stupid British accent is kinda fun.

Yeah, I finally watched the show for the first time on Monday. And let me tell you – it sucks. I hate it just like I hate Millionaire and Survivor and everything else that a 35 year old, married office worker in Malden loves. Don't get me wrong, I watch some TV. There are three shows that, along with "Saved By the Bell," "The Simpsons", and "Seinfeld", are probably the greatest works of mankind since man created water. They are – and I won't argue about this:

- "The Iron Chef"
- "The Daily Show"
- MTV's "Undressed"

I could go on and on about these shows, but alas, that is for another column. But, since I don't have many of these puppies left to write before graduating next month (amen), I'd like to make my space here worthwhile, and talk about something substantial, and not just write fluffy, crappy stuff like I usually do.

Which is why today I'm writing about: "The Weakest Link."

The show may suck, but clearly NBC is on to something here. They have tapped into our cultural minds, and figured out a big, huge sociological secret: We all hate each other. We all want to see each other eliminated, "thrown off the island." I mean, in "Survivor," no one really cares who the winner is. But we really, really care who the losers are.

Brilliant, corporate broadcasting! Nice job. But, I think we can take it a step further. Why not apply this policy to one of our major Earth problems right now, one that is causing pollution, poverty, and congestion: Overpopulation.

Do you ever get that weird, guilty feeling? Like there are just too many people in the world, and most of them are dumb? That our national parks, museums, and forests are being destroyed simply because of the sheer number of people walking through them each day? That too many people like peanut butter? That the ^ key on the keyboard isn't really worthwhile?

So the only logical answer is to kill some people.

I know, I know, that would be murder and all, but it seems to be a pretty popular thing to get away with these days. And kind of like Shirley Jackson's timeless "The Lottery," "The Weakest Link" idea could be applied to some sort of yearly – or monthly – ritual, whereby someone is "voted off," and subsequently, nicely and politely, murdered.

Think about it: This idea isn't much different from other cultures' methods and means. In most every tribal culture that I learned about in Mr. Pickett's seventh grade social studies class, people were sacrificed to the gods in order to bring good luck, food, rain, and the ^ key on the keyboard.

So why not here, now?

I already know of several good candidates for people who should be nicely murdered.

The Sunderland PVTA bus driver who, even though the bus is clearly full, stops at another stop and then proceeds to actually get out of his seat, get off the bus, and tell people that "there's more space on the bus." Yes, Mr. PVTA boy, if the 45-year-old woman in front of me rams her ass into me a little bit more, then there is more space.

People who bring their cell phones to Fenway Park, and stand outside Fenway, trying to locate the group or person they're supposed to be with. In the huge mass of sheep that is Landsdowne Street before a big game, there is nothing more unintentionally funny and stupid that someone yelling into their cell phone, "Where are you?! I am at C gate! C gate! C! Where are you? No, where are you? Across from the clubs? Well wait then you are right behind me. No, right behind me. Look ahead. Look right ahead! There, do you see me? Do you see me? No idiot, to your left! Your other left!"

People who own cell phones in general. Wait, my mom has one.

Everyone who owns cell phones except my mom.

4. People who leave long, rambling, incoherent messages on my answering machine. "Hi, Bryan, this is ____, and I guess you aren't home right now, but it's 1:13, and I'm going to be in the shower until 1:18, and then going to CVS until 1:43, and then I'll try to stop by and – oh! Did you get the homework for class? That was ridiculous when (beep)...

Seriously, I'm not even making this up. Just give your frickin name and your number and I'll call you back. I mean, this isn't Oprah, mojambo.

HRTA class. The whole entire thing. I HATE it. HATE. This is the dumbest major and the dumbest class ever offered by this oh-so-prestigious University, and I don't even care if the professor reads this by now (clearly, he knows this whole column is sarcastic – and boy! Do I love hotels!)

Finally, my roommate, Gilbert T. Poopinsmopps. He never washes the dishes and he never takes out the trash. This isn't a hotel, mojambo.

Drug dealing government corporations

SAM WILKINSON

You know what's funny? The following conspiracy theory.

There was a table offering credit cards yesterday on campus. It was set up outside of MacInnes, the building that houses more anti-credit card professors than any other on campus. And the shirts they were offering, those were funny.

Instead of Pepsi, 'Sexsi?' Instead of Adidas, 'Addicted?' Stop, stop commercial America, you're killing me. Making clever references to marijuana under the guise of a corporation while offering credit cards? Holy Lord, now that's funny. Better add a 'Toca Bowl' instead of Taco Bell if they want me to sign up for the product though. I want fourteen or fifteen clever pot references on my person before I'd ever consider getting a credit card I couldn't pay for.

I'm appalled that I wasn't even offered a '4:20, 7-11!' The gall of these people.

That said, let's get realistic. All the drug references in the world won't change the fact that drugs are illegal with a capital I in this country and that isn't going to change. Legalize marijuana for the cancer kids and the dirty hippies that get all uptight when they're called that still won't be able to puff away. And why should those dreadlocked freaks be allowed to smoke marijuana? Because they want to? Because daddy bought them a Land Rover so they could drive down the Extravaganja? Because Phish isn't touring anymore? C'mon.

Don't give those people the right to make drug policy in this country; they'd give out handfuls of reefer to school-kids if they had a chance. Oh, but maybe that's too mean. Maybe that's too excessive. That's what my friend Mike tells me.

Instead, here's my counter-proposal. Want drugs to be legal, fine, but let's have the government dole them out. There are a lot of stupid people in this world and they happen to support drug reform. They also believe that socialism is a good thing. Something about getting high leads to aggressive belief in socialism apparently; obvious to me anyway, especially when I look at a Dick Cheney or a Dick Armey. Funny how many dicks are in the Republican party.

Anyway, want socialism and want to get high? Fine, the U.S. government can give out the drugs, the really good stuff, stuff that High Times magazine is always writing about. "Fourteen Different Nugs! The Right Black Light! The Right Pink Floyd cover by Phish!" Those were the High Times' headlines; they're going to have to add the following: "The Best Marijuana: Federal Style." That'd be a great thing.

If there's so much demand for drugs in the country, you know who could produce the highest quality? The U.S. Government. The Government can always make the best; they've got the best technology and realistically, what with the farm subsidy that's out there, why not pay a few farmers to grow a few millions pounds of ganja?

Then take that grass, that fine, fine wacky tobacey and by God, sell it to the people who want it and sell it cheap, but only as long as those users and abusers are willing to give a little more back to the big USA. Build us a road or dig us a ditch – want to get wicked high on Orchard Hill? – tie the 'locks together and get to shoveling on that sidewalk. If people want to use drugs to free themselves, let them. Think of the money we'd save on enforcement and jails and police and we'd get a ditch dug in the process! I'm telling you, this is the serious progress. It's something we can agree on. If people want drugs, let them have it as long as the rest of us get something back.

Government heroin?

State produced crack?

These are the brilliant ideas as long as we get something back.

But it's all part of a bigger plan. Let's recap pot smokers' beliefs.

Socialism? Good. Pot? Good. Corporations? Bad. Like Frankenstein approaching the village, the logical neurons aren't always firing, but let's see if I can finish this theory.

Currently, corporations control the government, owning our politicians what with the money, the donations of cash to candidates and those same candidates then turning political tricks for the corporations. That's the crux of the problem. Corporations are turning everything to mud.

So what I think I'm witnessing is the government beginning to start work on my proposed program. Credit card companies control the government and now they apparently support rampant drug use, hence the clever t-shirts available yesterday. Unbelievable huh?

Still not clear on what I'm saying? Corporate America clearly wants to see drug users enslaved; why else try to get them to reflect their position in society with silly t-shirts? Clearly, they've called out enough favors in Washington to put my proposal into action. They want to see drug users enslaved by the U.S. Government, hence they called out favors to put my proposal into action.

Why? Because corporations know that nobody's more accidentally pro-corporate than the hippies. They wear more Adidas, Birkenstock and Phish-wear than any other group in the United States. They aren't anti-corporate; they just say they are. And the only people that really know this? The professors in the building that people were offering drug t-shirts in front of.

Greatest part of all of this? I came up with this while I was high.

No wait. No I didn't. But it would have been funny if I did, huh?

Bringing your brain on vacation

Editor's note: although Spring Break was a month ago, this column deals with issues that transcend simple concepts like time. Plus I wrote it, and I'm the boss, so deal with it.

Spring Break is supposed to be a time for the utmost in relaxation, a period of letting go of your responsibilities and just drifting along in some tropical paradise somewhere. But to me, break is more like that old cartoon "Fat Albert." Sure, you'll have lots of fun. But if you're not careful, you just might learn something in the process.

ADAM WHITE

My journey consisted of a flight to San Diego, where my girlfriend and I rented a car with plans of driving down into Mexico. At first I was dismayed at the fact that our assigned chariot was a vomit-green Toyota Corolla with over 90,000 miles on it. What I didn't take into consideration was that Southern California and Mexico are two of the worst areas on the planet for auto theft, and that our fly-by-night rental agency would have held us solely responsible had our ride been ripped off.

No one gave the pea-soup mobile a second look.

Now I realize that we have more than a handful of Golden Staters at this school, so let me ask this now: what's the deal with Cali traffic? Around the major cities, highways with five lanes in each direction remain packed bumper-to-bumper basically all day and all night. I used to wonder what compelled motorists on the L.A. Freeway to shoot at each other; I now know.

Crossing the Mexican border gave us our first glimpse at customs regulations, or should I say the lack thereof. I expected us to at least be stopped and asked a few questions, but no. I drove right through. As a matter of fact, there wasn't even an attendant in the little booth to stop me. If you ever have a reason to smuggle anything into Mexico, by all means go for it. I'm talking guns, drugs, fireworks or even livestock. No one is going to ask any questions.

Must be a NAFTA thing.

Once we got below the abandoned cars and garbage heaps that comprise Tijuana, the rest of the Baja peninsula was heavenly. Scenic Route 1 winds along guardrail-free with a breathtaking view of the Pacific on one side and beautiful sheer red cliffs on the other. The few houses that exist are minimalistic in both scale and style, and even the denser "touristy" areas are nothing more than clatterings of restaurants and oceanside hotels.

That got me thinking: there is beautiful land above and below the border, yet the people in Cali are jammed in like sardines while their neighbors to the south enjoy vast expanses of seemingly premium real estate. So if you were some Southern Cal big shot, why not construct a sprawling estate south of the border and just commute? Yes, there is the whole residency thing, but from what I understand about Mexican politics that could be avoided with a few well-intentioned bribes. Commute time would be minimal, because the few cars on the road on Mexican highways are usually doing between 90 and 120 mph. (and, of course, there are no annoying customs delays).

A lot can be learned from the carefree existence of Baja*californians*, as the locals on the peninsula like to call themselves. A stop in the fishing community of Puerto Nuevo will teach you the right way to cook a lobster: split it down the middle, fry it lightly in spiced oil and then grill it. You can literally stick a fork into one end and pull all the meat out at once, leaving you with a "lobster steak" so delicious you'll never even consider boiling one again.

Rosarito Beach is like Baja's Daytona, in that it's the spot where your typical "breakers" will congregate for dancing and body shots of tequila. Leaving the rental's headlights on one night gave my companion and I a chance to interact with the local police department, an experience that again proved to be as enlightening as anything else.

Of course, no one in the station could understand a word I was saying. Once I was finally able to convey that we hadn't run anyone over but simply needed jumper cables, one sergeant actually apologized to me for not speaking better English. This just blew my mind; imagine a cop in the U.S. being sorry that he doesn't speak the native language of a visiting tourist.

After another surprisingly uneventful trip through customs we were back in Cali, and another somewhat reflective moment awaited us in Hollywood. We were compelled to see all the "classic" tourist spots and ended up in front of Mann's Chinese Theatre on Hollywood Boulevard, among the handprints and footprints of some of Tinseltown's greatest icons. I searched through the names and finally found the square belonging to John Wayne. I had always wondered what it would be like to stand in the footprints of the Duke, perhaps the toughest of the silver screen's tough guys. I had pictured massive prints left when Wayne crushed his cowboy boots into the wet cement.

Surprise! The Duke's feet were tiny. I mean little girl tiny. So much for the picture of masculinity.

Strolling back along the Walk of Fame, my companion and I were again supplied with a breath of reality. Amidst the snapping flashbulbs and bustling onlookers, a wreath of flowers on a wire stand stood atop one of the sidewalk's stars. It was in memory of animator William Hanna (of the renowned cartoon team Hannah Barbera) who had passed away the day before. I was struck by how out-of-place that wreath was, a movie poster for morality on a street literally paved with personalities larger than life.

I guess the point of all this is that when you go vacation, it's best not to just put your brain on cruise control and go into a state of mental vegetation. Who knows; for all your troubles you may come back with something more than just a photo album and inflated credit card bill.

The lack of interest

I'm a fairly laid back guy. Anyone who knows me can tell you that much. I'm fairly soft-spoken, subtly sarcastic and generally mild-mannered. That is, I'm not one to get easily excited – and sometimes, maybe that's a good thing.

However, I can get excited about certain things. I can get "fired up" as my colleagues down here say.

Ask me about Good Will Hunting, Katie Holmes, the Atlanta Braves or Arizona winning the tip in this year's NCAA title game and I'm sure you'll see me get fired up. Those are a few of the things that light a fire in my belly, so to speak. There are others, but I'll spare you the entire laundry list.

ADAM MARTIGNETTI

That said: this campus seems to lack the fire to get excited anymore, about anything. Having now offended 17,000 people, I guess I should defend my position.

Yesterday, Ward Connerly came to this University to speak. Brought here by the Republican Club, Connerly is fast becoming the leader of a conservative, anti affirmative action movement. Even more controversial – he, himself, is a minority.

Now, this is allegedly one of the most liberal college campuses in the country (with regard to UC Berkley). One of the hottest issues on this campus recently (and actually much further back than recently) has been the declining enrollment of Asian, Latino, African, Native American, Asian (ALANA) students. One of the reasons for this decline was Chancellor David K. Scott's decision to drop the University's affirmative action policy in light of legal decisions.

As early as 1998, Connerly was heavily protested at Amherst College, right down the street, and was basically prevented from speaking.

So, Connerly's speech should have been a hotbed for protest and political activity on campus, right? Wrong. It proved to be barely a blip on the radar screen. People didn't show up. They didn't seem to care.

How about David Horowitz earlier this semester? Now, I can understand if people didn't know who Connerly is, but Horowitz received more media attention –both nationally and locally – than anyone other than the president in quite some time. His advertisement against slave reparations for African Americans proved to be one of the more racially incendiary events (outside the Cincinnati riots) in recent memory.

Again, a perfect opportunity for people to express their political frustrations (if they even have anymore). And while there was some protest, it was fairly minor – basically a non-event.

Earlier this semester, the above-named concerns about declining ALANA enrollment led to a brief student march to Whitmore – what was termed "a takeover" at the time of the incident. And finally, I thought "Ah ha! People do care." A few hours later the people dispersed – seemingly placated by University response of lack thereof – leaving only memories of the Goodell takeover in their wake. (Check Collegian archives for the full story on that takeover, which embodied that term in every sense of the word). For what it's worth, the Goodell takeover was before my time here, so I never got to see the frenzy of political fervor that it was.

Where does that leave me? Wandering around campus aimlessly, wondering what people do care about.

The Student Government Association got itself into a pretty bad predicament last semester, and earlier this semester. However, I certainly don't expect people to care about that. Frankly, their politicking really isn't that interesting.

Want me to step outside the political realm? Earlier this semester, UMass basketball sold out its game against Temple. That was the first time since the Jayhawks of Kansas came to Western Massachusetts two years ago for a game. In turn, that was probably the first Mullins Center sellout since the Minutemen's Final Four season. Granted the decline in the quality of the basketball team has been a factor in decreasing attendance, but that doesn't mean people shouldn't care anymore. Are we fair-weather fans? New Mexico sells out all their home basketball games.

Okay, maybe that's a bad example because the team was not playing up to people's expectations. However, I spent a greater part of the 1998 football season watching a National Championship football team playing in front of half-filled home stadiums. People didn't seem to care.

Well, the next season people must have showed up, you're saying to yourself. After all, the football team were National Champions. What school would not support a National Championship team which, actually did make a decent run the following year!? What school would not show up to its home games? Well ours apparently. The season following a National Championship run, football attendance did not really improve significantly. People didn't seem to care.

I've seen more emotion and more passion on intramural soccer fields than I've seen among the student body since I came here. And I guess, in a way, I feel slightly cheated. When I graduate, I won't be able to say that students took over Goodell while I was here. Five years from now, I may not even remember who David Horowitz is.

I'm not advocating that students go out and takeover a building, just to show that they do care. No. Misplaced emotion can be just as bad, and as depressing, as no emotion whatsoever. I'm not saying that every student must attend each sporting event on campus. I realize that basketball or football or lacrosse or water polo may not appeal to some people. I'm not saying that everyone should get "fired up" about Arizona winning the tip of the NCAA basketball championship game. I'm just wondering where the emotion is.

Semisonic, Placebo play to different tastes

By Esteban Argüello
Collegian Staff

Semisonic
All About Chemistry
MCA

Placebo
Black Market Music
Virgin

Semisonic and Placebo have both launched their third albums, All About Chemistry and Black Market Music, respectively. They've also had previous hit singles that have propelled them into semi-mainstream rock. Critics and fans alike are expecting a lot from these albums. Placebo has a bigger fan base in England, which includes the likes of David Bowie, who asked them to perform at his 50th birthday party, thus having more support with the new album. Semisonic on the other hand is under pressure to follow up with another hit like "Closing Time" off of Feeling Strangely Fine. Placebo's previous hit "Pure Morning" chimes "a friend in need is a friend indeed/ but a friend with weed is better") off of Without You I'm Nothing is their only song to get radio play. Will each band follow their previous success with another hit or will they be labeled as one-hit wonders in the US?

Semisonic's slow melodies and soft music will give them the edge over Placebo in radio play. They also have a lighter and often poppier sound, especially the title song, "All About Chemistry." With its rhythmic piano chords, and simple drum beats that everyone can tap to, the song is likely to get lots of radio play. It has a lulling bridge that reminds you of a Beach Boys' song, and a chorus that's as catchy as a Beatles's tune. Their songs even have some machine beats, as shown in the song "She's Got My Number" and "Bed," that keeps them up with the current trend in pop music.

Placebo's music goes in the other direction. Their guitars are thrashed and the voice is dry and low. It's a good blend of grunge and alternative. Songs like "Taste In Men," "Every Me Every You," "Slackerdelphia," and "Black-eyed" also have a hint of psychedelic, as the songs get monotonous, dropping into a low rhythm. Like Semisonic, they can carry a good chorus with plenty of harmonics, but often prefer to go with short rhythmic grunge that often follows the same chord progression as the verse. Both bands also have the use of a synthesizer, but Placebo uses it to set a base tone in the background, unlike Semisonic, who uses it to carry a melody. The title Black Market Music fits the Placebo sound perfectly; it's underground, organized and mysterious.

Unfortunately, Placebo's music is often set aside by the focus on the lyrics. Songs like "Slave To The Wage," "Commercial For Levi," and "Blue American" carry serious messages. "Slave To The Wage" has literary references to Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath and musical allusions to Maggie's farm from Dylan's song "Maggie's Farm." In the Nirvana-ish song "Hemoglobin," the lyrics are very poetic and similar to those of Kurt Cobain: "I was hanging from a tree/ unaccustomed to such violence/ Jesus looking down on me/ I was prepared for one big silence." The lyrics offer a wide range in topic from love to religion to social injustice.

In contrast to Placebo's political and resourceful lyrics, Semisonic's lyrics become very personal and self-centered. Every song in All About Chemistry is about a love relationship. Frankly, few, if any, of the relationships that Semisonic sings about have a happy ending. The lead singer is stated to have mentioned that All About Chemistry is much more mysterious and secretive about the lyrics but the message is very blunt; he can't keep a girl. It's quite depressing after a while and one has to wonder why he can't keep a happy relationship. To others that might suffer from his same condition, he offers this advice in "Get a Grip": "well don't be blue/ cause there's no one to play with you/ Get a grip on your self" (wink, wink, phallic symbol). "I've got a grip on myself and it feels nice" At least he knows what to do when the girls leave him.

Both albums clearly have different goals. Semisonic is pushing for mainstream acceptance and therefore deals with very pop topics such as love and presents it in the appropriate manner. Placebo, on the other hand, makes no clear push to dominate the US charts. They are comfortable with their success in England and hence have the liberty to deal with more complex issues, and present it in a harsher way, not toned down for the radio. This is evident by the covers and album art alone. All About Chemistry has a white, attractive cover, and very pop art interior, with elaborate photographs of sexual innuendoes involving test tubes, all presented in a very fresh, sleek design. Black Market Music has a dark cover with a close-up of a beat up interior of a music box. It's a very simple, provocative design, as opposed to Semisonic's cover which tries hard to be provocative but comes out obvious.

Placebo's Black Market Music is an album to really get into and think about. Semisonic's All About Chemistry is an album to enjoy, and play when you're having difficulties with that special someone. I'm sure All About Chemistry will enjoy plenty of radio success as it has all the right ingredients to make it into today's pop-filled mainstream market. I'm also sure that Placebo will keeps its loyal fan base and keep many people on their toes with their music. Each album will succeed in its own way, as each has its own pros and attractive qualities that make it a stand out in their appropriate genre.

The boys from Semisonic try for another hit.

Cure your springtime boredom blues
With this week's top ten fun time fillers

by maggie lyons

This week's Top Ten: Power Hour

Sorry, I don't give out instructions to drinking games in this column. But I do have a little somin' somin' for you to do in your "other" spare time. Ten things you can do with a free hour. Ten things you can do other than watch Jerry Springer on a sunny afternoon. Ten things you can do to get away from your roommate, or to get closer to your roommate. Ten things you can do that will cheer you up when school just won't let up. It's not summer yet, but by taking an hour a day to do something in the spirit of summer (and your childhood), I swear it will come faster. Drum roll, please...and here they are.

10. Chill Out – One good way to get a taste of summer is to make iced tea or lemonade...from scratch. As always when we are cooking we want to put on some good tunes - loud enough for your neighbors to hear. It's really essential to the activity. If you are making tea, boil the desired amount of water – 5 or 6 cups. Then let 5 or 6 tea bags soak in the water. Chill the tea for about a half-hour, add some fresh sprigs of mint or a few squirts of lemon juice, pour over ice – and sit on the porch and enjoy. For lemonade, squeeze about ten lemons over a juicer, making sure to pick out the seeds. Add one or two cups of cold water and a few teaspoons of sugar. Garnish with slices of lemon and serve over ice. Enjoy your glass of lemonade outside – not while watching TRL.

9. Be a Porch Monkey – in style. Everyone loves to sit on their porch and watch the cars drive by – but if you are going to spend an hour sitting on display, why not look good? Whatever porch furniture you have - folding chairs, wicker chairs, metal rockers or a swing – jazz it up a bit. It's easy, it's fun and it's something to do outside on a sunny day. Run out to the hardware store and pick up some spray paint in bright colors, one color for each piece of furniture. Then drag your furnishings out on the lawn, on some newspaper – or not if you don't mind having red or blue grass. Now get spraying – and make sure to cover all over. If there is rain in the forecast, pick up a spray-able waterproof protectant for outdoor furniture. Wait for the paint to dry before you sit down, please.

8. Don't Throw That Out – We all know you have a shoebox that you brought from home filled with report cards, baseball tickets, concert stubs, valentines, notes from math class and more. Instead of letting that priceless dirt on you go unseen and proceed to collect dust, turn it into a work of art suitable for your coffee table. Make a scrapbook. They sell blank books perfect for crafting a scrapbook in the UStore. Make sure you pick up all of the necessities – glue stick, photo corners, colorful paper and scissors, and then also get anything you think will make your book reflect your creativity (stickers, stamps, applique letters, pressed flowers or leaves, etc). Then take an hour a night for the next week to carefully create pages in your book. Not only did you clean out your desk drawers and old shoebox – but also you have something to show for it. Well done.

7. Chalk your Walk – Remember the days when sidewalk chalk came in your Easter Basket? And whoever could make the coolest rainbow or monster was boss of the block? Well those days don't have to be over. Spend an hour with your friends drawing with chalk on your sidewalk, or dormitory steps. Make a hopscotch board for old time's sake – not like we actually know how to play that game anyway. Play a couple rounds of tic tac toe, or draw yourselves right onto the pavement. When you're done you'll have plenty to laugh about.

6. Fishing for Compliments – Take your new crush out to Puffer's Pond with your fishing gear. It's okay if your fishing gear consists of a piece of string, a safety pin and a bag of Doritos – which is what mine is, and it still catches minnows at least. While sitting on the bank throwing out lines, maybe someone will take advantage of a romantic moment and throw one your way. Wink, wink.

5. Sign Up – Sign yourself up for a new physical activity. Like shortstop in a game of wiffle ball, or leading man in a chain of rollerblading, or perhaps, flamenco partner in a dance class. Getting out and trying something new is an easy way to gain self-confidence and independence, not to mention a lot of fun.

4. Wash the Ride – I am sure it has been a while since your car has had a bath. I know I neglect my vehicle over the winter. Washing your car, while very productive, can also be a lot of fun. It's a good way to spend time outside and cool down on a warm day. Plus you look a lot cooler driving around shining on a sunny day than you do in a ride dressed in dirt.

3. Get a Bird's Eye View – Take a trip to the park or to your front yard and climb a tree. I know I haven't barefooted it up a tree in a long time, at least not since my last 10th birthday. Pick a sunny day and shady tree and sit in it for an hour. You'll be surprised at all the action you will catch, and all the people you will catch when they think no one is looking. It's a good way to bring out the child in you, and to get a good laugh.

2. Or... - Just sit under a tree and write in your journal or draw a picture. This is also a good way to spend some relaxing time outside, without risking a sprained ankle.

1. Game On- Play a good game of Scrabble or Boggle. These may sound like games you play at your grandmother's house, but try putting a twist on it. Dirty Scrabble – or Naughty Boggle...always good for a laugh and some brainpower.

Time well spent is priceless - especially on a nice day. Television can only do so much for you before it starts to drive you nuts. The same goes for schoolwork. So get out and do something.

Knopfler Still Rocks

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Mark Knopfler
Orpheum Theater
April 23

In a white button down shirt, blue jeans and boots, Mark Knopfler's getting older. The guitar-picking former lead singer of Dire Straits doesn't wear the headband from the "Money for Nothing" video anymore. He's edited his bitter cynicism of one hit wonders from the same song. No more giant stadiums in Europe. No more Dire Straits.

But Knopfler can still play the guitar.

The one thing that was always at the base of the experimentally rocking Dire Straits was the pure musicianship of the band and especially its lead singer. Some publications have called him one of the top five guitarists in the world and of them, he certainly must be the least appreciated. But with at least seven different guitars slung over his shoulder at various times during Monday's Orpheum performance, including a Nashville steel guitar that reflected a spotlight into the audience and around the decrepit theater, Knopfler showed why he should be considered in that top flight.

Quickly shifting his style of play depending on the guitar at his waist, Knopfler pounded through a set that lasted almost two and a half hours. Plucking in country or playing in rock, sampling Scottish or strumming Spanish, Knopfler's range was unbelievable. The comparisons of his work in Dire Straits to Eric Clapton lose none of their luster when he plays solo. Backed by six other musicians, Knopfler's diverse set – he played Straits favorites and his own, newer work – the quality of the musicianship was not to be denied.

This despite early technical difficulties that plague the start of any continental tour one would presume. Rather than complaining or making a scene, Knopfler's blue-collar professionalism was a refreshing change and microphones that cut out at times were shrugged off with a laugh. Starting with "Calling Elvis" off the last Straits release, Knopfler started to a standing ovation, the first of many during the night. During his opener, and its followup "Walk of Life," Knopfler ran into the most serious of his technical difficulties before the problems were seemingly fixed. There were transformer problems later in the night, but they didn't stop the show. Of course, for a performer who's done tours that finished with staggering numbers of over four million played to, a simply transformer problem probably wouldn't be enough to stop the show.

After the expected blistering introduction was cut short by the technical difficulties, Knopfler started to seriously play, showing off on "What It Is," the first single from his most recent album, the well-received Sailing to Philadelphia. Switching between the traditional Scottish ballad "Wild Mountain Heather" and the single itself, Knopfler's play was flawless. And as if the playing wasn't doing for the crowd, why not a guest appearance by the most respected musician who lives on Cape Cod?

James Taylor appeared for a performance of "Sailing to Philadelphia" which, while not being that great, brought down the house because of its performers. An extended standing ovation greeted Taylor and a second one bid him adieu, but he only said goodbye after performing "Raised up Family," another collaboration between Taylor and the DS front man. Taylor's voice was impressive; Knopfler's guitar work sent him back to the Cape. If Taylor's guitar was plugged in, it certainly didn't matter, as he only needed his voice next to the shorter Knopfler.

With guest appearances done, Knopfler slowed the show down. "Romeo and Juliet" shook the room with its subtlety and couples affectionately came together for the performance. "Sultans of Swing" was next in the night's only performance that came up seriously short; either the sound was off or the song itself is just too good on an album to recreate live. Either way, it didn't have the same dripping southern honesty that the original does.

For a finale, Knopfler busted out "Telegraph Road," a thirteen-minute song that might have been longer in performance. It's a tour-de-force of lyrical storytelling and guitar mastery, an angry retort to Thatcher's politics of the 1980's. The crowd was awed – it was a masterful performance – and Knopfler was rewarded with an extended ovation.

The lights went down, the crowd kept cheering and, English gentleman that he seemed to be, Knopfler reappeared for an encore that included a soulful "Brothers in Arms" to close the show and an almost regretful "So Far Away." However, with a strange introduction and a censored lyrical middle, Knopfler's performance of "Money for Nothing," was a show stealer. The strange introduction was a misdirection for the audience – for the first minute, everybody picked their brains for what the song was – before recognizing the song lyrically. But then, the lyrics were different. A middle part of "Money for Nothing" (one where Knopfler had previously railed against one-hit wonders, calling them faggots) had been excised. While he certainly must still have some of his anger for those bands (who he never thought worked as hard as he and other performers of his ilk did), that anger has clearly dissipated.

Like an athlete welcomed back by a hometown team, Knopfler's performance was as emotional as it was proficient. With a flurry of picks and plucks of his guitar, and his raspy voice just audible enough, Knopfler brought down a house that seemed ready for just such an event. He might not be as big as he once was (105 million in album sales and yet playing at the Orpheum), but professionally, Knopfler's still absolutely huge.

Broadway's best, this year's newest releases

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

'Tis' the season once again that Broadway prepares for its biggest night, The Antoinette Perry Awards (a.k.a., The Tony's). While the nominations for the prestigious event will not be announced until May 7th, below is a run-down of this humble reporter's favorite CD's of the past year.

Seussical: The Musical
Music by Stephen Flaherty
Lyrics by Lynn Ahrens

From the composer and lyricist of the Broadway bonanza Ragtime and the cult-classic Once On This Island, Seussical is an example of how this pair is today's Rodgers and Hammerstein, being successful in anything from serious drama to lighthearted comedy.

Every song in the show is memorable, from the opening number "Oh, the Things You Can Think!" to the touching duet "Alone In the Universe" and the catchiness of the ragtime ditty "How Lucky You Are!" It's clear just how brilliantly conceived the songs are when you consider that they Ahrens perfectly captures Dr. Seuss's bouncy and nonsensical creativity while at the same time conveying extreme heart.

Seussical is such an appealing musical because of its talented cast, like Jeanine LaDuke (Mayzie the Bird) who sings one of the big show-stopper's, "All for You." The highlight of the show, though, is The Cat In The Hat, played by David Shire, whose contract unfortunately expires just prior to the Tony Awards. His stage presence can be felt through the recording though, in all the songs that he sings.

Jane Eyre: The Musical
Music and lyrics by Paul Gordon

Providing a perfect example of smooth transitions from one form of entertainment to another, Jane Eyre leaps from the page to the stage in a show that was heavily lambasted by critics before it opened on Broadway. How foolish they must feel now.

For his first major foray into musical theatre, composer Gordon weaves a brilliant tapestry of colorful melodies while maintaining the haunting love story. Some may be reminded of Les Miserables, a show that started a trend to dive back into classic literature and bring modern tragedy to the stage. The powerful operatic vocal abilities of the cast blend effortlessly with Gordon's sweeping orchestrations.

Among the songs that will leave you humming long after listening, one is "Secret Soul," sung by the story's heroine and the leading man, Mr. Rochester. A fan of the theatre, such as myself, may develop goosebumps as the song swells to great levels. It leaves you wanting more, and that's exactly what you get in the show's finale, "Brave Enough for Love." Throughout the show, traces of this melody are heard, finally amounting to its full form at the show's end. It brings the show full circle, bringing the epic to a close that leaves a lasting impression.

The Witches of Eastwick: The Musical
Music and lyrics by Dana Rowe and John Dempsey

Playing exclusively in London, and therefore most likely not eligible for this year's award ceremony, The Witches of Eastwick is nonetheless one of the best CD's of the year for musical theatre.

Based on the movie of the same name, the music adds just as much kick to it as Jack Nicholson did to the original format. Songs like "Dance with the Devil" and "I Love A Little Town" rock from start to finish, while "Evil" and "I Wish I May" are sly and glib just like the storyline itself.

While this CD may be hard to get your hands on, and seeing the show even harder, it is a quintessential addition to any theatre lover's catalogue.

The Music Man
Music and lyrics by Meredith Wilson

No list would be complete without a revival recording, and this recent one is tops. Craig Bierko brings a younger touch to Professor Harold Hill, originally made famous by Rex Harrison. The music is also brought up-to-date, making it more accessible to audiences who are perhaps unfamiliar with the show, while still being endearing to its devoted fans.

The new revival's recording.

"Ya Got Trouble" is now a larger production number than originally, slightly resembling the show-stopper "76 Trombones." The show never lets you down, even in its ballads like "Goodnight, My Someone." Bierko is suave and charming, adding new dimensions to the show.

Bierko departs the show mid-May, at which point "Will & Grace" star Eric McCormack will take over the role.

The Producers
Music and lyrics by Mel Brooks

Why didn't this idea occur to anyone before? Stage a musical based on a movie about a musical? With Mel Brooks behind the wheel, The Producers is what Broadway has long been looking for, a return to musical comedies.

Nathan Lane and Matthew Broderick fill the Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder roles, respectively, with great class. It's a treat to see Lane back on stage and not making duds of movies and TV shows as was custom in recent years. Lane reels us in with "The King of Broadway," and Broderick does just the same on "I Wanna Be A Producer." Brooks' clever and amusing music abilities, which were somewhat seen in the movie Robin Hood: Men In Tights, is what gives this show its kick, and if you need proof, turn to the song "Keep It Gay" about how the best musicals are effeminate. Only Brooks, with the company of talents like Lane and Broderick, can pull such an offensively funny and endearing show.

The Full Monty: The Musical
Music by David Yazbek
Lyrics by Terrence McNally

After the crippling devastation that was Big: The Musical and the lukewarm response to Footloose: The Musical, who in their right minds would ever begin to think that The Full Monty: The Musical would take over Broadway? It's not as though a show about male strippers is all the rage (although there is the off-Broadway musical Naked Boys Singing), but instead the flavor it was given by Yazbek and McNally might have helped propel it to its now famous status.

Just consider some of the song titles; "Big Ass Rock," "Big Black Man," and "Michael Jordan's Ball." Sure, Grandma may not be as crazy about it as she is about Anything Goes!, but not since the worldwide phenomenon Rent has a show really related to modern audiences. These songs all leave you laughing, while at the same time moved by their simple honesty.

Much like the film version, the staged musical displays the male sensitivity too, such as the tune "You Rule My World." The Full Monty is a rollicking good time, proving that screen-to-stage is possible to do well.

Tune in May 7th to hear which of these will be up for a 2000 Tony Award.

McGraw album
Another great play

By Brooke Adair Abernethy
The Lantern (Ohio State U.)

(U-WIRE) COLUMBUS, Ohio - Country megastar Tim McGraw has been consistently amazing the country music industry with his incredible voice and top-notch performing skills since his debut in 1993. Albums such as "Not A Moment Too Soon," Everywhere" and "A Place In The Sun" were all certified multi-platinum in record sales and garnered such accolades as the Country Music Association "Album of the Year" and the Academy of Country Music "Album of the Year."

Though not a songwriter in his own right, McGraw has the innate ability to choose songs that showcase his voice. McGraw has 15 No. 1 hits under his belt and the first single from his new album shot straight to the top 10 within a month of its release. "Grown Men Don't Cry" is the fastest-rising single of his career and is now sitting pretty at No. 7 on Billboard's Top Country Singles Chart.

"Grown Men Don't Cry" seems to set the pace for the other 13 tracks that make up "Set This Circus Down." Gone are the years of "Indian Outlaw" and "I Like It, I Love It." McGraw has definitely mellowed since marrying fellow country superstar Faith Hill and settling down into the role of family man. Like his persona, his music has come full circle from a sexy bachelor with high-energy tunes to a more low-key artist with one of the most revered marriages in the business.

The album includes the history-making single "Things Change." McGraw debuted the track at last year's Country Music Association Awards and Napster uploaded the live recording from which radio stations all over the country downloaded the song. "Things Change" became the first single ever to fly up the charts not only as an unreleased single, but as a Napster-to-radio hit.

McGraw stays up-tempo only three times on his current musical endeavor. "Telluride," "Unbroken" and "Smilin'" are all upbeat, featuring excellent electric and steel guitar with a bit of fiddle thrown into the mix. All three are definite crowd-pleasers, reminiscent of such McGraw classics as "Something Like That" and "Down on the Farm."

The Latin-influenced sexy tune "Let Me Love You" will be no stranger to fans. McGraw and Hill performed the song on their Soul 2 Soul Tour. On the album, McGraw makes it all his own and the guitar parts give his band, the Dancehall Doctors, a chance to prove their prowess as consummate musicians.

While it's no secret that McGraw excels at fast-paced tunes and electric live performing, where he shines most on his new album are the ballads. Another Soul 2 Soul favorite, "Angry All the Time," reunites McGraw with his lifelong duet partner, Hill, providing a little back-up. The song is a lyrically-poignant look into the difficulties of relationships and their harmonies are nothing short of musical genius.

"Take Me Away From Here," "You Get Used To Somebody" and "Why We Said Good-bye" can be easily compared to McGraw's early hits with "She Can't Be Really Gone" and "Please Remember Me." The songs flow so easily, slipping the listener into a cocoon of gentle contemplation and memories.

"Set This Circus Down" has all the ingredients to surpass McGraw's perhaps best-loved album "Everywhere." His songs are classic McGraw, evoking a plethora of emotions ranging from braving the hardships of the single life to finally setting the circus down and being content. McGraw's voice has become better with time, as illustrated by his ease with a wide vocal range and his seemingly effortless vocal stylings.

"Set This Circus Down" will no doubt join its predecessors in selling millions of copies and finding a place in the heart of country fans worldwide. The album hits stores today and McGraw will take to the road with Kenny Chesney this summer to promote it.

when UMass is in the offensive zone. So far this season only Georgetown has been able to shut down one of the Maroon and White's goal-scoring couplet, let alone both of them.

Kunkel didn't register a single point against a stingy Georgetown defense that keyed on him. Leveille on the other handed fluttered the net twice including a huge rebound marker during a six-goal UMass run that tied the game at 12.

Although Kunkel is still the teams leading scorer with 56 points, shutting him does not by any stretch of the imagination stifle the UMass guns.

Leveille is a pretty dangerous customer himself with 34 points, so the 'Cuse D better not forget about the diminutive sophomore or they could end up dancing too close to an open flame.

It is important to remember however that many a talented attackmen have run into the Orange duo and ended up empty handed.

Glatzel was a runner up for the Schmeisser award in 2000. The award is given annually to college lacrosse's best defenseman and many lax pundits feel he was given the shaft by teammate Marshall Abrams.

Bliss is a sophomore who is obviously benefiting from the tutelage of the talented Glatzel.

The sophomore did not start on defense last year but it listed in the SU media guide that he is the teams' biggest and strongest defenseman. Obviously with his size (6-3) and strength (215 lbs), a limited role is not in the cards for the young Tully, NY native.

If Syracuse head coach John Desko matches Bliss up against Leveille, which could happen by default, than it could be a struggle between two rising stars of college lacrosse.

In all honesty Captain James Hook could write a good story about this game, but what better to concentrate on than a prime time showdown between two of college lacrosse's most productive attackmen and a pair of talented defensemen.

do at his end to get out there on the field."

Not only has Bliss earned the respect of Desko, he's also earned the admiration of his fellow defensemen.

"He's probably the best athlete we have on the team – size-and-strength-wise," defenseman Billy St. George said. "He's a big athletic guy. He's gotten to know the game a lot better. I came in with him freshman year, and he's improved so much since then. From freshman year to this year, I definitely think he's the most improved player."

Much of Bliss's improvement can be attributed to his intense offseason training. Bliss spent much of the winter in the weight room, he said, and now benches 285 pounds.

Last summer, Bliss took some time off from lacrosse. Instead, he played basketball and volleyball in order to stay in shape so he didn't become sick of lacrosse, he said.

He did participate in a box lacrosse league, where every player uses a short stick. Playing without his customary long stick helped his stick handling skills, Bliss said.

No matter the stick length or the sport, though, Bliss can hold his own, senior goalie Rob Mulligan said.

"He is the best athlete on this team," Mulligan said. "He can two-hand dunk a basketball. He can do 360 dunks. He's a sick athlete. It just goes to show that he really is that big and that fast."

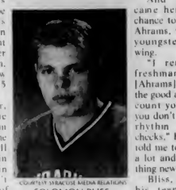
Bliss admitted he was more of a football and basketball player during his days at Tully High School (Tully, N.Y.).

"Coach Desko wanted me here because I'm an athlete and they could mold me into a lacrosse player," he said. "They looked for the quickness, speed and size in me and then the lacrosse part came later. Playing football got me the aggressive part of it, and playing basketball got me the quickness and the agility. It kind of molds together into lacrosse."

Bliss didn't start playing defense until 10th grade and first caught college coaches' eyes at the 1997 Empire State Games in Rochester, N.Y. Desko expressed interest in Bliss following the Games, Bliss said.

Living just 20 miles away from one of the most storied lacrosse schools in the nation lured Bliss to the SU Hill.

"I never would've thought I would play here," he said. "As a kid it was such a big program and had the best players in the country. I had never really pictured [playing here], but I've always wanted to."



COURTESY SYRACUSE ARENA RELATIONS
SOLOMON BLISS

And when Bliss came here, he got a chance to work behind Abrams, who took the youngster under his wing.

"I remember my freshman year, [Abrams] told me that the good attackmen will count your checks so you don't want to get a rhythm with your checks," Bliss said. "He told me to change it up a lot and throw something new."

Bliss, like many of his teammates, has experienced growing pains in his first year as a starter. A young Syracuse team has been inconsistent at times, especially late in games.

Living up to 18-straight Final Four appearances can take its toll.

"I just can't imagine being that team that doesn't make it," Bliss said. "Living up to that alone puts a lot of pressure on you. I don't know if it's fear, but it's the competitive spirit of us. And also living up to the fact that we are some of the best players in the country and everyone expects that from us. I think a little bit this year, being preseason No. 1, the expectations were kind of hard on us.

"Just knowing you have to live up to all these guys being the best in the country and all these names that you constantly hear in lacrosse is the hard part of it. But it's also nice to know that you're a part of that. You lose track of that every now and then, you don't realize how big of a deal it really is. So you just have to kind of step back out and actually look at where you are and look at what you have to live up to."

This is part four of a five-parts series entitled "Magnates of the Game."

With the American and National Leagues working as one, baseball was at its greatest strength. People throughout the country heralded it as "the national pastime." Yet still, a large portion of Americans were excluded from the game, as African-Americans were still barred by the so-called "Gentlemen's Agreement." Not since Moses "Fleetwood" Walker was forced out of the game in the 1880s had any black player been part of the Major Leagues.

Still, there were many barnstorming games between black ballclubs and teams made up of big leaguers in the offseason. In fact, in many of these games, blacks would soundly defeat their white counterparts. There were many black teams throughout the country, but African-Americans were in need of someone who could start a more organized league to flout their talent.

Andrew "Rube" Foster was born in 1879 in Calvert, Texas. He dropped out of school in eighth grade, and he was baseball mad. By age 18, his pitching skills were drawing attention from all across the baseball world.

Just after the turn of the century, legendary manager John McGraw tried in vain to add Foster to his New York Giants. Still, McGraw allegedly brought Foster in to instruct his team's pitchers. According to legend, it was Foster that taught Christy Mathewson his famous fade-away pitch.

In 1902 he truly made his mark on the black baseball world as he was credited with winning 44 consecutive games for the Cuban Giants. The next year, he got his famed nickname by beating Rube Waddell, the famous major league southpaw, in an exhibition game.

Foster remained the most effective pitcher in the black baseball world, and finally began his managerial career in 1907 when he took over the helm of Chicago's Leland Giants. He led the team to a 110-10 record that year.

COURTESY BASEBALL HALL OF FAME
ANDREW "RUBE" FOSTER

After the 1908 season, in which the team went 64-22, Foster broke his ties with owner Frank Leland. He took his players to a new club, and in a ridiculous court ruling, Foster was allowed to keep the team name.

Foster was often known for his brashness, and in 1910, the following appeared in the Indianapolis Freeman: "Rube Foster's Leland Giants challenges any ball club in the world for a series of games to decide the championship... I offer this inducement to all so-called champions; I want the public to be convinced as to who is really the champion.... We are open to play any place or any club. Now watch them all crawl in their hole."

As always, Foster's endorsement was not without reason, however, as his Giants went a miraculous 123-6 that year, according to records.

By the winter of 1919, Foster was sick of the disorganization of black baseball, and decided to take it upon himself to start a more organized league. In 1920, the Negro National League was formed, and Foster was President. The rival Eastern League was formed, and the two leagues staged a Negro League World Series each year.

Foster continued his managing duties through 1925, with his team taking the first three league pennants. But toward the end of 1925, Foster was showing discouraging signs.

He began having conversations with people who he weren't there, and in 1926 he was admitted to the Kankakee, Ill. State Hospital. He would spend his final four years there until his death on Dec. 9, 1930. He was buried soon after in Chicago's Lincoln Park. His casket was closed that day, it was noted, at about the time a ball game would end.

In 1931, the Negro National League collapsed, but the other Negro Leagues were still strong in fact. Because of Foster's hard work and innovation, African-American continued to gain prominence in the baseball world. And much because of the path that Foster laid, in 1947, baseball truly became a national game, as Jackie Robinson trotted on to Ebbets Field, the first black player in the Major Leagues since Moses Walker.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Your enthusiasm will be high today, particularly when it comes to a new endeavor you've been eager to try for some time.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – What is merely guesswork to another may be clever and careful deduction on your part. Indeed, you do seem to be onto something at this time.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You can do a great deal to keep a friend or a loved one on an even keel today – but you must be willing to let go when the time comes.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may be in one of your darker moods as the day opens, but steady concentration of your won work should liven your spirits considerably.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You must get down to work as soon as possible today, and give yourself room to experiment even as you follow the rules. Don't hem yourself in!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You mustn't make more of a situation today than it already is. If you're not a part of the solution, remember, you're part of the problem.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Your own dependability will appreciated by friends and family members today – and even total strangers will have a reason to thank you.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – A Gemini or Cancer native is likely to bring a little extra excitement into your life today, and you must be prepared to respond in kind.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – It is essential that you maintain a calm, rational stance at all times today. Even where your emotions are concerned, you must be in control.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – It's onward and upward for you today, provided you rely heavily on your primary talents and do not let yourself be distracted from your purpose.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Someone may claim that it's none of your business today – and he or she is probably right. Still, your perspective is a valuable one.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You may be in the mood for a little more adventure than usual today, and you may have it once you tend to a few unavoidable duties at home and at work.

Maroon and White has hands full with 'Cuse

Saturday afternoon's Syracuse-Massachusetts lacrosse battle is to a sports writer what ten free pizzas are to Rick Majerus – a fantasy.

There are enough storylines and themes in this weekend's match up to keep King James busy.

National power 'Cuse vs. upstart UMass – 18 straight final fours vs. two consecutive losing seasons – upstate New York vs. Long Island and Western Massachusetts – a talented Orange O vs. a physical Maroon and White D – a quick strike UMass attack vs. an All American in net – take your pick. Any one of these themes would make for a great lead or a wonderful story.

But to find the most essential match-up, one must search for the hinge where the doorway to victory cracks open and swings shut. Hovering around that hinge are UMass' own Obi Wan and Luke in Rich Kunkel and Kevin Leveille. And standing firmly in their path to glory are Syracuse's John Glatzel and Solomon Bliss.

Kunkel is the elder statesman and leading scorer on offense for the Minutemen, much the same way Glatzel leads the Orange defense with his skill and experience. Both are seniors and both will move on and leave their respective torches in the very young but very talented hands of Leveille and Bliss.

The Kunkel-Glatzel and Leveille-Bliss match ups will undoubtedly be the key conflicts

Rich Kunkel was held scoreless for the first time of the season in a loss to Georgetown. When UMass takes on national power Syracuse the task will get no easier for the senior.

Orangemen defense is keyed by play of Bliss

By Darryl Slater
Daily Orange (Syracuse U.)

U-WIRE) SYRACUSE, N.Y. – Solomon Bliss is built like a house. No, more like a fortress.

At 6-foot-3, 215 pounds, the sophomore defenseman is capable of scaring small children. Upon first glance, he's the last guy you would expect to ask someone else for assistance.

But that's exactly what Bliss did last summer. And it paid off.

The defenseman approached SU head coach John Desko after the team's national championship victory and wanted to know how he could contribute more. Bliss had only 11 groundballs his red-shirt freshman season and didn't start a game.

Bliss is now a starting long-stick defender, and the Orangemen (9-2).

Bliss, like many Orangemen, is in his first year as contributor to a team with only eight seniors.

"[Coach] just gave me the pointers on what I'd have to do as far as clearing and not running up the field as much and getting a little bit better with footwork," Bliss said. "He told me that I was a big part of the team last year, I just didn't get as much playing time. He told me I was going to get a lot of playing time this year, but not to take it for granted. Nothing was locked up by any means."

Bliss has filled a huge hole in the Orangemen lineup this season. After the departure of All-America defenseman Marshall Abrams, Desko and his staff looked to the youth of the team to step in.

Bliss has done more than expected this season, scooping up 24 groundballs while starting all 11 games.

"Physically, Sol is as good as anybody in the country defensively," Desko said. "His skills picked up by the end of his (redshirt freshman) year. It's just been a natural progression. He wants to play and he did whatever he could

Harvard dominates Minutemen

Crimson pound UMass pitching for 21 runs in victory

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

The small diamond that the Harvard baseball team plays its games on would never in a million years be mistaken for a Major League ballpark because of its aesthetics.

But based on the score of yesterday's game, in which the Crimson played host to Massachusetts (14-15, 4-5 Atlantic 10), some might easily confuse the facility with Coors Field.

The Minutemen, who had traveled to Cambridge in hopes of gaining momentum back after losing a doubleheader to Rhode Island, were delivered a severe setback, as they fell victims of a 21-11 drubbing at the hands of their Harvard counterparts.

The Crimson (17-21, 10-6 Ivy League) put up seven runs in the first inning against UMass starter David Loonie and added five more in the second to put the game far out of reach. But the Harvard nine continued their onslaught by tacking on another eight runs in the bottom of the fifth to put them ahead 20-5 after only five innings. Coming into the contest, the home offense was averaging just under six runs per game.

Senior captain Nick Gorneault got the Minutemen on the board in the top of the first by launching his fifth home run of the season off Crimson starter, sophomore Ryan Tsujikawa.

But the early 1-0 lead was the only daylight that the Maroon and White would see all day.

Senior Joe Llanes started things off for Harvard, reaching on a lead-off single. He would go on to score on a lineout by fellow senior Scott Carmack. The game got broken wide open when junior Faiz Shakir came up with the bases loaded and laced a three-run double to score Nick Carter, Trey Hendricks, and Scot Hopps to put the Crimson up 5-1. Shortstop Mark Mager, in his second at-bat of the inning, slapped a two-RBI single into the outfield to leave Harvard up 7-1 after just one inning of play.

The second inning brought no better results for Loonie and his counterparts as Carter hit a solo homer to deep centerfield to tack another run on the board. A Hendricks single spelled the end of Loonie's day, and freshman Anthony Gallo came on to douse the fire.

Unfortunately, the Harvard batsmen had no intention of cooling down, and in his third at-bat of the game, Llanes hit a grand slam over the left field fence to give the home team a 12-1 lead after two frames.

UMass showed signs of life, scoring single runs in the third and fourth innings, and giving up no tallies to the Harvard hitters. Jeff Altieri's two-run homerun in the top of the fifth seemed the beginning of a rally for the Minutemen, but junior Chaney Sheffield came on in relief of Tsujikawa and the Crimson escaped the fifth without further damage.

But the bottom of the fifth ended any hopes of a UMass comeback. Despite strong pitching in the previous two innings, the Maroon and White staff fell apart again.

Carmack started things off by hitting a two-run long ball over the fence in centerfield. Hopps later hit a three-run bomb to right to score Hendricks and Carter. Harvard scored three more runs in the inning to put the exclamation point on the victory.

Yesterday, the Minuteman hurlers continued their struggles from this past weekend, where they allowed Rhode Island nine home runs and 25 runs in a doubleheader on Sunday. With the five dingers they allowed yesterday, the staff as a whole has seen 33 balls leave the park in just 29 games this season.

Gorneault hit his second gopher of the day in the sixth inning, scoring junior Mike Kulak and his younger brother, Connell. In the seventh, Cullan Maumus got his first career collegiate homerun, a two-run shot that scored Tim Klett.

The Minutemen will return to action this afternoon, facing the University of Vermont in the friendly confines of Earl Lorden Field, where they have amassed a 9-2 record.

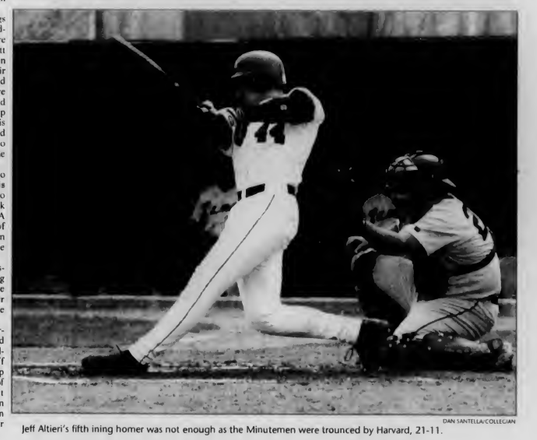
For the Minutemen, a victory against the 18-13 Catamounts is crucial. Since reaching .500 for the first time last week, UMass has yet to take successful strides in gaining additional ground. For that to happen today, the UMass rotation will have to find its way around a Vermont offense that is, statistically speaking, dangerous.

The Catamounts bring four starters batting over .300, and as a team sport an average of .308. They have put up double-digit scores on multiple occasions, including a resounding 18-3 defeat of Harvard last Thursday.

Vermont has also dominated on the defensive side of the diamond, with four pitchers in the rotation holding records with at least three wins, and another two with two victories apiece. Pacing that staff has been Jamie Merchant, who is tied for the team lead in wins at three, and sits second on the roster in ERA at 2.29.

More than anything the Minutemen need to find a balanced attack, not only between the hitting and pitching, but within the order itself. Senior Nick Gorneault continues to lead by example, batting a team leading .374 with 21 RBI's and 27 hits in 99 plate appearances. Also an offensive threat is sophomore first baseman Jeff Altieri, who has knocked in an impressive 32 runs this season, in addition to his five homeruns and 37 hits.

Likely getting the nod on the mound from coach Stone will be Senior Craig Szado who, in seven starts, has compiled a 2-3 record. Behind him, the bullpen, which has been driven by the impressive performance of freshman Eric Chown, has given the Minutemen ample opportunity to win games in late innings.The first pitch is scheduled to be thrown out at 3 p.m.



DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Jeff Altieri's fifth inning homer was not enough as the Minutemen were trounced by Harvard, 21-11.

UConn comes to town on Senior Day

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

A three game winning streak is on the line for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, and it knows that no team would like to break that streak more than Connecticut.

"Anytime it is UMass vs. UConn, it is a big game," Maroon and White head coach Phil Barnes said, as his team tries to improve on its 5-8 (3-2 Atlantic 10). "This is an exciting game for our kids."

Both squads struggled mightily earlier in the season, but the Minutewomen have picked it up of late, while the Huskies have continued to display their losing tendencies. UConn now stands at 2-10 (0-5 Big East), and has lost 10 of its last 11 games after beating Villanova to open up the year.

All of this must be especially disappointing for coach Bonnie Rosen and her players, as Connecticut came into the 2001 campaign with high expectations of improving on last season's 10-6 record. However, a combination of bad luck (four games lost by one goal) and underachieving has left the Huskies wondering what might have been.

Despite the fact that it is 2-10, UConn still does have dangerous weapons on the attack. Pam Lowie has 35 scores to go along with four assists on the year, which would be good enough for first place on the team if she played for UMass. In her squad's recent one-goal loss to Virginia Tech, Lowie totaled six tallies, equaling the amount of times she tickled the back of the twine the game before against Fairfield.

Heather Bliss and Meghan Campbell are both also threats to score, while April Pollock will attempt to shut down the potent Maroon and White attack in net for the Huskies.

"Their three attackers [Bliss, Lowie, and Campbell] are all excellent," Barnes said. "And they are a very scrappy team."

Three games ago, the Minutewomen were mired in a slump very similar to that of Connecticut. However, in its next three contests, the Maroon and White went on to outscore its opponents by a combined total of 48-14, to wrap up a spot in the A-10 tournament on March 4-5. A young team that had struggled with inconsistencies finally looked like it was coming together over this stretch, and with every win, the excitement level rose among the UMass players.

"Our confidence is back up and we are energetic and happy," Denise Brey said, who has played outstanding defense against some of the nation's top attackers. "We are maturing as a team and everyone looks 20 times better."

"It's getting better with every game and everything is coming together," added goalkeeper Jen Nardi. "We have grown up to the point where our youth is not something negative, but something positive."

Added incentive for Massachusetts in today's contest is that it is senior day; the last time Rachel Ingraffea, Fay Naber, Kara DePaula, Brey and Nardi will trot onto Totman Field.

Ingraffea and DePaula are both having the best seasons of their careers, totaling 34 and 19 points, respectively, and Naber is on the verge of breaking her 26 point season of a year ago. Those three have led a group of young attackers that have come on of late to score 19 goals in each of the last two contests.

"We have really good shooters, and our passing and off the ball movement is also good," Jada Emery said, who has totaled 19 points of her own on the year.

Meanwhile, Brey has had the task of matching up against the opposing team's top goal scorer, and has done an admirable job of protecting the UMass zone. Nardi has also come on of late, regaining the form she had last year before the onset of a serious injury in the offseason.

"It is going to be a great game," Barnes said. "We are starting to come into our own and we are looking for the same improvement we have had over the past few games."

The festivities begin at 4 p.m. on Totman Field.

MATT BARR/COLLEGIAN

Senior captain Fay Naber will play her final game in Amherst this afternoon when the Minutewomen take on UConn.

AC Professor Sarat to lecture on:

Capital Punishment

By Erik Haan
Collegian Staff

In the ever-controversial issue of capital punishment, Austin Sarat, the William Nelson Cromwell Professor of Jurisprudence and Political Science at Amherst College, has weighed in with his own opinion in his book, entitled When the State Kills: Capital Punishment and the American Condition.

The 53-year-old Sarat, who has taught at Amherst College since 1974, also has experience as a visiting assistant professor at both Yale University and Cornell Law School and currently serves as a visiting professor at UCLA Law School.

His book is not merely another entry into the conventional arguments about capital punishment, which typically revolve around ethics and justice, but is instead a look at how capital punishment has actually done a significant amount of damage to democracy in the United States.

"It's not a matter of what state killing is doing for us," he said. "It's a matter of what state killing is doing to us."

What exactly capital punishment is doing to "us," he feels, is that it is dividing the country both racially and regionally because of what battles it leads to.

"The death penalty in the U.S. is almost always about race, class, and reason," he said.

What often times happens, he states, is that when a sentence to death is handed down lines are drawn because people opposed to the sentence look for someone to lay the blame on. Those who believe that someone received the death penalty because of the color of their skin point fingers at government and the courts for having a negative bias towards those people of color. Those who are citizens of states that do not use the death penalty as punishment for crime become strongly opposed to those states that do.

He also stresses that capital punishment does not serve much of a purpose in our society because the effect it has on criminals is mostly inconsequential.

"The state doesn't have to kill anybody. We have already neutralized the person by putting them in prison," he said. "The execution is unnecessary."

The fact that the criminal is already neutralized is coupled by Sarat's notion that the prospect of death is not a deterrent to most criminals because it fails to address the problem of why criminals commit these crimes.

"The death penalty didn't stop [Timothy] McVeigh from doing what he did," he said.

Timothy McVeigh was convicted of using explosives to destroy the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma 6 years ago. His actions were responsible for the death of 168 people and he is scheduled to have his life terminated by lethal injection on May 16. The execution is slated to be broadcast across the nation, via closed circuit television, to those people who lost family members in the explosion.

Sarat, though staunchly against the death penalty, states that executions should be made more visible to everyone.

"I believe that all executions ought to be televised," he said. "It is the obligation of citizens in a democracy to watch. State killing is done in our name."

By allowing only a closed-circuit broadcast of the proceedings, Sarat feels as though the government is allowing the wrong perspectives on capital punishment to continue.

"I think that the Attorney General of the United States had the wrong idea," he said. "[He made it a matter that] had to do with the needs of survivors and victims. [Capital punishment] isn't a private transaction and shouldn't be a matter of theraputic needs."

Sarat even argues that the survivors and victims do not always feel a sense of satisfaction from witnessing the death of a criminal.

"It may or may not be a point of Faculty Senate to discuss diversity

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The Faculty Senate will discuss several special reports at their 591st meeting this afternoon.

The Rules Committee has released a document entitled the "Search for a Permanent Chancellor" which urges the President's office to "act expeditiously in the appointment of a search committee to select a permanent Chancellor for the University of Massachusetts at Amherst."

The Rules Committee is made up of the Presiding Officer, Professor Frank Ilugus, the Secretary Professor Ernest May, the delegate and the associate delegates to the Board of Trustees, and four elected Senators. It is charged with both organizing the Senate's many councils and committees and also advising the President's Office. The administration can solicit the advice, but the Rules Committee acts in advisory role during winter break and summer.

The report described the current Whitmore jumble of resignations and appointments as a hindrance to filling certain administration positions. The report asserts that it is because of the lack of a concrete administration that the Vice Chancellor for Research remains unfilled.

"It is almost certain that the most recent search for a Vice Chancellor for Research failed because candidates were uncertain about administrative arrangements on the campus," the report states. "Moreover, it is now clear that a decision on a permanent Provost and Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs will be delayed until a permanent Chancellor is in place.

"A lengthy delay in the appointment of a permanent Provost or a permanent Vice Chancellor for Research, or both, will not be good for a campus committed to becoming a first rate, research university."

Also on the agenda is a Special Report of the Health Council. The Council is calling for the establishment of a "Prevention of Alcohol Abuse Task Force (PAATF)."

"In accordance with the coopeterative agreement of the Statewide College and University Coalition on Underage and Problem Drinking," the report reads, "The PAATF will monitor the implementation of recommendations for improvement of policies and strategies for the reduction of alcohol abuse."

The General Education Council will present its Special Report for discussion only. The report requests the "deans of the schools and Colleges to provide faculty resources dedicated to the ensuring that General Education is explained and championed in advising during the New Students Program and other advising services."

MOUNTAIN BIKING THE PIONEER VALLEY

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Every year, thousands of students bring their mountain bikes to the University of Massachusetts. And every year an alarming number of those bikes remain shackled to bike racks without ever having their tires touch a trail.

What makes this trend most disturbing is that there are vast networks of trails all around UMass offering just about every type of terrain challenge imaginable. The thrill of mountain biking is literally just a few cranks away from campus; all it takes is a little direction and a little motivation.

This article is designed to give riders of every skill level a number of ideas where to ride close to campus, as well as advice on some excellent terrain located within a short drive of UMass. Students and local residents alike have ridden the trails outlined below for decades, and each trail provides a thoroughly unique riding experience with its own distinctive characteristics.

"What makes this a great area for mountain biking is the combination of terrain and people," said Peter Vangel, a South Hadley resident and member of the New England Mountain Biking Association (NEMBA). "Having colleges nearby brings in a lot of people who are enthusiastic and pretty athletic. And there are plenty of good places for those people to ride."

There are also a few general guidelines that should be followed when riding area trails. The first is to make sure that you are riding lawfully. Posted signs seem to appear, disappear and reappear throughout the Pioneer Valley as the seasons change, and many existing signs are grown-in and hard to notice. Simply put, you should always search out and adhere to posted regulations concerning trail access.

The second major concern is pedestrian safety. Many of the better biking trails in the area are also popular among hikers, so always be on the lookout for people on foot (especially when you are descending). If you want to ride a particular section of trail aggressively, have a fellow cyclist ride slowly on ahead and scout for hikers.

"You don't want to piss off the hikers," said Sean Boland, a senior sport management major and member of the UMass bike team. "They're the ones who get trails closed."

Besides, yielding to hikers beats having to clean them out of your tires with a stick.

Finally, take the steps necessary to protect your own health when mountain biking. A good helmet and plenty of water are absolute necessities (experts advise at least one full water bottle per hour of riding). You should also avoid riding alone whenever possible, in case of a crash or equipment failure that would otherwise leave you stranded alone away from "civilization."

Riding with a buddy isn't just safer; it also makes you a better rider. You're much less apt to step off and walk your bike through technical terrain if your friend is crashing through it with ease.

Once you're all geared up, all you need is a destination. The first section described below (terrain around UMass) has been broken down into areas and arranged north to south, so that an ambitious rider can conquer the whole series of areas with one grueling day of nonstop riding. It is suggested that newer cyclists try these trails one at a time, however, so as not to overdo it.

North Amherst – The wooded area around Atkins Reservoir is home to the Robert Frost Trail, which originates in New Hampshire. "The Frost" varies in width as it winds down past Cushman Village, providing a nice balance of terrain for riders of all ability levels.

The RFT is also a popular area with students in UMass's two mountain biking classes, both of which are taught by junior civil engineering majors Seth Brosnan and Geoff Christoph.

Bike maintenance tips

Since the weather has gotten nice and more people are out and about enjoying the burgeoning spring, more bikes are popping up on area trails and sidewalks. Going for a ride is a great idea, but before you hop on your bike, make sure that you follow a couple of tips to get your bike ready after the long winter.

Some people prefer to spend about $20 and get their bike tuned from an area shop. Bike mechanics will tell you that if you have a nice, expensive bike that you're planning to ride frequently, that getting a full tune-up isn't a bad idea.

Geoff Christoph from Competitive Edge told the Collegian that a shop tune-up once a year is good for bikes that get lots of use. Bike mechanics can tune breaks, tweak gears and adjust the handling of your bike. However, if you're just planning on recreational riding, or biking to school, here are a few tips for easy maintenance.

First of all, make sure to check your tire pressure on both of your wheels. Sometimes tires can get flat from sitting for long periods of time. Whatever pressure is written on the side of the tire is what you should aim for. Tires should be firm, but not rock-hard. A regular pump is perfect for achieving the desired pressure.

Second, look over your entire bike and make sure all the bolts are tight. If you have an allen wrench, you can go through your bike tightening all of the bolts. If you don't have an allen wrench, you can either borrow one from a friend, or take your bike into a shop for a quick tighten. Most of the time bolts don't become too loose, but it's a good idea to check all of them anyway.

Finally, the most important thing to do for your bike before you commence a lengthy ride is to lube the chain. Wax lubes are generally best, and area bike shops carry brands like White Lightening or Pedro's Ice Wax. Make sure that you wipe off any excess lube with a rag, and remember, WD40 is NOT lubricant!!!!!! If you use WD40, you will end up bringing your bike to a shop and paying for a new chain! According to Sean Boland, nothing is more frustrating for a bike mechanic than to try and fix a bike with a chain that is dripping with WD40 and already beginning to degrade.

Besides these little home tune-up tips, you can also get your bike looking new and feeling good by washing it and getting all of last season's mud and leaves from out of the spokes and gears. And if you decide to go ahead and invest in a professional tune-up, there are many area shops that will be happy to help you. Happy Trails!

SCOTT FLORIDO/COLLEGIAN

"The upper Robert Frost is a great place for people to get their first taste of the area," said Brosnan. "We bring our students from Mountain Biking I up there because it has a nice mix of single and doubletrack — not too steep or too technical, but fun. It's nice and windy and fast."

The upper portion of the RFT is somewhat rocky, making for tough climbing and exhilarating, bumpy descents. The lower portions can become somewhat soft at times.

Just below the RFT, at the intersection of Bridge St. and the Central Vermont Railroad tracks, is the Kevin Flood Accessible Trail. This somewhat short connector is fun to ride at high speeds, especially the initial drop which leads to a bridge perfect for bunny hopping. Downhill fans will also notice a few steep chutes coming down off the railroad tracks on the east side of the trail.

The KFAT crosses over Cushman Brook and leads to Puffer's Pond, a scenic spot that has unfortunately been placed off-limits to both bicycles and horses. Below the pond begins a network of tightly packed sawdust trails called the Mill River Conservation Area. Certain portions of these trails are reportedly closed to bikes, but the area is such a maze that those on two wheels essentially have free reign.

The Mill River trails are flat but very fast when dry, making for a nice place to practice sprints. The best way into the area is the Jennifer Trail off State St., which offers a thrilling drop-in down a steep bank and over a narrow wooden bridge.

"Mill River is a nice spot for beginning riders," said Christoph. "Just be on the lookout for people walking their dogs."

Moving south down East Pleasant St., the next spider-web of trails is located literally right next to campus. A ride down Fraternity Rd. (not Fraternity row) past the University Admissions Center leads to the Gerald Bozzo Trail, a soft grassy singletrack that winds through the woods and connects with the Wildwood Conservation Area. This network offers a really nice variety of terrain, ranging from rocky hillside to soft pine needle-strewn forest floor.

There is one wicked descent into the network via Village Park Rd., but that is posted as a private road for residents of the apartment complex only. Those who want to obey the law and still ride the drop can enter via the Bozzo Trail and ride (or walk) up to the top of the Village Park entrance.

Reaching the next area of trails necessitates a ride through town. This gives the avid gear-masher a chance both to spot friends and urge them to come along for the ride, as well as to ridicule those spending their beautiful spring days driving around in cars instead of biking.

Central Amherst – The Amethyst Brook Conservation Area, located a short distance outside of town on Pelham Rd., offers one of the most diverse riding experiences around on some very well maintained trails.

"The key with Amethyst is variety of terrain," said Christoph, who lives about two miles from the area. "There's a little of everything for all different abilities. There are loops that you can do in an hour and loops that take four hours or more."

The difficulty level of the terrain at Amethyst also runs the full gamut, ranging from wide, flat doubletrack to winding singletrack laced with rocks and tree roots. The trail traverses its namesake brook repeatedly, providing bridges to hop off of and wet patches to slog through.

Christoph also mentioned that trail etiquette dictates staying away from particularly muddy spots to prevent unnatural trail erosion.

Just south of Amethyst begins another spider web of trails that stretches all the way across the eastern border of the Amherst College campus. These trails tend to get sticky in the wetter months of spring, especially in its lower portions. The best terrain for mountain biking is up around the old chancellor's house, which overlooks Southeast St. from atop a hill. There is a nicely pitched, root-covered singletrack that starts along the house's driveway and spills out onto the Norwottock Rail Trail about a half-mile below.

The Rail Trail can also be reached from South Pleasant St., via a sweet drop-in that starts at an open gate across the street from and just above the Amherst Golf Club.

These areas around Amherst College are supposedly off-limits to anyone not affiliated with the College, so if you want to check it out it's suggested that you befriend someone who goes there to tag along with you.

A blazing saddle in the woods.

SCOTT FLORIDO/COLLEGIAN

South Amherst – A very brief trip east on the Rail Trail brings you to the Misty Bottom Trail, which starts just below the intersection of Southeast St. and the Boston and Maine Railroad. Constructed by the American Society of Civil Engineers at UMass, this beautiful singletrack snakes along the Fort River, packing a wealth of terrain (including five wooden bridges, two s-curves and one deliciously steep hill) into a relatively short distance of rises and falls.

The middle portion of the trail, dubbed "the power lines," sees the singletrack finality for them," he said. "Going to an execution doesn't reliably put the matter to rest."

His opinion on the matter comes with first-hand knowledge of the emotions of a death penalty trial, as he recalls his account of a case he witnessed in Georgia.

"It's a troubling thing to be a spectator at an event in which the perspective death of another human being is discussed," he said. "We're talking about the ending of life. It's sad and painful. It was a moving but troubling experience for me."

He says that despite the emotions involved with such an experience, the societal effects of putting someone to death must be considered.

"It's a test of your ability to overcome," he said. "Does the execution make us a safer society, or a saner society? State killing damages things we value in a democracy. We need to consider doing justice, but doing it justly."

In his book, Sarat considers this problem and also addresses the effect that the film industry has had on American culture because of the way they seemingly legitimate state killing. Among the movies he considers are Last Dance, Dead Man Walking, and The Green Mile.

"There is too much focus on the individual person on death row," he said. "They [leave] out the question 'Does any person deserve to die?'

Sister Helen Prejean, CSJ, author of Dead Man Walking, advocated the opinions Sarat expressed in his book.

"Of all the books which I have read on the death penalty—and that number is considerable—Sarat's probing analysis in these pages is among the best," she said. "Sometimes he jolts me out of intellectual paradigms that once guided my thinking. I'm very grateful to him for giving us this book. No one who reads it will be the same again. We're talking power here, the power to change consciousness. Fasten your seatbelts."

Sarat's book is on sale now in local book stores, and he will be available for a book signing on April 28, at 2:00 p.m., at the JeffTey Amherst bookstore.

enter a sandy field (beneath power lines, go figure) and split into two side-by-side lines, with just enough room for elbow-to-elbow racing.

Misty Bottom empties out into Groff Park on Mill Lane, just east of the South Pleasant St. intersection. The park has official hours of 8:30 a.m. to 8:30 p.m., so anyone interested in riding the trail outside of that time period will have to stay on the eastern-most section.

A scenic spin south past Hampshire College and Atkins Farm leads to the Holyoke Range, home to the most challenging and technical mountain biking terrain in the area. Between the 1,000-plus foot peaks of Mt. Norwottock and Bake Mtn. lies an area known only as "The Notch," where an entire network of extremely challenging trails tests even the most experienced of Pioneer Valley mountain bikers.

"You can get lost in there for hours," said Christoph. "If you really want to beat yourself up you can, but if you want to just try something new you can do that too. It's definitely a more challenging place to ride."

The Holyoke Range trail network has been mapped in its entirety by Eric Barnes, a visiting philosophy professor at Mount Holyoke College. Barnes has published a full-color map on his personal website(http://www.mtholyoke.edu/~ebarnes) that depicts dozens of hiking and biking trails all along the mountain range.

At least two of those trails would not be rideable were it not for area residents like Vangel, who has worked in conjunction with the NEMBA and park supervisor Mike Smith to map and build several trails around Mt. Norwottock. Vangel's "experts only" trails allow mountain bikers to explore areas of steep, rocky terrain that were previously only accessible by foot.

"One of the bike trails we built was a former hiking trail," Vangel said. "That meant limited work cleaning it up, which was a godsend."

But for all the effort that people like Vangel put into building and maintaining mountain bike trails in the Pioneer Valley, there are other, less constructive forces that threaten the integrity of these very same areas. While cycling the Robert Frost earlier this week, Boland came upon an area rendered virtually unpassable by careless logging procedures. Such damage has also been inflicted on portions of the Amethyst Brook area, where logs, brush and deep ruts from heavy equipment have turned well-maintained trails into obstacle courses. Boland points to such abuse as being something that all environment-conscious mountain bikers must rally against.

"People have to know that stuff like this is happening," Boland said. "It's just a shame to see a place like that where so many people ride being ruined by loggers who don't care."

Raising awareness of the area's mountain biking trails is a goal that will reap many of its own rewards. Not only can abuse of natural resources be combated, but students and residents alike can come together and really appreciate the unique and exciting mountain bike terrain that is all around "them. For there is nothing like a facefull of breeze, the jolt of the handlebars and the feel of singletrack beneath your wheels as you rocket down a trail.

It definitely beats leaving your bike chained to a rack all spring.

SGA discusses budget

By Jessica May
Collegian Staff

Last night's Student Government Association's Senate meeting featured the cherry on the cake of the legislative year: the annual budget. The allocation of money to all Registered Student Organizations on campus, this year's budget reflected a $31,000 deficit in this year's coffers and many clubs will see cuts in their available money.

But the budget wasn't the only focus of the meeting; the Senate passed 19 motions before it finally lost quorum after 10 p.m.

Mike Taugher, who chairs the Ways and Means Committee, presented the budget immediately after opening announcements. Taugher, who led his committee during this year's earlier Senate scandal, has little confidence that his budget will pass. So while he said acknowledged in the budget letter that this "year has been particularly tough and stressful" he noted that it didn't appear to get easier with budget cuts and expressed reservations about the possible failure of the budget.

Comparing himself to last year's Chairwoman Amy Pellegrino, said that while she was able to get her budget passed, he doesn't "think that I'll be able to get mine passed."

Not only were the SGA reserves hit; SCORA, the Student Center for Education, Research and Advocacy, took a $14,000 hit. For the SGA's part, Taugher said that the body would try to eliminate an office manager to save money.

RSOs that took a serious hit include University Production Council, whose budget was cut significantly from past years. Taugher also feared that this year wouldn't be the first of budget cuts; he said he saw a foreseeable loss of revenue for the SGA in the coming years.

Later in the meeting, a part of the scandal that Taugher had previously referenced, the voting rights of Greeks on campus, was addressed legislatively by former Senate Speaker Jim Eltringham. In a piece of legislation that he co-authored, electoral districts would be defined by the University instead of the SGA, thus making Greeks, who technically live off campus, commuter voters. The motion was passed with little fanfare.

"I'm happy that we put an end to a lot of the issues that have really plagued us and have been very controversial this year," Eltringham said. At the core of the Senate's removal last semester was whether or not Greek students, who flooded the Senate, were in the Commuter Area or were on campus. "Of course this was a really important issue to deal with and we think that we've put this to rest. We still have loose ends, but I think those are mostly semantics."

Part of the impact of the motion will be to guarantee that each person will each get one vote in an area election, rather than one person being allowed to vote for enough Senators to fill all of the seats of that area. SGA President John Sheehan supports the idea.

Further debate also continued on the issue of the dental clinic on campus. Senator Jaime Lee supports a University administration plan to bring in a private management corporation to oversee health services. His motion, which asked that the clinic be reopened as long as "the fee structure and management be adjusted for proper operation." The management corporation would manage from Arlington, Virginia.

Students previously paid for the clinic with the student health fee but the clinic now operates with a fee for any service. Jee, according to his legislation, doesn't feel that local dentists provide adequate treatment and wants to see the clinic reopened using the student fee.

Senate

Provost to "promote the importance of the General Education Program" and to change the diversity requirement are attached to the report. The second motion would require that all new students and transfers "complete one of their two Social & Cultural Diversity requirements with a course that focuses on diversity outside the United States."

The Senate will also be asked to approve two extensions in international exchange agreements with two Japanese universities. Osaka University's and the University of Tsukuba's agreements will be extended until August 31, 2004 and August 31, 2006 respectively if the motion passes.

Today's meeting will be held at 3:30 p.m. in Herter room 227.

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian.

New laws and power;
Police have too much

There is always a line drawn between the rights of the individual and the rights of the community. The most obvious case is that of the legal system, where the right of the individual to exercise their free will and freedom of action is laid against the needs of the community to be safe from the attacks and harmful actions of others.

Where the line is to be drawn is a matter of constant struggle and tension in our society. The extent of the law in individual lives, how we come into contact with the law, and when and where the law is applicable to disrupt the lives of individual private citizens of the United States is an issue that is never resolved and is the concept of a recent Supreme Court decision that is more than a little concerning.

The case involved a woman who wasn't wearing a seat belt and was arrested by a police officer that she said she'd had previous bad encounters with and who was loud and abusive when pulling her over. She felt that it was ridiculous that she could be arrested for an offense that only mandates a fine or a ticket. The Supreme Court disagreed.

Under this monumental decision, jaywalking is an arrestable offense. Littering. Running a stop sign. Anything. Things that were previously only punishable by a ticket or a fine can now land you in jail for up to two days, no questions asked.

This is a case where too much power has been handed to law enforcement. If jaywalking is such a huge social cancer that people need to be hauled in jail for it, then why is this the first time that the issue has ever come up?

The potential for abuse here is just too great.

This is not going to help deter crime. This is not going to help punish criminals. In fact, most cops will probably never ever use this new arrest option once in the careers.

What this will be used for is personal revenge. Did your son beat up the officer's son in school? Better not let him catch you running a red light, or lit two days in jail.

Even worse, the racist and bigoted use that this could be put towards by police officers is beyond compare. Black man runs a red light? Put him in jail, he's probably up to no good, quoth the diseased mind. Let him sweat it out a while. Maybe he'll confess to something else, right? This is the horrible side of this new law.

And while that might be a case of extreme paranoia, the fear is legitimate. This does increase the possibility of serious abuse.

The constant struggle between individuals and the community has veered towards the dangerous in with this new ruling. Individual freedom is a thing to be prized, and only surrendered when the common good is threatened in an overwhelming manner. In this case, however, individual freedom has been utterly disregarded.

The police do not need this new power. Let us hope that this dangerous new ruling does not stand for long.

I am a manual laborer

I'm going to do manual labor this summer.

I have an application for on-campus jobs; thing like painting, trades work, landscaping, and things of that ilk. Things that smell bad, that hurt your back, that give you t-shirt tans. I also hope to get another part-time job in some sort of service/retail area; maybe I'll scoop ice cream or brew coffee or run a cash register or something. Something that pays time-and-a-half on Sundays, that's for damned sure.

I will not be doing an internship. I will not be acquiring valuable on-the-job training. I will not be making business contacts. I will not be getting my resume out there. I definitely won't be making a good impression on old men in suits.

I'm cool with this.

There are a number of reasons, really. The most pressing reason is that I truly just want to have fun this summer. The number one goal of my life, to not be living with my parents, is about to come true. I'll be moving out of the dorm and into an apartment with my friends Scott and Ken. I'll be on my own. Finally.

Know what I want to do this summer? I want to cook cheeseburgers topless on a cheap charcoal grill in the backyard. I want to drink beer out of the bottle. I want to go to K-Mart, buy a bat and a cheap outfielder's glove, and maybe even one of those rubber-placemat home plates, and see if anyone wants to get some home run derby on. I want to go inner tubing on the Deerfield River. I want to watch Sox games on NESN in my underwear while drinking iced tea. I want to fly to Cali and see someone special. I want to hang out with my friends, early and often. I want to chillax until I can't chillax no more. Those are my main goals for this summer. Everything else is secondary.

In order to do this, of course, I'll have to be able to afford beer, bat, and inner tube. I'll also have to pay my rent, phone bill, electricity, cable, and any number of other things. The only way to get these things is to work.

Of course, I realize that there are paid internships out there. I could gather valuable experience and buy a case of cheap beer, with maybe enough left over for a calzone. There is a side effect to having these jobs, though. A side effect that, to me, is utterly unacceptable.

"I want to chillax until I can't chillax no more. Those are my main goals for this summer. Everything else is secondary."

I've been turned down for internships before. I don't think its because I'm under qualified. I mean, you know, I'm not some great god of journalism or anything, but I write fairly well for a kid, and I've got a good GPA, and I've done enough extra stuff to set me off from the pack. I work hard and I'm not above menial tasks. I think the single reason that I've been turned down as often as I have can be seen in this one exact quote from an interview I had last summer:

"You realize you'll have to dress differently for this job. You don't really look like a reporter, you know."

This guy had hardly looked at my clips. He told me he'd call me; needless to say, he didn't.

The irony was that I thought that I was fairly well dressed. I'd worn my cleanest, most socially-acceptable shorts, and my shirt was a plain baseball one that was almost new; I didn't even have my old-ass beat up hat on.

That's the reaction I get from just about everyone over the age of 25.

The way I see it is that I will soon enough graduate and go enter the world of work. I'll wear a suit and a tie, be a drone, say 'yes, sir' and 'no, sir,' have a constant fake smile so I don't alienate my co-workers, and worry about whether or not the boss will approve of the fuzzy dice in my car. I will be assimilated into the mainstream of corporate America. I won't even be allowed to write columns about my sex life anymore.

The simple fact is that I'm in no hurry to get to that stage of toolness. Someday, when someone in power tells me that they don't like the way I look, I'll have to change it. Today, I can do what I've always done, which is to say "F-ck you" and walk away. Like I did at that interview. I know its shallow, and that I'm a pretty ugly guy anyways, but still, its principle. I'm too young to let someone else tell me what to do with my personal life.

If I paint wrong, if I hammer wrong, hell, even if I write wrong, I am all about being corrected. It's the job of a supervisor to take note of things like that. Its when my ability to do what I do best is infringed by my physical appearance and lack of eloquence, which have no bearing on my actual work, that I say to hell with it. At my age, there's no reason for me to take that crap.

Next summer, of course, before I graduate, I'll take that crap and like it, because I'll want a career. Right now, though, I just want Jack and cokes and lazy afternoons consuming meat products.

It's gonna be a great summer of manual labor.

Clean elections

In November of 1998, reform-minded citizens approved a Massachusetts State ballot initiative providing for the public finance of statewide elections. But in order to preserve their incumbency, many state representatives are attempting to abuse a loophole in the popularly approved legislation designed to liberate the election process from the corrupting influence of private money.

The Clean Elections Law, to which the House Ways and Means and Committee has allocated $10 million in each of the two previous years, will offer public funds to candidates beginning in the 2002 election year. However, this year's budget proposal reserved no additional money for Clean Elections. In addition, Beacon Hill legislators proposed earlier this week that the existing election reserves – $22 million after treasury interest – should be diverted to other programs.

Under the law, the state's Office of Campaign and Political Finance cannot distribute Clean Elections funds until the Legislature re-appropriates the money reserves. Therefore, legislators can drain these funds before they are allocated; allowing them not only to claim responsibility for funding popular programs, but also to weaken challenges to their Beacon Hill positions.

On Monday, Representative Gale Candaras, a Wilbraham Democrat, proposed an amendment to the Clean Elections Law that would enable the Legislature to divert $20 million of the reserves to a program increasing the salaries of underpaid health and elderly care workers.

Certainly, Candaras won't be the only legislator to pursue the Clean Elections purse. While Massachusetts residents support opening the election process, many incumbents fear losing the fundraising advantages that strengthen the probability of their tenure.

The law demands that candidates running for State Representative in 2002 must raise 200 contributions of less than $100 to be eligible for $24,000 in public funds. Likewise, Senate candidates need 450 such contributions to be eligible for $72,000 in public funds. Similar fundraising levels are required for other statewide elections, including races for the Attorney General and Governor's offices.

Once they have received the public money, candidates must agree to spending limitations; the law caps Representative campaigns at $30,000 and Senate campaigns at $90,000. Candidates who refuse the public funds are not subject to these limitations.

At first, many supporters of the law believed that Clean Elections would receive substantial funding undisturbed by the ambitions of incumbent legislators. David Donnelly, manager of the Massachusetts Voters for Clean Elections Campaign, predicted candidates for statewide office would receive nearly $60 million dollars in 2002.

Senate President Thomas F. Birmingham, a Chelsea Democrat, supported financing elections with public funds. House Speaker Thomas M. Finneran, a Boston Democrat, pledged to uphold the will of the House on funding the law.

But as the first Clean Election approaches, the state government continues to undermine the campaign reforms. The budgets proposed by departed Gov. Paul Cellucci consistently under-financed the legislation over the past three years. And now, frightened Representatives want to subvert the remaining money to lengthen their political careers.

Supporters of Clean Elections claim that amendments allowing legislators to divert the public campaign funds toward favored programs could launch a broader movement on Beacon Hill to nullify the law. Already, the House leadership has suggested restoring $20 million of promised funding to the Affordable Housing Trust Fund. Several influential urban constituencies opposed the decision to cut the funding, made earlier this year.

Because expected state surpluses have vanished, legislators desperate to win support for their programs will contest budget negotiations this year with ardent passion.

The loophole within the Clean Elections Law will allow Representatives to attack the public financing of statewide elections. Although a majority of Mass. voters approved the law, nearly two-thirds of the Beacon Hill population opposes it. Therefore, many legislators will assault the law by claiming that the financing of elections should not replace the financing of programs such as education, housing, and health care. When House budget debates begin next week, those Representatives opposed to amending the Clean Elections Law must fulfill their promise to support only one amendment to the legislation.

By demanding another $10 million for next year's Clean Elections, they will maintain the supremacy of the Massachusetts electorate and the State Constitution. They must prevent the House leadership from ignoring the mandate of the people and nullifying a law approved by a popular majority. They cannot allow ambitious men and women to ignore the will of those whom they are dependent on to remain in office. The government belongs to the people; no politician may question their authority.

Sleeping for our sanity

All this beauty...and I just woke up. I stare at the bold words spread across the Sleeping Beauty mug sitting before me at the breakfast table in disbelief. Granted it's a weak attempt at sarcasm, but honestly, how can anybody consider him/herself a 'morning person'? I don't know; perhaps I am just biased because I'm not a morning person myself. Or so it came to my attention during the second week of freshman year, when my roommate first confronted me as to the flying objects that would the fill the room, obviously aimed at my roaring alarm clock, minutes before I would rise from a comatose sleep. Then again, to my credit I have friends who I would much rather break the news to that the hot guy they were making out with last night was in fact NOT their boyfriend than let them know it's time to get up for class.

Why is it that so many of us have trouble waking up in the morning, you may ask? Well, I can guarantee you that the drool-laden, bobbing dozers who dominate the classrooms today are somehow connected in all of this. And yes, we notice you. We are you. This campus is full of chronic short sleepers. Between sleepless weekends spent partying and weekdays filled with paper deadlines and exams, which naturally call for the infamous 'all nighters', how could we not regard eight hours of sleep as a luxury? Rushing off to our morning classes we might perform the ritual of guzzling cup after cup of coffee, in hopes that we can cheat Mother Nature and reach some level of function ability for the long day ahead, but we can't deny it. Sleep is a necessity.

Perhaps a cold splash of reality is just the trick to awaken the UMass population to the abuse they are putting their bodies and minds through by not getting into bed at a reasonable hour...

If so, I've got just the thing.

ABC's prime-time program, 20/20, aired a special on the importance of sleep the other day and provided startling evidence as to the affects of sleep deprivation on mind, body and soul. It was reported that in 1910, most Americans slept nine hours per night; however, the number of hours has since dwindled to a seven and a half hour average. For the first time, scientists are looking seriously at what happens to our bodies when we function on five, six, or seven hours of sleep a night and what they are finding is shocking. It was proven that after four hours of sleep for six consecutive nights, healthy young men had blood test results that nearly matched those of diabetes. In short, their ability to process blood sugar was reduced by 30 percent, factoring in a huge drop in their insulin response. In addition, they showed signs of elevated levels of the stress hormone, cortisol, which can lead to hypertension and memory impairment. Research also proves that sleep deprivation decreased the brain's ability to function, most specifically impairing the areas of the brain responsible for attention, complex planning, complex mental operation and judgment.

"...We might perform the ritual of guzzling cup after cup of coffee, in hopes that we can cheat Mother Nature and reach some level of function ability for the long day ahead, but we can't deny it. Sleep is a necessity."

Obviously a campus that resorts to daily catnaps and cups of Espresso just to survive has undermined the value of a good night's rest. Why, it was only yesterday when I witnessed my friend Sarah taking shots of Nyquil, tending to her overtired nature, to catch a few winks before classes. And as far as the daily run to the Munchie Store to grab a tall mocha, do you think you really need the extra boost of stress that caffeine brings to a mind functioning on four hours of sleep, bombarded as it is with dates from World War II or the theory of relativity? I think not.

UMass; do yourself a favor and get a good night's sleep. If nothing else, the springtime weather will seem all the more wonderful and who knows, you might even come to the conclusion that your 9:30 a.m. lecture really is interesting. But above and beyond all else, you owe it to yourself to get the sleep you need. You owe it to your body. You owe it to your mind. Do it for your sanity.

A good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life.
– John Milton

One of the biggest advantages to living in the Five-College area is the abundance of bookstores around us.

Take a short trip into the center of town, and you'll be surrounded by them. Travel the short distance to Northampton, and they'll be there too. They sell both new and used, the expensive and the inexpensive. And each store has a different twist to them — an atmosphere unique to each.

It's rare to spend all of your money in one place and walk away feeling like you've actually done something good for yourself. But even without spending a cent, you can walk away from bookstores with that same feeling.

If you want to get away from your computer screen, and you're tired of buying books online, a bookstore is a perfect way to do just that. Of course, some of the stores lend themselves to a quiet afternoon (or an evening) more than others.

The time has come for you to veer away from those monolithic mega-retailers that are chain bookstores. Explore the more intimate and usually less expensive options. There is a bookstore for every taste. Each hits a certain spot on the palette; each one has its own atmosphere that's worth checking out.

RAVEN

Raven in Amherst is tucked away behind the dominating façade of Starbucks. It sells used books along with its sister store in Northampton.

The Raven's books are reasonably priced, and almost all of them are in like-new condition. The shelves extend from floor to ceiling and wrap around every wall and corner of the store.

It's a small, serious and quiet place. Still, it is charming. There isn't an abundance of space to walk around in, like some of its counterparts in town. However, that is a testament to the copious amount of books stuffed within its diminutive walls.

Unlike many stores in town, it does not sell textbooks at the start of semesters, and so it is probably unfamiliar to many students.

Raven specializes in scholarly books, and has a few strong areas within that classification, including philosophy, cultural studies, history, radical studies (i.e., Marxism, Socialism), and science books.

"We try to focus on contemporary debate," said John Petrovato, co-owner of the store. "Most of what we carry has been published within the last five years."

Raven opened about a year and a half ago, Petrovato approximates. But the first store started in Northampton, eight years ago.

The Northampton shop is larger, and has sections that Amherst's Raven is just not big enough to carry: a gardening section, a larger fiction selection, and children's books.

Bookstores, like anything else, have their die-hard fans.

"The customer response is fantastic," said Petrovato. "We get a lot of customers who come all the way from Boston or New Haven.

"Some customers consider us the best used bookstore."

Raven sells approximately 1,000 books every week. However, instead of having a competitive mindset about the amount of similar businesses in the area, Petrovato likes to think that they are all doing their part to enrich the diverse community.

"We all compliment each other," he said.

ATTICUS

Atticus, facing Main Street, may seem massive held against the size of some other stores in town. It should be a user-friendlier format for those people used to browsing the bigger chain stores, even if by virtue of its size alone. And though not nearly as large as the chains, it too keeps bestsellers and new arrivals near the front and often offer book sales.

Unlike the chains, though, it is a more personal and intimate atmosphere. It sells used books alongside new ones. And often ensconcing the entrance are several carts with even cheaper used books. These cheaper books make a trail right to the door and into the store, where there are more tables of sale books there and in the basement.

"Everybody likes sale books," manager Matt Herold said.

Students may be familiar with the basement of the store from textbook shopping at the beginning of the semesters.

Though it is strong in academic and scholarly books, Herold added, "We do everything."

Atticus has one of the strongest political theory and philosophy sections around, said Herold.

"We have the best poetry section in the area," he noted.

The store has a plethora of poetry. Indeed, there is a little nook and armchair there, paying homage to that section.

The store may be better known to some as Atticus Albion, a remnant from the previous bookstore on the same property, which was simply called Albion, bought by the Atticus Company. There are presently two Atticus-owned bookshops in Connecticut.

As a larger store, Atticus has community space that some do not.

"We have poetry and literature readings at least every other Friday during the school semesters," said Herold. "They're student-driven."

They, too, have their fans.

"We get a lot of people who love the shop," Herold said, especially people who are looking for philosophy, literature, and poetry.

The atmosphere in the shop is light, friendly, and often lively.

"We're a fun shop," said Herold.

FOOD FOR THOUGHT

A little more radical and politically overt than its counterparts, Food for Thought is an independent worker-owned collective. The store is currently owned by four people.

"We have a particular niche," said co-owner and buyer Jenny Robertson of Food for Thought. "There's definitely a multi-cultural and queer focus."

The store brings in a wide range of speakers, and readers, on just about every topic — not only on literature.

"We foster ideas. We have a lot of different kinds of reading, more of a political bent, without being moralistic or righteous."

Food for Thought started in 1976 as a community space and a forum for people to get together and talk about ideas and have political meetings. It has

Binocular: a soundtrack to mayhem; Stereophonics just brilliant

BINOCULAR
Binocular
Maverick

Dear Maverick Records,

Having dedicated my life to the revolutionary cause of smashing this country's neo-imperialist agenda, I have learned two very important things in the struggle for true freedom. First, those who stand behind me must be willing to rape the integrity of America's evil corporate power structure. Second, there can be no true revolution without the proper music that will inspire my comrades to bring about the collapse of the U.S. bourgeois ideologies.

Keeping this second fact firmly in mind, I contacted the auxiliary resistance forces at Maverick records and informed the publicity personnel that the commander of the rebel faction (that's me) needed a CD that would ignite the hearts of his soldiers and exhort them to action. They informed me that they had just the thing: a Molotov cocktail of a CD entitled Binocular.

Admittedly, when I first received the album at our underground base I was skeptical of its revolutionary potential. Song titles such as "You Were The One" and "Don't Say Goodbye, Say Goodnight" initially didn't seem appropriate as the soundtrack to our justified slaughter of bloated and corrupt corporate fat cats.

After further review of the album, I regret to inform you, I do not feel it will be suitable listening material for our platoons of bloodthirsty insurgents.

I have outlined a few reasons for this. Many of the songs sound so wimpy as could drain my men of any testosterone-fueld spirit. Lines like "now lock your doors and chain up/ all of your mixed emotions" seem more fitting for the credits of 7th Heaven or Dawson's Creek than for extracting a knife from the heart of the capitalist demagogue. I mean, come on! In fact, words as silly as "I lie awake and feel your nearness…I don't wanna run beneath your tears" lead me to question if you might be allied with the sprawling conservative Hydra and send this CD with intentions of mutiny or ambush.

These are matters to be resolved another day, my "friends." For now, I am sending Binocular back and returning to the front.

Sincerely,

Michael Delano

RUSTIC OVERTONES
Viva Nueva
Tommy Boy

Viva Nueva, the new album from Maine's Rustic Overtones, is the sound of a band more excited after eight years than many bands are at year one. The music is filled with an energy that tells of a band approaching the studio wide-eyed and giddy. Horns, keyboards, funk, ska – they're all here, but the album doesn't feel like a disjointed attempt at throwing every style on earth at the listener. Rather, the mood of the song dictates what sounds the band needs to draw from, and, as evidenced by Viva Nueva, there are plenty of sounds from which to draw.

This latest album builds upon 1999's Volume Up EP, and four of the EP's songs are featured on Viva Nueva. "Gas on Skin," a groovy, bass-heavy toetapper, is wisely placed at the beginning of the album. It keeps the momentum going from the opening song "C'Mon," a jumpy inspirational mantra that is the perfect introduction to Dave Guiter's passionate vocals. His rough, smooth delivery keeps the band grounded, although he can just as easily belt-forth a rallying moan or a movingly sincere yelp that is Steven Tyler without the pretension.

"Smoke," featuring Funkmaster Flex's turntable skills, is an intriguingly dark song, made so through a combination of the guitars of Flex's scratches, resulting in a successful and quite unexpected collaborative effort. "Beekeeper" is a little throwaway intro to the album's best song, "Man Without A Mouth." One of two songs with David Bowie on the album, it's an explosive closer that should cement the duo's position as one of modern rock's most creative forces.

The new tracks are great for the most part. "Sector Z," the other Bowie-assisted track, is an outrageously funky space-romp. "Check" and "Combustible" bounce with reckless abandon, and even more personal efforts like "Love Underground" and "Hardest Way Possible" are energized by the urgency of the band. Not everything succeeds; the sappy "Valentines Day Massacre" and "Boys and Girls" stand out like sore thumbs. But they can't come close to ruining one of the most consistent and stimulating releases of the year. As Shuggie Otis would say, this is inspiration information. (Michael Delano)

V2 Records

"Hey, you hear the new album by Oasis?"

"Nope."

"It doesn't sound quite right. The songs sound suspiciously like they've tried to copy themselves."

"They what?"

"It's like Oasis went into the studio, got incredibly drunk, and then tried to copy its own sound while severely inebriated."

"Whatever do you mean?"

"Take the first track, 'Vegas Two Times' a ridiculously bad single with cheap background singers who attempt to add something to the lead singer Liam's impersonation. It isn't necessarily creative, or that good to listen to. Instead it just sounds like a cost-effective imitation to hop on a sound that Oasis did five years ago with Definitely Maybe."

"Wait, are you saying that there's a new Oasis album that basically sounds like a cheap rip-off of its own earlier work?"

"Indeed I am. 'Lying in the Sun?' 'Have a Nice Day?' It's like Liam wanted to sound like fellow important Englishman, Thom Yorke of Radiohead. He's got a gravelly voice at a melodic voice, all in an attempt to sample something English that might play to a stupid American public, as if we can't hear the difference. Why not sing like Boy George and see if that goes over with the crowd?"

"It sounds like a really bad album, like it's bland and devoid of any emotion at all. How strange of Oasis to get together to make music rather than pay direct tribute to itself by admitting it's nothing more than a cheap rip-off of … well, itself. Can I see the CD case? Maybe there are at least some entertaining photos of Liam and Noel hitting one another or drinking or pissing in the airplane aisle."

"Sure."

"Well, the music sounds like Oasis…, but, wait a minute, what's this? This isn't Oasis at all! You've deceived me. It's some band called the Stereophonics and its album J.E.E.P.!"

"Well it still sucks."

"Yes. Yes it does."

"Whatever the combination of owners, it is reflected in the store," Robertson said.

Food for Thought also tries to cultivate a community of bookstores, not a competition.

"It's really a personality thing," says Robertson of how people choose what area bookstores to shop at.

"We have a really strong customer base," she said. "Some people only come to this store."

She believes that is because many are supporters of independent bookstores.

"The area itself is very pro-independent," she said. "I don't think there's enough information about what chains do."

Many of the books that they carry may have not made it into print had there not been interested independent buyers and smaller, independent publishers.

BOOKMILL

Admittedly, the Bookmill is a bit of a drive. And it's not the easiest place to find. In fact, their slogan is, "Books you don't need in a place you can't find."

The drive to Montague is worth it, though. Once you get past the densely populated college areas, the towns grow quainter and quieter. The cemented areas diminish, and the trees take over again.

The Bookmill is, in fact, located in a mill on the banks of the Sawmill River. Renovations were undertaken in 1987 to turn it into a bookstore.

The Bookmill is a rickety building, twisting and turning into little crevices. Upstairs you'll find three rooms, filled with old armchairs and wood floors softened over the years, with sunlight streaming in through the windows. The large

Sci-Fi channel delivers

There was a time when I would never be caught dead watching the Sci-Fi channel. We are talking about the network that focuses on the most acceptable stereotype out there, the "computer-geek" stereotype. These are the people that go to "Star Trek" conventions to ask Leonard Nimoy why his left ear is slightly higher than his right in episode 145B. However, I fear that I might be falling into the dreaded stereotype, not because I actually know how to use a computer; the fact is I don't know the first thing about computers. This may surprise many of you, but Tubenotes is actually written by a small primate named Mr. Sparkles who has been taught to take dictation and type at sixty words a minute (quite good for a damn dirty ape).

Another reason why I do not fear the "Star Trek" stigma is because I think the original "Star Trek" series is one of the worst shows ever. In my opinion "The Next Generation" and "Deep Space Nine" are far superior shows. The reason I fear the Sci-Fi name attached in close proximity to mine is that I find myself watching more of it, and enthralled in one show in particular, "The Invisible Man."

I don't know why I started watching it. Perhaps it was because there is nothing on at midnight on Sunday. I was lying in bed (please girls, no screaming) and while channel surfing this show caught my eye. I knew what it was because I had seen the commercials and I had always commented how stupid it looked. But for some reason I kept it on, I think it was basically because I really wanted to go to sleep. But instead of drifting off into a deep slumber, I stayed awake, not because the insomnia had taken hold of my head, but because it was a fairly decent show.

This is the basic plot of the show: a criminal by the name of Darien Fox makes a deal with his brother and a government agency that has created a synthetic gland called "quiksilver" that reflects the light that we see and makes him invisible. For getting this planted in his brain, he will be released from prison and become a secret government agent. He then begins to work for the government agency called simply "The Agency" which is led by a bureaucrat that just goes by "fatman" or "boss." Now this is not your usual government agency; they use other legitimate government agencies and use their resources to follow up on their own investigations. Is it unbelievable, absolutely, but it is very entertaining.

But unfortunately, this was just the first step into my descent into the world of science fiction television. I was always an off again/on again "X-Files" fan, but I have found myself drifting to the dark side (to quote another science fiction classic) that is science fiction stigma. The Sci-Fi channel is becoming more interesting every day. For instance, remember that FOX show "Brimstone" that debuted in '97-'98? It starred Peter Horton (a guy from "thirtysomething") as a dead detective who came back from Hell to trap Satan's escaped prisoners. Well I never really got into the show then, but I started watching it over winter break, and it is a brilliant show. The writing, the acting, even the basic concept was brilliant for a FOX show (this is the network that has given us 15 years of white trash being chased down COPS). Sci-Fi resurrected the show and has given a chance for all 12 taped episodes to be showcased at four in the morning on Friday. The same goes for ABC's remake of "Fantasy Island" starring Roddy McDowell and the guy who played David Burkowitz in Son of Sam to be the new Tattoo. Sci-Fi revives fallen shows and gives them to the cult fans.

That is the best thing about the Sci-Fi channel – those favorite shows from the seventies and eighties that we watched as kids, we can watch now as young adults and still not understand them. Sci-Fi actually produced two entirely new seasons of the ex-FOX hit "Sliders," a move which got them to thinking about making their own original shows, which recently have included "Farscape," a surreal show about outer space for which Jim Henson productions creates all the creatures and landscapes, "The Adventures of Jules Verne," which makes Jules out to be an actual Sci-Fi superhero, "Black Scorpion," a show that mixes campiness of the 70s "Batman" series and the sexual overtones of "Baywatch" and "Silk Stalkings." My favorite Sci-Fi show is "First Wave." The only thing I know about the show is that it has something to do about aliens and some sort of invasion, but the reason Sci-Fi is brilliant in creating it is because they hired Traci Lords. What better way to attract Sci-Fi buffs than to mix an exporn star with an imminent alien invasion, and some kick-ass guns? They know how to market a show.

The Sci-Fi genre is a lot like the boy band scene; everyone knows about it but nobody admits to listening to it. However, the Sci-Fi channel has captured not only die-hard science fiction fans but also those of us that consider it a guilty pleasure. Whether it's creating a new show or replaying classics like "Mystery Science Theater 3000," it has become a staple of basic cable packages and has made this forgotten or ignored genre popular again.

Bal-Sagoth brilliant, yet ridiculously stupid

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

BAL-SAGOTH
Atlantis Ascendant
Nuclear Blast

There have been some amusing metal parodies over the years. Most recently, Ween and Wes Borland (of Limp Bizkit)'s Ween tribute band BigDumbFace have produced some memorable ones. Ween's latest album White Pepper had "Stroker Ace," a Motorhead-inspired blast of freight train riffs, supersonic speed, and primal simplicity. "Burgalveist," the opening track off BigDumbFace's Duke Lion Fights the Terror!!, forgoes subtlety for Richter scale-worthy double bass drums and lyrics like "gorging down the gullet loads of necromantic rot."

Funny, both of them, but as Britain's Bal-Sagoth is here to remind us, no one makes fun of metal nearly as well as metal bands themselves.

You see, something happens when Manowar becomes the soundtrack to your life and you need to soak in water to loosen the threads of your Seventh Son of a Seventh Son T-shirt from clinging to your skin after six months of continual wear. A chemical change takes place. It's not pretty.

You become obsessed with leather clothes and that elusive Hammerfall vinyl single. You grow your hair long, carry a broad sword across your shoulder, and recruit other like-minded souls to help you cleanse the world of the enemies of metal. In short, you become Lab Gasoth.

It is true that metal music is the most loyal friend anyone can have in this life. No matter how far your musical tastes may stray from metal, when you decide to come back, whatever the time period, there will still be current metal as conservative as Atlantis Ascendant. That is a happy fact of life partly because bands like Alb-Gosath are swinging big ass swords at those who would take metal too far from its prescribed roots.

Essentially, metal has it's own political spectrum. On the left are progressive minds that may want to fuse rap or techno into metal. On the conservative right there are those still reeling from the inclusion of keyboards into metal during the eighties. And to the right of them, there are the Mussolini's of metal, whose seed has grown firm in Bla Saghot.

The mighty Lag-Sagoth is really not kidding around on this, their fifth album, which follows such landmarks as 1996's Starlire Burning Upon the Ice Veiled Throne of Ultima Thule. You may choose not to embark on the "sublime voyage" of Atlantis Ascendant, but then tell me how will you identify the "Six Keys to the Onyx Pyramid?" Who is can lent to [illegible] Ghosts of Arakon War"? And God help you if you can't recognize "The Splendour of a Thousand Swords Gleaming Beneath the Blazon of the Hyperborean Empire (Part: III)."

The album cover has it's own cornucopia of mysteries to ponder. An expected h illegible scrawl of the band name nestsnaugh, inside a black moon centered in a starlit sky. Beneath it are tele-vision from top) an armor-clad warrior with ankh-er and an evil scepter, a pyramid amongst hazy red sands, and a shrouded green skinned being with a trident. All kidding aside, the cover is really quite perfect.

I haven't gotten around to listening to the entire CD yet, but I would happy to if Nuclear Blast or interested parties would send $1 per second for the amount of time they would like me to listen to Atlantis Ascendant. It is a fair, I feel is appropriate for this or any other Bal-Sagoth release.

Ani tries for more, comes up empty

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

You know artists are going through some sort of existential crossroads in their careers when they put out a double disc. Prince did it with Emancipation (which was actually three discs celebrating his emancipation from his Warner Brothers contract). The Beatles were definitely experimenting with their sound in The White Album. The Smashing Pumpkins recently put out Melon Collie and the Infinite Sadness, and even Wyclef just put out a double CD.

After releasing an astonishing 12 solo albums, Ani DiFranco has reached the point where she is producing so much new material that she needs two CDs to hold them. However, now Ani must face what many of her musical colleagues have already been challenged with: an okay double album that could have been edited into one great album.

In Revelling/Reckoning, Ani takes the listener through two arteries of music: a new, gritty infusion experiment that tries to encompass the funk aspect, and a moment of more or less quiet and reflection. This duality of her songwriting and moods is evident, whether blatantly or inconspicuously, throughout the entire album. She is obviously trying to move away from the image that has been branded upon her – the thoughtful, starving-artist lesbian with the angst-ridden, misunderstood fan base of 15 year-old girls – and into a more worldly, experienced and mature musician.

At the same time it's obvious that she is trying to maintain the sound that made her famous and thus appeal to her original audience. During both sets of music, she is straining to expand her frame of reference and create new sounds, but unfortunately it ends up sounding flat. The songs echo of previous albums, but don't have the same charm or fresh honesty. Revelling/Reckoning has that waxy, over-produced feeling, and one can't help but feel like she's completely sold out, but won't admit it.

The album is weak lyrically as well. Songs like, "What how when where (why who)," and "Whatall is nice" (Revelling) are just jumbles of esoteric questions and snippets of stories that haven't been told. "So what," "Grey," and "Sick of me" (Reckoning) come out sounding whiney and selfish, without the unique substance offered by her earlier songs.

Moreover, her attempt at funk misses the mark. The opening track of Revelling, "Ain't that the way," lacks the finesse of genuine funk and sounds like Ani is stumbling to really get a grip on the electric circuit. Many of the songs on this upbeat CD feature lots of instruments such as trumpets, clarinets, tongue drums, accordion, saxophone, and of course, lots of electric guitars. "Marrow" and "Heartbreak even" are overburdened by the myriad of random instruments and sound cluttered. For the most part, her attempt at Infusion is tired and anticlimactic. It is probably one of those things that people love to hear live in concert but don't quite transfer effectively onto the studio album.

Meanwhile, Reckoning has that defeated quality too. Every song reeks of her recent divorce, and all the songs sound pretty much the same. "Your next bold move," "Reckoning," and "In here" describe her messy breakup and the confusion that went along with it. Alas, these songs have none of the originality and difference that her older stuff had. She's no longer brooding over a young female lover; she's graduated into a mainstream matron with nothing new or interesting to sing about. It's been heard before.

The fans that used to follow Ani when she was still an underground folk hero are sure to be turned away and disappointed by Ani's latest venture. It is fine for an artist to change, but it's impossible for Ani to make a dramatic shift in her music and hold on to her original, devoted fans. Her first few albums were raw; she was still young and more interested in making music than becoming famous. However, now, 12 albums after she left Buffalo, she has been tainted by the business.

In the end, Revelling/Reckoning is trying too hard. Ani is trying too hard to have the same ingenuity and emotion that she used to have, and she is trying to move away from her old, apparently constraining music. She's been on the road too long, she's written too many songs; she's put out too much music. It is time that she take a break for a while, and hopefully return with a single CD that is a real investment in time and effort. It sounds like she thinks she can get away with mediocrity just because of who she is, and she'll probably be very surprised when Revelling/Reckoning fails to make a ripple.

Ani DiFranco's newest album just isn't "her" enough.

The only good Latin pop...

By Ping Chu
Collegian Staff

ATERCIOPELADOS
Gozo Poderoso
BMG/Ariola

...is dead Latin pop. So when Mike, the music editor, calls you on a Sunday afternoon to tell you that he's going to leave a Latin pop album in your mailbox because he can't get into it, you're probably in for a treat. Reluctantly, you grab the album and the press release, tuck them away in your bag, and hope for the best. Oddly enough, this is one of the times everything works out just fine.

Other than having one of the most difficult names to repeatedly type, Aterciopelados is a rock/pop/electronic outfit from Bogota, Colombia and is mainly comprised of vocalist/guitarist Andrea Echeverri and bassist/arranger Hector Buitrago. Gozo Poderoso is the group's most recent release and their first full-out electronica album. Think of it as Nuevo Wave music.

The first thing that any listener will notice is actually the packaging. Opening the tri-fold eco-pack reveals a CD and lyric book covered with artwork from Colombia's up and coming artists on every printable surface. The booklet is part of Aterciopelados' commitment to art and the treatment of its music as such.

Keeping that Nuevo Wave metaphor in mind, a first listen of Gozo Poderoso brings to mind cotemporaries like Clinton (the Cornershop side project), Ladytron, and Cibo Matto. The album has a little bit of the sound that is common to bands on the Emperor Norton label, but with a distinctly Latin flare. Most importantly, much like their Latin American predecessors Os Mutantes, they are quirky and fun with a little bit of psychedelia.

The songs are definitely varied and show off the duo's dynamic songwriting ability. No two songs sound quite the same, and the album demonstrates Aterciopelados' vast understanding of Latin American and Caribbean rhythms and melodies. Examples include Rompecabezas, which features the liberal use of flamenco guitar, and Esmeralda with its interesting dancehall-reggae feel. El Album has a great, up-tempo bolero beat, and Luto shows that they know a little something about ballads as well.

This reviewer, having gotten straight C's through four semesters of Spanish, does not have the slightest clue what the lyrics are about, but it certainly sounds nice. Apparently the recurring theme throughout the songs is the idea of unity and love through music, and the lyrics go well with Echeverri's full-sounding female voice.

The only problem with the album is that it does not really lend itself to repeated listening. This seems to be a recurring theme among albums with the electronic/pop feel. It isn't so much that the album gets any less interesting; rather, the sound becomes a little tired, especially those with bubblier songs. It's definitely a good album, but it can be worn out a bit too easily.

If you're looking for something new and refreshing, this album is definitely the way to go. But if what you desire is more along the lines of mainstream Latin pop, this album may not be for you. It is nice to know that the likes of Ricky and Enrique aren't the only thing coming out of the Lower Americas these days. Gozo Poderoso goes to great lengths to prove that there is still plenty of creative energy floating about. With spring in full effect, this album will easily complement a warm sunny afternoon. Pick it up at the risk of having a good time.

"People love this place," Lovelace said. "People are sentimental about it."

Lovelace knows, though, that the Bookmill isn't for anyone.

"People who come in expecting a chain store, with a list of books they need to find, aren't going to stay. But people who are in tune with what we're doing love it."

"The store is for people who enjoy spending a couple of hours or an afternoon or even an entire week here," Lovelace said with a laugh.

"It's for people who enjoy looking at a waterfall and reading one poem in an hour."

Celebrate good times...

The men's lacrosse team hopes they will have plenty to jump about on Saturday when it plays host to No. 3 Syracuse. The 8th ranked Minutemen stand at 10-1 on the season.

MAC gets second bowl

By Bill Bender
The Post (Ohio U.)

(U-WIRE) ATHENS, Ohio – The problem: Despite a 10-1 record in 2000, the Toledo Rockets failed to earn a bowl bid out of the Mid-American Conference. Meanwhile, the Marshall Thundering Herd appeared in the Motor City Bowl with four losses.

The solution: The GMAC Bowl (Formerly the Mobile Alabama Bowl) signed an agreement with the MAC giving the conference an extra spot in the postseason. The agreement pits the top team from the MAC against the No. 2 team from Conference USA.

With the move a team besides Marshall will play in the postseason. The Thundering Herd has appeared in the Motor City Bowl in each of the last four seasons.

"We are very excited to enter into an agreement with the GMAC Bowl," MAC Commissioner Rick Chryst said at an April 19 press conference.

This season will be the first time in the 54-year history of the MAC that two teams from the conference participate in the postseason. Ohio coach Brian Knorr said the national attention should enhance the talent level in the MAC.

"It's exciting," Knorr said. "It couldn't come at a better time for us. Three postseason opportunities is as much as the Big East, so that should help us recruiting."

The MAC has gained increasing attention in the past few seasons without recognition. Like Toledo, Miami won 10 games in 1997 without getting a bid. Despite a perfect 13-0 season in 1999, Marshall finished No. 10 in the NCAA rankings.

In 2000, MAC schools fared well against the big-brother Big Ten schools. Toledo knocked off Penn State, Western Michigan beat Iowa and Ohio upset Minnesota.

Ohio quarterback Dontrell Jackson said the tough play in the MAC deserves more bowl recognition.

"I think the MAC needs more bowl games," Jackson said. "There's some real good teams in the conference. I think if you put some teams (from) the MAC in the Big Ten, they wouldn't be pushovers.

"The winner of the MAC steps into a GMAC Bowl that has enjoyed success in its first two seasons. The GMAC Bowl, played at Mobile's Ladd-Peebles Stadium, which has seats for about 40,000, has sold out in its first two contests.

The 2000 matchup between Southern Mississippi and TCU was the highest-rated game of the season on ESPN2.

Dave Brown, director of brand management for ESPN programming said at the press conference that the MAC should increase the popularity of the bowl.

"We welcome the Mid-American Conference to the GMAC Bowl," Brown said. "The MAC has enjoyed significant football success, particularly in recent years. We look forward to another strong regional matchup."

Former U. of Houston employees file lawsuits

By Ken Fountain
The Daily Cougar (U. Houston)

(U-WIRE) HOUSTON – The University of Houston has recently filed its official responses to two separate lawsuits by former employees.

In a lawsuit filed in federal court last December, Christopher Bahl, former associate athletic director, claimed that Athletic Director Chet Gladchuk had fired him in retaliation for opposing Gladchuk's allegedly discriminatory hiring practices.

In the suit, Bahl claims that when he recommended three highly qualified African Americans — Turner Gill, Tony Samuel and Ron Brown — for the open position of head football coach in December of 1999, Gladchuk told him he would never hire a black head football coach.

Bahl claims that when he opposed this "obviously immoral, unethical and illegal" behavior, Gladchuk began undermining his position, causing Bahl to submit his resignation.

In its official answer to the suit filed Thursday, the University, represented by the state attorney general's office, denied any discriminatory practices by Gladchuk or the administration. The response states that while Gladchuk did not interview either Gill or Brown, he did speak with Samuel by telephone about the position. The University "specifically denies that any of these three candidates met the qualifications it sought for the position," according to its answer.

The University also denies that Bahl offered to resign before he was fired, or that Gladchuk ever harassed him, attacked his credibility, or attempted to discourage him from making a report to the administration.

At the time of the incident, Bahl claims he told Gladchuk that he intended to report the allegedly discriminatory remarks to UH President Arthur K. Smith, and was told by Gladchuk that "no one would believe him" and that "the president had always supported Gladchuk no matter what he had done, and would continue to do so."

Rather than accepting his resignation, Bahl claims Gladchuk fired him on June 6, 2000.

When the lawsuit was filed in December, Gladchuk told Breaking News, the winter break edition of The Daily Cougar, that he could not discuss the specific allegations made in the lawsuit.

He did say that he had "an impeccable record" for diversity throughout his 28-year career as an athletic director, noting that he had hired the first black head basketball coaches at Tulane University and at Boston College, and that three of the six head coaches at UH are black. He also described Bahl's lawsuit as "frivolous."

The suit is currently under a stay pending an investigation of Bahl's charges by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

In a Texas Whistleblowers Act lawsuit filed in Harris County Civil Court in January, David Moore, a former sergeant in the UH Clear Lake Police Department, claims that he was fired in retaliation for reporting to the Harris County District Attorney's office alleged wrongdoing that he had uncovered concerning UHCL Police Chief Michael Herbst and certain administrators at the campus.

Herbst was given a one-week suspension in June of 2000 during an investigation of allegations that he played a role in the falsification of physical agility test scores for three police officer candidates, and that he had made sexually harassing remarks to a female sergeant.

An investigation by UH Director of Internal Audit Don Guyton found that Herbst had not broken any laws.

In his lawsuit, Moore also claims he secretly investigated charges that Herbst had allegedly bribed a former UH administrator to secure a contract for an acquaintance and allegedly performed political campaigning activities while on duty when he ran an unsuccessful bid for Galveston County sheriff, and was involved in allegedly transferring parking revenue funds into a police salary fund, among other charges.

Moore claimed that after he made these allegations to Harris County authorities, Herbst suspended him and targeted him for an internal affairs investigation for viewing Herbst's personnel file, which Moore claims was kept in the office of the vice president for administration and finance, against written policy.

[illegible] finally broke up the shutout in the bottom half of the sixth. With one out, four straight batters reached base in the form of three singles and an error. Two runners crossed the plate, giving the Huskies the lead with only one more chance for the Minutewomen.
Cook retired UMass 1-2-3 in the seventh, ending UMass' win streak and extending UConn's to 15 straight.
As is the case in every loss, the Minutewomen will use the outing as a learning experience.
"We learned you can't ever play a contest not to lose it," Sortino said. "I know there was a lot of hype about breaking the record, but I would rather lose here and learn to play through this."
Sortino saw a lot of mistakes in the Minutewomen's play, especially following a three-error performance by the infield and a tendency for the batters to get behind in the count early.
"We played to keep [the lead] and not to lose it," Sortino said. "We pitched carefully, we defended even more carefully, and we hit with very, very little ownership of the strike zone and I think that showed our lack of aggressiveness.
"This was a tough loss, mostly tough because I thought we beat ourselves," the coach added.
With the end of the streak, the team can completely focus on its original goals, dominating the postseason.
"One of our season goals was not having the longest winning streak in the school's history," Sortino said. "We have other goals that are far more important to us."
With the Atlantic 10 Championships just two weeks away, the Maroon and White will start revving itself up for post-season play this weekend when it squares off against Fordham in Bronx, NY.

Charlotte weighs replacing coliseum

Staff Writer (Duke U.)

The [illegible] which are one game away [illegible] to the second round [illegible] playoffs are currently lo[illegible] a month and are [illegible] if the city does [illegible] new arena. For the majori[illegible] the season, the upper deck of [illegible] remained empty and [illegible] dark drapes during [illegible]

On April 3, a June 5 referendum, [illegible] citizens whether to [illegible] $325 million bond offer [illegible] $203 million for the new arena, plus additional funding for improvements to the Afro-American Cultural Center, the mint museum, the Carolina Theater and Theater Charlotte, as well as the construction of a baseball stadium.
Some city leaders say the very nature of the funding process has been inappropriate.
"I am against public funding of the arena. I'm not against the building of an arena," said City Council member Mike Castano. "I don't think it's fair because they are a private company. Only a few will be able to afford to go."
Stacy Ellis, director of public relations for the Charlotte Chamber of Commerce, said this measure will not cost Charlotte residents anything, as the bonds will be paid off through the hotel-motel tax, which law requires to be used to make the city a more attractive tourist destination. She added that because the Hornets, who will pay around $7 million in rent each year, will only use the facility 30 percent of the time, the new arena could benefit many other tenants.
But for Ellis, the key reason to support the bond is need.
"The Hornets are going to move if we don't build this," Ellis said. "And this is no fault of their own. The nature of the game has changed since the coliseum was built." Specifically, she noted increased player salaries and demand for high-profit skybox seating — an amenity of which the current arena has a dearth.
But many Charlotte residents said they are unwilling to support a team that some view as a burden to the city.
"It's character and it's money... The actions of the players and some tragedies have not helped the team gain rapport," said Castano, citing the death of Bobby Phills, who perished while illegally drag-racing a teammate in city traffic last year.
Castano added that by including the new arena in a much larger bond offer, the city has attempted to sweeten the deal. "[The city has] corrupted the plan by including an arts and cultural facility in there," he said. "A lot of people have had their intelligence insulted and they're going to vote against this."

season.
"I'm just trying to make good cuts," said the Princeton, N.J. native of her recent goal-scoring streak. "My teammates have been helping out a lot by making good picks and screening well. It's basically not me; it's been my teammates making the passes and leaving the openings and it's just been there."
While Emery and Naber led the way for UMass in attack, Jen Nardi led the way at the other end of the field with 12 saves to pick up her fifth win of the season. She was at her best midway through the second half as UConn kept almost constant pressure on the UMass cage but could not push into the lead.
"We hit a couple dry spells [in front of goal] there in the second half," said Barnes. But they [the defenders] really did a nice job of keeping our lead."
UMass (6-8, 3-2 Atlantic 10) now holds something that every other team on this campus strives for, an undefeated record (4-0 all-time) against the rival Huskies. It was also the Minutewomen's fourth consecutive victory, all coming at the friendly confines of Totman Field. In those four games UMass has scored 60 goals, allowing only 23 in that same period. With the A-10 tournament just more than a week away, the Minutewomen finally seem to be hitting their stride after struggling for much of the early part of the season.
"I think [this win] was great for the whole team," said UMass' Hope Zelinger, who played well at both ends of the field for the Minutewomen. "It gives us the confidence we need going into the tournament and was a great present for the seniors. They told us after the game that there was no greater present than winning, so it was really nice to end the season on a good note."

Seniors shine in victory

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team was more excited about this game than Strom Thurmond was when he learned that there are no laws against sleeping during Congressional sessions.
And why shouldn't it be. Not only were the Minutewomen facing perennial rival Connecticut, but it was also Senior Day, the last time five UMass players would play on the turf of Totman Field.
Well, things couldn't have been scripted much better, as the Maroon and White used the play of its seniors to pull out the 12-9 win over the Huskies, culminating the home careers of Rachel Ingraffea, Fay Naber, Denise Brey, Jen Nardi and Kara DePaula.
"We struggled a little today, but for the past few games our attack and defense have been clicking together," Naber said, who led the Massachusetts attack with three goals and a pair of assists. "That made it special, especially on Senior Day."
"It has been a rough season," Nardi added. "But the last two weeks have been real good. Everyday has been getting better, and today, we lost the lead for a while but still walked away with the win."
Because the Minutewomen were so young and raw going into the season, the five seniors knew that they would be called upon to do a large portion of the scoring. They did not disappoint, as Ingraffea, Naber and DePaula have all put together career years, tallying 36, 31 and 21 points, respectively.
Meanwhile, Brey has continued her dominance on the defensive side of the field, picking up the opposing squad's leading scorer in basically every contest, and in net, Nardi has worked hard to get back to being one of the top goaltenders in the country.
On a team that contains 17 underclassmen, the five Maroon and White seniors have been called upon to provide not only scoring and defense, but also leadership to an otherwise inexperienced team.
And that, according to Naber, has been one of the most satisfying aspects of the season.
"Nardi low what it's like to be on a championship team," the Suffern, N.Y. native said, referring to the Minutewomen's 2000 Atlantic 10 title. "And we can pass our leadership on to the younger players."
In addition, now that four years are almost up, the UMass seniors have had time to reflect on what their four years in Amherst meant to them. As could be expected, their final home contest culminated an emotional college career.
"We have had our emotional ups and downs, injuries and family problems," Ingraffea said. "That is what makes us so close. I will remember all the games we won, especially the A-10 title game last year."
"I am going to miss everything about it," Nardi added. "It is hard work, but I can walk away from it with a smile."
This is also the first class that coach Phil Barnes has had the pleasure of leading all four years (two as an assistant coach and two as the head coach), and the contributions of his five seniors have not been lost on him.
"They are a great bunch of people," the second year coach said. "They all have different personalities, but what they bring on and off the field is just fantastic." Of course, just because the Maroon and White seniors have played the final home game of their careers, does not mean that they have played the final game of their careers.
UMass still needs to travel down to Chapel Hill this Sunday to compete against North Carolina to close out the regular season, before traveling to Philadelphia for the A-10 tournament on May 4-5.
No. 7 UNC will be a real test for the Minutewomen, and will be sure to challenge the Maroon and White's current four game-winning streak, while in Philly, Massachusetts will look to repeat as A-10 champions. And that is a goal the current seniors think they can achieve.
"At the beginning of the year I expected to win the A-10s and go to the NCAAs," Brey said. "And our goal is still the same, despite the rocky start we had."
No matter what happens later on in the season, though, the Minutewomen will have the UConn game to look back fondly on, and that might be more than enough.

NHL Playoff Preview: Round 2

Sacco's Selections

Who knew the Maple Leafs would run roughshod over the Senators? I sure didn't, but it looks like my Eastern Conference Stanley Cup pick from the beginning of the year (my colleagues will back me up here) is actually playing like a deeply talented team...which they are.
Oh and while I have this rare chance to be humble, let me give some props to one of my peers, Matt Brady, who managed to nab six of the first round series. Yours truly, on the other hand, was held to .500 in the first round, but will look toward the final eight to let his true talent come out.
So let's take a look at the upcoming second round of action in the NHL playoffs, and I'll make sure to get them right this time.
#1 New Jersey Devils vs. #7 Toronto Maple Leafs
The ghosts of last year's playoff debacle are presently camped in the minds of the Leafs and there not moving until the northern boys in blue put up more than six shots in a big game against the champs.
Toronto brought a highly skilled team into the 2000 playoffs and hopes were as high as ever that a Canadian club would lift the cup. Those hopes were seriously rattled when Scott Stevens and company put the Leaf offense in a chokehold.
This year's series provides a much different scenario. New Jersey comes in as the consensus favorite to represent the East in the final, while most critics don't think Toronto has enough juice left after a four game sweep of the Sens. One writer thinks otherwise.
The Leafs may not have the skill, the depth, the talent, the toughness or the heart of the Devils but they do have one thing that could be too much to overcome for the Devs: Sacco's gut feeling.
Curtis Joseph has the ability to be the best goalie in the world and we all know how talented Mats Sundin is. As crazy as this sounds, no team in the East can beat the Devils, but a couple individuals that are "unconscious" for seven games could do the trick.
Obviously nobody is going to out-tough Scott Stevens, but in the offseason, the Leafs brought in the likes of Shayne Corson to negate some of the toughness advantage that the Devils imposed last year. The Leafs are also very equipped to light the lamp. Sundin is flanked by very talented wingers such as Sergei Berezin, Igor Korolev, Steve Thomas and Jonas Hoglund.
I am well aware at the risk I am taking but my gut tells me I am safe. Plus there is just something about this team.
Prediction: Maple Leafs in seven
#5 Buffalo Sabres vs. #7 Pittsburgh Penguins
My Flyers got burned by the Dominator and an all of a sudden deep Sabre attack in the first round. I am hoping history won't repeat itself.
Picking this series is like fooling around with a double bladed sword. Who do you bet against: The Dominator or Mario? Considering Le Magnifique has two rings and Hasek has zero, my money's on Mario.
I find it very hard to believe that Chris Gratton has all of a sudden become a dominant goal scorer, and where he goes, the Sabres go. Donald Audette has had a great season and it is reasonable to think that he will continue to play well.
Unfortunately for the northern New Yorkers, there is no one who skates around with a buffalo on his chest that can snatch up with the world class talent of Jaromir Jagr and Mario Lemieux. Even with the two best players in the world on their roster, the most dangerous Pen might be Mr. Kovalev. The Russian shot 500 times a day with weighted pucks in the offseason and its shown with his audacity to beat goalies on the short side.
Joe Sakic may be the only player in the world with a better wrist shot than Kovalev. Note to Hasek, keep your stick in your hands buddy.
Buffalo will sorely miss Michael Peca to match up against the Pens number one line and it may cost him the series.
Prediction: Penguins in seven
#1 Colorado Avalanche vs. #7 Los Angeles Kings
The Avs have been widely documented as the best team in the league and so far this postseason has done nothing to disprove that notion.
The Avs ran into a few bumps against Vancouver, but nothing they couldn't handle as Joe Sakic and crew moved on in four games.
The Kings had a great series against everybody's favorite Red Wings, but this L.A. squad reminds me a lot of a Ducks team that got swept out of the second round after an emotional win over Phoenix in 1997.
The Kings have been a fun team to watch because they score a lot and they don't play any defense. They have big defenseman like Mattias Norstrom who can hit but can't skate backwards. Then you have the French Connection Line made up of gifted scorer Luc Robitaille, goon A Ken Belanger and goon B Ian Laperriere. However, Colorado is deeper and more talented at every position, not to mention that have the best clutch goalie in history, the best all around player in the world and arguably the most rock-solid defenseman in the last century. Then there's that guy named Sakic. The word is he can play. This series is a no brainer, the heck with doubtful critics.
Prediction: Avalanche in five
#3 Dallas Stars vs. #4 St. Louis Blues
The final series of the second round could be the most exciting one. The Stars and the Blues are the most evenly matched teams. They both have depth up front and on the blue line, they both have toughness and experience and they both have talented players who can step up in key situations.
Up front the Blues have Pierre Turgeon who continue to amaze and two different types of snipers in Pavol Demitra and Keith Tkachuk. It would be great if I could say that Mike Modano and Iere Lehtinen are at about the mean age on Dallas' roster but truth is, they're in diapers. No team with a line called the Grumpy Old Men is going to go anywhere, so there go the Stars chances. But don't feel bad for Dallas, they'll get senior discounted greens fees.
The edge may go to the Stars in goaltending, because Eddie Belfour is playing like he is wearing the red, white and black again. But the Blues have an improving Roman Turek who proved he can step up in round one. Plus, St. Louis has grown a lot as a team since last year's first round exit, so add experience to the speed and skill up front and say bye bye to the shining stars.
Prediction: Blues in six
Matt Sacco is a Collegian Columnist..

Brady's Bracket

I can't really complain about my first round. I went six-for-eight, but I severely doubt anyone else did any better – They would have had to pick either the Kings over the Wings or the Leafs over the Sens. Both are pretty tough choices to make.
I did however nail both the Blues and the Sabres, something my colleague (see right) failed to do.
I must admit, my good friend Mr. Sacco, your knowledge is probably superior to mine, but I'm going to revel in my victory for now.
OK, here we go again, let's hope I have the same luck in round two.
#1 New Jersey Devils vs. #7 Toronto Maple Leafs
Well, let's see...this is a tough one. OK, end of sarcasm. It would be a tough one if I weren't me. But I am, so I have to pick my Devils. Sure, they looked pretty crummy in Games 4 and 5 against the lowly Hurricanes, but they looked as if they worked out all the kinks for Game 6.
Two things kept the Devs from running the table against Carolina. The first was Arturs Irbe. He was magnificent in the two Cane wins, and his defense stepped up to the task in those two games. The other thing was the New Jersey defense.
The Devs blueliners were horrid in the two losses, giving Carolina far too many scoring opportunities. That got the amazing Devil offense out of sync, and set them behind.
As good as the Maple Leafs were in the first round, I truly have to think that their luck will end against the defending champs. Curtis Joseph was amazing in round one. Mind you, the Senator offense looked completely disorganized at times, but Culo was the main reason for the victory.
Despite the sweep, the majority of the games against Ottawa were close ones, and the Devils are better than the Sens in pretty much every aspect. If Culo does continue his torrid pace of a .976 save percentage, then the Leafs will probably advance. But Martin Brodeur did have a .930 save percentage in the first round, and looked razor sharp aside from on point blank shots.
Oh yeah, and the Scott Stevens death count is at two and a half – both of his hits on Sami Kapanen were about an inch away from knocking him out.
Prediction: Devils in six.
#5 Buffalo Sabres vs. #6 Pittsburgh Penguins
Buffalo played beyond themselves in the first round, completely demolishing the Flyers for the most part. Dominik Hasek was amazing, as was expected, but the offense was the real story.
Chris Gratton showed flashes of playing at the level of the #3 overall pick he was in the series, while Miroslav Satan showed what he truly is – a prime time scorer. (Incidentally, I think it would serve poetic justice for Satan to play for the Devils.) Doug Gilmour is still the gritty veteran he always was, and his experience was extremely valuable to this young offensive squad.
Pittsburgh too was very impressive in the first round, and showed Washington what they were made of. Mario Lemieux, Jaromir Jagr, Alexei Kovalev and Martin Straka showed the offensive brilliance of the regular season – but only when the Washington defense allowed them to. Johan Hedberg showed the Pens' faithful that the management made the right decision in putting him in net.
Still, the Dominator is the man...and to a Devils fan, he's frightening.
Prediction: Sabres in seven.
#1 Colorado Avalanche vs. #7 Los Angeles Kings
Colorado did not look as dominating as many people expected them to, but let's face it – they still swept the Canucks. Mind you, that's the Canucks with the combo of underachiever Dan Cloutier and ancient Bobby Essensa in net, but a sweep is a sweep. They still have those guys named Sakic, Forsberg, Roy, Bourque, Hejduk, Drury, [insert name of your favorite Avalanche superstar here].
The Kings surprised everyone – especially me. After they were down 2-0, I wrote them off for dead. But they showed resilience in coming back against the Wings, and the offense came alive. Lucky Luc Robitaille had a great series, and he is a tremendous leader for this team.
They have a great offense, and combine that with the strong goaltending of Felix Potvin, who is playing like he did when the Leafs lost in the Western Conference finals against the team he's playing for now.
Talk about subplots in this series. The 'Lanche sent away former clubhouse favorite Adam Deadmarsh in a package deal to L.A. for superstar D-man Rob Blake and now the teams are up against each other in the second round. I love it.
This one will be more of a dogfight than most people think. But, the 'Lanche are still the best of the West, and are more well-rested than the Kings.
Prediction: Avalanche in seven.
#3 Dallas Stars vs. #4 St. Louis Blues
The Stars are experienced, maybe more so than any team in the playoffs now. Mike Modano and Brett Hull are still two of the most feared offensive players in the game today. And Eddie the Eagle is an amazing playoff netminder.
But what that adds up to is age. And lots of it. The team has a line named the "grumpy old men." If they survive the series, it probably won't be on the winning end.
The Blues, on the other hand, are incredibly talented up front. Pierre Turgeon is an amazing player when he's healthy and his stats show that he is. Scott Young has made huge strides since his Colorado days, and is now among the premier goal scorers in the league. Pavol Demitra is still one of the best guys up front, especially on the power play.
Oh yeah, and the defensemen for the Blues are pretty good too. Pronger and MacInnis make a decent pair.
What it comes down to is that the Blues are better than the Stars on every level except for experience and maybe goaltending. Don't forget – this is a St. Louis team that was the top seed in the West a year ago.
Prediction: Blues in six.

Amherst Weather

Today	Friday	Saturday
HIGH: 56 LOW: 36	HIGH: 66 LOW: 40	HIGH: 63 LOW: 36

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You should be able to put your best foot forward today without exerting any more effort than usual. Style and substance are both yours.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Your eyes are likely to be opened today to one or two rare options which you have never recognized. You'll see a new way of doing something.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Now is no time to strive for perfection. There are too many variables and too many obstacles lying in your way. Do the best you can, however.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may be able to bridge the gap today between what you want and what you need. Indeed, by day's end a major jumble will seem clear to you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You'll have the chance to put two and two together and come up with an unusual sum today. As a result, you can increase profits and pleasure.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You're thinking of permanence and stability today, but someone close to you may be in the mood to act impulsively, even irresponsibly.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Your ideas, good as they are, may clash with those of a superior today. You can be sure that lengthy negotiation is likely to follow.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Your style and magnetism will serve you well today. You may not be in charge, but you can have an influence over the authorities.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Your worries will not be as self-concerned today as they have been in the recent past. Your focus is broadening; others may need you at this time.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – It's important for you to hide your efforts today, in order for others to think that the results come easily and naturally for you.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may be confronted today by someone with a great deal more aggressive energy than you have; take care that you don't get hurt in any way.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You may need to brush up on your skills today if you expect to compete with someone who is considered an expert. Know what you're talking about!

Softball's streak ends at 24 games

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

STORRS, Conn. – The agony of defeat. It is an emotion the members of the Massachusetts softball team (31-10 overall, 15-0 A-10) had not felt in some time. The grim faces on the UMass squad following its nail-biting 2-1 loss on Wednesday showed exactly how little the team missed the feeling.

The loss was UMass' first since March 11, when it fell to Tennessee-Chattanooga 1-0 at the Speed Line Tournament in Tampa, Fla.

With a chance to break the school record of 24 consecutive victories, the Maroon and White had to face off against UConn, another one of the hottest teams in the country, at the University of Connecticut Softball Field.

"The kids have to enjoy the fact that they created this opportunity," coach Elaine Sortino said. "There are a lot of teams in the country that couldn't even be talking about this today."

UMass jumped out of the gate early when sophomore Emily Robustelli led off the game with a single. The young shortstop moved to second on a sacrifice bunt and scored the game's first run when junior Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler drilled a double off the fence.

At the end of the first inning, UMass had a 1-0 lead and strong early pitching from senior Carrie Jeffries held the lead through 5 1/2 innings. Jeffries retired her first seven batters and faced no real trouble until the fourth inning, the first time a Husky got into scoring position. The right-hander got out of the inning when UConn's Sarah Sandford left second base early on a sacrifice fly and was called out on appeal.

The UMass offense faced similar struggles. Huskies hurler Barb Cook settled down after the first inning, giving up just three more hits over the final six frames.

"We were behind in the count with two strikes a lot," Sortino said. UMass allowed two straight base runners to reach on errors to lead off the fifth inning, but saved the lead behind a heads-up throw by Robustelli and diving play by junior

Minutewomen down UConn on Senior Day

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

Whenever you play the final home game of your collegiate career it is a big deal. When you get to play that game against your arch nemesis in front of your biggest crowd of the season, it is a really big deal.

That was the case yesterday as the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team took on the University of Connecticut on Senior Day at Totman Field. It was the final home match of their UMass career for five seniors; Denise Brey, Rachel Ingraffea, Kara DePaula and co-captains Jen Nardi and Fay Saber and they wanted to go out on a high note.

"They're a great bunch of people," said UMass head coach Phil Barnes of his five seniors. "They're each different with their own personality and what they bring to the team both on and off the field is just fantastic."

With 18:49 left to go in the first half Saber took a feed from freshman Hope Zelinger and fired a shot past UConn goalie April Pollock to give the Minutewomen a 3-2 lead, a lead they would never relinquish en route to a 12-9 victory. The goal was the senior's third of the game and she went on to add a pair of assists, giving her 31 points on the season.

Saber led a cast of five Minutewomen who scored multiple points on the afternoon. Fellow seniors Ingraffea and DePaula each tallied a pair of points while sophomore Leslie Pollock had two goals and two assists and sophomore Jada Emery recorded her third consecutive hat trick.

After falling behind 1-0 just 6:18 into the game, the Huskies countered with a pair of goals just 40 seconds apart from sophomore Heather Bliss to take their first and only lead of the game. It would be short lived however, as UMass proceeded to score seven of the games next nine goals to take an 8-4 lead into halftime.

"We came out on fire in the first half," said Barnes. "It is really exciting to see them playing this well at this point of the season."

With a lead in hand, the Minutewomen came out in the second half slightly tentative and were forced to call a timeout with 13:00 left and their lead down to just 9-7. Things looked bad for the Maroon and White as UConn had momentum in its favor, but UMass stayed resilient and got a pair of huge goals from Pollock and Emery to up the lead to 11-7. It was Emery's 11th goal in her last three games, and 20th of the season, after scoring just four times all of last

Lappas names coaching staff, adds to roster

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

So far, it has been a fairly busy off season for the newly hired head coach of the Massachusetts men's basketball team, Steve Lappas, as he has made moves to sure up both his roster and his coaching staff.

First off, the former Villanova coach picked up his first recruit for the Minutemen: 6-2 inch, 175 pound point guard, Kyle Wilson. Wilson, who hails from White Rock, B.C., Canada, signed a letter of intent to play in the 2001-02 season for UMass. He was rated Canada's best high school point guard a season ago, averaging 24 points to go along with 9.5 assists at White Rock Christian Academy.

In addition, the Canadian native shot 42 percent from behind the arc as a senior, including a whopping 12 threes in one game.

"We are very excited that Kyle has decided to sign with us," Lappas said. "He will really strengthen our backcourt. He's a very good three-point shooter, too. I believe he will be able to help us next year."

Wilson also expressed his excitement over being to able to play here in Amherst.

"I really liked the coaching staff and have heard good things about the University," Wilson said. "Coach Lappas is a great coach, and I believe this will be a good opportunity for me to come in and help the program. It's a great situation."

Once Lappas had been on the recruiting trail for awhile, he decided to bring in the rest of his coaching staff. On April 23, it was announced that John Leonard, Andrew Theokas and Christopher Walker would be the assistant coaches for the Maroon and White next year.

Theokas and Walker were assistants under Lappas last season at Villanova, while Leonard also has many ties to the current Minuteman coach, as an assistant under Lappas for Manhattan from 1988-1992, and for the Wildcats from 1992-1996.

"We have assembled a tremendous staff," Lappas said. "These men are committed to developing student-athletes who will be successful in the classroom and on the court. As a group, they bring 26 years of Division I coaching and administrative experience to the table, which is very important."

Before signing as an assistant to Lappas, Leonard had been the Assistant Commissioner of Operations for the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference. Previously, Leonard was the head coach for Manhattan College, totaling a 26-57 record in three years there.

"John worked for me at both Manhattan and Villanova, and has a tremendous understanding of the way we do things," Lappas said. "He is a tremendous teacher of the game, too."

As for Theokas, he spent two seasons as an assistant coach at Rider University before taking a job as an assistant under Lappas, while his colleague Walker was the associate head coach of Vanderbilt for three years and Pepperdine for one before signing on as an assistant at Villanova.

In other news, former University of Connecticut player Marcus Cox has decided to transfer to Massachusetts. Cox started four games last year for UConn, but saw his playing time steadily dwindle throughout the season. Overall, the sophomore guard totaled 2.7 points and 1.7 rebounds a game, while logging 11 minutes of court time.

However, because of NCAA rules, Cox will be forced to sit out the entire 2001-02 season as a transfer. He will then be eligible to join the team a year later, and will have two years of eligibility left.

The signing of the former Husky guard will help replace the loss of 6-2 inch guard, Jeremiah King, who had signed a letter of intent to play for the Minutemen, but will now follow former head coach James "Bruiser" Flint to Drexel.

Junior Jesse Santos held Vermont to three hits at Lorden Field yesterday. The Minutemen triumphed, 5-0.

Santos shuts down Catamounts

By Matt Despres
Collegian Staff

Junior pitcher Jesse Santos threw a sterling game yesterday afternoon, carrying a no-hitter into the sixth inning en route to a three-hit, complete game shutout, as the University of Massachusetts baseball team (15-15, 8-5 Atlantic 10) downed the University of Vermont, 5-0.

For Santos, who has seen his fortunes rise and fall with the performances of the team around him, the win was a welcome change in what has otherwise been a tough week for the Minutemen.

"I carried over from my weekend against Fordham," Santos said. "I struggled through the first few innings and settled down in the third. Our team needs a morale booster right now, and that's what I tried to do today."

For head coach Mike Stone, who watched his team steal a rare defensive hattle, the win speaks more for his playcrs than words ever could.

"The tone is set right out there," said Stone, motioning towards the mound. "We need to play like we did today. It was the first time we won a game from the mound or on defense. Usually it's our offense; today we had a combination of the two, and we need more of that."

Both teams were held off of the board until UMass broke through in the bottom of the fourth, notching a pair to take the 2-0 lead.

Freshman second baseman Adam Stojanowski led off the inning with a double down the left field line, and was followed onto the base paths by senior Nick Gorneault and junior Jeff Altieri, who were both hit by Catamounts starting pitcher Jeff Dixon. Facing a no out, bases loaded situation, third baseman Aaron Senez reached on an error, driving the runners home to give UMass the early lead.

Working with the advantage, Santos dominated, striking out six and relegating the Vermont offense to infield groundballs and high flyouts.

"He set the tone from the beginning; it made all the difference in the world," Stone said. "We've needed people to compete on the mound, and it hadn't happened. He did a great job."

UMass tacked on its third run of the day in the fifth, again spearheaded by the bat of Stojanowski, who started at second in place of the injured Sean Sarno. With two outs and freshman shortstop Cullan Maumus at second, Stojanowski ripped his second double of the afternoon into deep right, sending home Maumus for the 3-0 lead.

The Minutemen added single runs in both the sixth and seventh innings to round out the scoring, including a Gorneault double with two out in the seventh to score Stojanowski, who finally saw himself on the other side of the big hit. Santos earned the win for UMass, improving to 4-3 on the season. Dixon took the loss for Vermont, allowing four hits and three runs in five innings of work to fall to 3-2 on the year.

Today the Maroon and White will head to Worcester for a matchup with regional rival Holy Cross.

"[Craig] Szado is going tomorrow," Stone said. "Because we're off on the weekend, we're going to our starters, guys that we can rely on. Right now we've got four guys that we can count on, and they've given us some real good performances out there. Other people need to step up, but if you've got somebody available like Szado, he's going to pitch."

Szado comes in to today's game with a 4.78 ERA, second only to freshman Eric Chown for the team lead.

The Crusaders stand at 15-15 on the year with a 7-9 record in the Patriot League. They are led at the plate by Dale Johnson, who is hitting .396 in the 30 games he's played in this season.

On the other side of the ball, Holy Cross has had a subpar performance. Its pitchers come into today's contest with a 6.33 ERA, led by junior Mike Montano, who sports a 4-5 record and a 4.24 ERA in his six starts.

"I expect a battle. I expect them to come out and play hard. Any time anybody plays UMass, they're going to be ready to play. That's the way it is. It's our responsibility to own up to that and play well."

Wolves at the door of UMass Faculty Senate

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The Faculty Senate authorized its Program and Budget Council to continue its evaluation of the campus budgetary process. The motion came after a presentation by Chair of the PBC Craig Moore that described the fiscal outlook in bleak terms.

Outlining a triple threat of decreasing state allocations, increasing student populations, and falling faculty numbers, Moore explained that this wasn't going to be like other years. The report fleshed out Moore's reasons for the crises facing the campus.

"It's a spring time ritual. The campus reacts to the House bill, administrators, deans, faculty and everyone. By the time it gets through the Senate, by the time supplementary budgets and other things happen, it always seemed to work out," Moore said.

"We've cried 'wolf' many times," Moore added. "This time the wolf is at the door. We have a strategic crisis."

The report puts some of the blame on the fee freeze by the Board of Trustees.

"The Board of Trustees has taken a strong and consistent position that tuition and fees should not be increased in order to provide accessibility for students of moderate and lower economic means. This is admirable and is certainly compatible with the undergraduate teaching mission of a state supported university," the report states. "At the same time, however, student financial support has grown dramatically. The question is whether the University has to engage in both policies simultaneously to achieve its objectives."

"Without the flow of fresh new ideas that often comes from recent graduates joining our ranks, it is difficult to maintain the intellectual growth in a discipline that is vital to a strong research agenda," the report reads on faculty retention.

"Our faculty is increasingly senior and tenured and shrinking. This trend makes it difficult to remain among the leaders of the academy."

Explaining that the economic situation in the Commonwealth will be effecting many accepted students who planned on going to private institutions, Moore predicts an increase in the incoming class's ranks.

"Given what happened in the stock market, and given the erosion of wealth in the Commonwealth, many of the students accepted into the University of Massachusetts and other institutions," Moore said. "I think we will see a much higher continuation rate than we expect."

The report echoes these sentiments, and poses a question.

"A large student body being served by a shrinking faculty may mean less choices for students attending the Amherst campus: fewer courses, fewer sections of popular courses, a shrinking list of majors, less access to faculty, and larger class sizes," the report reads. "In the long-run are the best interests of students being served by these policies?"

The meeting then moved on to approving the Special Report from the rules committee, which directed the President's office to form a search committee for a permanent Chancellor soon.

"We're trying to reduce a four year transition in to a three years transition. If we start the search early in the fall, then we can have a chancellor in place by early next year," Secretary Ernest Mas said. "Once a chancellor gets on campus he or she is not going to initiate a search for a permanent provost during that year. We are looking at a possible four year transition before we have a permanent chancellor and provost on campus."

Yoshi Kogo presents show tonight in Northampton

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

Yoshi Kogo will present the live performance of Ray Gonzalez and his 11-piece Latin jazz band, Orquesta Versatil, at Gala Latin Night at the Inn at Northampton's Grand Ballroom this Friday at 8 p.m.

The event's proceeds will benefit the private, nonprofit International Language Institute (ILI) of Massachusetts, located in Northampton.

According to ILI's official website, the school offers an international English program, free English classes for immigrants and refugees, and a language program at Hampshire College and provides 4 week-long courses for the English for Speakers of Other Languages Teacher Certificate.

"If somebody wants to study a language, we have to make it fair for everyone," Executive Director of ILI Alexis Johnson explained. "So we established a [scholarship] fund by soliciting [money] through our news letter."

In addition to this solicitation, ILI decided a benefit would enable the school to place even more money in the scholarship fund, and thus with the help of Yoshi Kogo, Gala Latin Night was able to become a reality.

"This scholarship will probably be for our English as a Second Language Program, most likely a Latin student," said Johnson.

Kogo, the producer and sole financer the event and an IRI board member, sees Gala Latin Night as a dual service.

Believing in IRI programs, she commented that there is always a need for scholarship money. But in addition, she noted, "[There are] lots of Spanish speaking people in the area, and Latin music is a good way to bring people together, both in and outside of the culture."

Hosted by Luis Melendez, DJ for the popular Sunday night radio program on WFCR 88.5 fm, ¡Tertulia!, Gala Latin Night will feature entertainment by Gonzalez's Orquesta Versatil and Latin dance lessons by Teresa Castano.

Trumpeter and bandleader, Ray Gonzalez, has been performing orchestral music from Spain and Mexico as well as popular dance music from the Caribbean and Latin America with his jazz band throughout New England since 1984.

"I've seen their performance. It's quite a spectacular with high quality music," said Kogo, eagerly anticipating the show.

She added, Teresa Castano's dance lessons are intended to enhance the Latino atmosphere and will promote the Latin style salsa across cultural lines to those unfamiliar with such dance moves.

During the early part of evening and after 10 p.m., Orquesta Versatil will break, and Teresa Castano and her dance company, who host a Latin dance night every Friday at the Beaver Brook Golf Course in Williamsburg, will both perform and provide lessons to all willing to try something new.

"It's a participating event," Kogo added. "We can spread out and intermingle with the audience."

Adding to the ambiance of a Latin Paradise, ethnic foods will be served in the "Buffet de Entremeses," loosely translated to "a between meal, meal."

The "finger food" will include authentic Latin foods and drinks prepared by the Head Chef at the Inn at Northampton and exotic fruits donated by the Bread and Circus Whole Foods Market in Hadley.

"I want people to experience every which way about this Latin culture," said Kogo, adding that door prizes will include performance tickets from the Fine Arts Center at the University of Massachusetts, North River hand blown glass pieces, a palm tree donated by the Hadley Garden Center, gift certificates from many local shops and restaurants and various other items generously donated by area businesses.

As a Japanese woman and children's author and illustrator of several books with multicultural themes, Kogo claims a celebration of music, food, and multiculturalism is one of her favorite interests.

As such, she expressed her concern that nowhere in the Northampton area can people just gather together.

"It's basically just concerts," she said, "but [Gala Latin Night is] a multidimensional event to bring people together."

Indeed, Kogo's sentiments link to IRI's own mission statement, which is to "promote inter-cultural understanding through the acquisition of communicative language skills and cross-cultural awareness."

Kogo anticipates about 300 people will come and go throughout the evening.

Providing Gala Latin Night is a success, she plans to help fund a series of similar multicultural events centered on food and music, possibly including galas focused on an Afro-Caribbean or a Mardi Gras theme, and will continue to benefit the IRI scholarship fund.

Contact Sue Arthen at (413) 586-7569 to purchase advanced tickets. The cost of the event is $25 per person and $45 per couple.

Nevada argues over legal gambling

By David Clarke
Northwestern University

(U-WIRE) – Opponents of a bill that would outlaw gambling on college sports argued Thursday that without legal gambling in Las Vegas, points-shaving scandals would increase.

"If you lose Nevada, you lose the canary in the mine shaft," said Frank J. Fahrenkopf, Jr., president and chief executive of the American Gaming Association.

Nevada is the only state where gambling on college athletics is legal. Legislation pending in the Senate and the House would prohibit such gambling there too.

"It would be the illegal bookies' dream come true to have this law enforcement tool removed," Rep. Jim Gibbons, R-Nev., testified at a Senate committee hearing.

Based on betting patterns, bookmakers in Las Vegas are able to determine whether a team is shaving points or fixing games and have an incentive to report it, according to the bill's opponents.

"If the game is fixed, the Las Vegas bookmakers lose," Fahrenkopf said.

The National Collegiate Athletic Association contends this argument is an overstatement.

"On one occasion it helped, with Arizona State," said Doris Dixon of the NCAA's legislative office in Washington. In 1997 two former Arizona State basketball players were convicted of shaving points in the early 1990s.

Banning gambling on college games in Las Vegas will help reduce illegal gambling nationwide, said John McCain, R-Ariz., the bill's sponsor.

"Big illegal gambling rings rely on Las Vegas to lay off their bets, and that won't be there anymore," said Dixon.

Betting in Las Vegas makes up only 1 percent of all sports gambling nationwide, Fahrenkopf said. If gambling rings were laving off their bets, this number would be much higher, he said.

Gambling, especially on college campuses, relies on the odds coming out of Las Vegas, Dixon said. If it were illegal, betting odds would disappear from newspapers, she said.

Danny Sheridan, an oddsmaker for USA Today, however, said he had already been contacted by newspaper chains that want to print his line if the Las Vegas books are closed.

There are also thousands of betting lines on the Internet that would not go away, Fahrenkopf said.

The debate over the role legal gambling plays in the integrity of college sports is secondary to a broader issue, according to North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, one of four co-sponsors of the bill.

"It is very important for us to send a clear message nationally that we don't support gambling," he said. Opponents of the bill did not disagree that illegal gambling is a threat to college athletics.

There are bills in both the House and Senate, sponsored by representatives from Las Vegas who oppose McCain's bill, that call for stiffer penalties on illegal sports gambling and a study on gambling on college campuses.

Pressure to shave points or throw games is not the only way gambling affects student athletes.

Officials from both the North Carolina and Duke athletic departments said gamblers try to gain an edge by calling athletes in their rooms hoping to get information about injuries and who may not play. The callers often pose as acquaintances or friends, said Larry Gallo of the UNC athletic department.

"It's tough when you have to watch your back when you're talking to your friends over a pizza," Charlotte native and Penn State basketball player Titus Ivory said at the hearing.

State statute prohibits U. of Kentucky from performing abortions

By Ashley York
Kentucky Kernel

(U-WIRE) – University of Kentucky Health Services can't provide certain procedures – abortion happens to be one of them, as well as the distribution of RU-486, a drug that blocks the action of the hormone necessary to sustain a pregnancy, thus terminating the pregnancy.

And in the event a patient needs medical advice concerning an issue like abortion, University Health Services will help the student find the type of medical attention needed.

"If we don't offer the service, we will help patients find the service they need – that's our job," said Dr. Spencer Turner, director of University Health Services.

Even though Turner said health services helps patients as much as possible, he said it couldn't refer the student to a specific place – health officials simply give the patient a list of referrals for various options.

Turner explained the state of this issue all over the country. He said the role of the majority of University Health Services is to provide primary care through outpatient facilities, adding that surgical abortions are not exactly considered outpatient care.

"Although some schools, like Columbia University, will insure RU-486 under the student medical plan. According to the Columbia Spectator, it will provide RU-486 at alternate locations, but not provide it at the campus health center.

Despite the fact some schools will insure the drug, Dr. Emery Wilson, the dean of the College of Medicine, said this simply isn't possible for UK because of the state statute. The statute implies that no publicly owned hospital or health care facility can perform or permit the performance of abortions, except to save the life of the pregnant woman.

Wilson said even though abortions are constitutionally legal the state says you can't use public funds to perform the procedure.

"You simply can't use state resources, state funds or space for an abortion," Wilson said.

Wilson said he doesn't think the issue should be politicized but legislation makes it that way in order to prevent abortions.

"This is an issue people feel strongly about," he said. "As a result those who feel strongly against it are the ones who make it political."

University Health Services does provide the morning after pill, as well as oral contraceptive pills and contraceptive devices, which are not covered by the health fee.

Fetus bill passes
Protects the "unborn"

In Washington this week, opponents of abortion gained significant ground as a bill passed through the House of Representatives that will make it a federal crime to harm a fetus.

The bill, which passed by a 252-172 vote, will essentially recognize the fetus as a separate person, and has been labeled as an effort to crack down on criminals who harm "unborn children."

"This is not an abortion bill," said Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. "Without this bill, crimes against the innocent victims will go unpunished."

The new measure applies only to crimes committed in federal jurisdiction; however, 24 states currently have similar statutes.

Representatives are saying that this is not an abortion bill, and that those women who exercise their right to an abortion will be shielded from criminal prosecution, as well as those who perform the operation.

The bill and sensitive nature surrounding it have received plenty of attention, from promoters (including President George Bush) detractors and the media.

In a statement issued Tuesday, Bush issued his support for the bill on behalf of the White House.

"The administration supports protection for unborn children and therefore supports House passage," the White House said in a statement Tuesday.

The issue is an interesting one for all concerned parties, because while the story at hand remains the welfare of unborn children and expecting mothers, the abortion issue is deftly avoided, at least in the sense that we have come to be familiar with it. With that topic suddenly, yet not completely, out of the picture, individuals on both sides of the argument have seen the focal point of their debates pushed to the side.

Now what?

Although it would be a stretch to call the behavior of both sides agreeable, it certainly is hard to denounce a bill that takes into account the life that these victimized women are carrying. While violence against women is something that we have all become familiar with, largely because reported cases of it are frighteningly common, the issue often never moves past that, to the well-being of the "unborn children."

Certainly, a reason for this is that the topic remains one of the more charged discussions that people will involve themselves in. Rarely do you find a person with split feelings; it's for, it's against, and generally, that's it.

This is an issue that, regardless of how individuals stand on abortion, will swing voters to its sides because people (yes, even politicians) want to take a vocal stand in defending the safety and rights of women. Where it goes from here, however, is something that will be told in time.

Martinez debut runs long on clichés, short on content

By Kurt Polasky
Collegian Staff

ANGIE MARTINEZ
Up Close And Personal
Elektra

Ah.... repetitive music. You know the type. There's nothing particularly good or bad about it. It does absolutely nothing new. Likely it will be forgotten as quickly as it came. This all holds true for Up Close And Personal, the debut album from New York City Hot 97 DJ Angie Martinez.

Outside of New York, hip-hop nation hasn't heard much from Ms. Martinez since 1997, when she joined Missy Elliot, Lil' Kim, Lisa "Left Eye" Lopes, and Da Brat on the Grammy-nominated "Ladies Night" single. Since then, she has been spinning the rhymes of many of those same rap divas on Hot 97. Now, instead of simply playing the rhymes of others on the radio, she is about to put her own rhyming skills on the line with her debut effort.

As the listener is greeted by the screaming DJ Clue within the first few seconds of the first track "New York New York," it's obvious that this album is more of the usual. Even though Up Close And Personal does nothing new, the sharp production and solid array of guest spots manage propel the album to somewhere around mediocrity.

Most of the album's tracks follow formulaic rap criteria to a tee. There's the "player hating" song, the "I made it so look at me now" song, the "party jam," and that's it. Somehow, each one of the themes manages to be recycled several times on the very same album. After all, there's 70 minutes of music to fill here, and more importantly, to make money off of. Better fill it with the usual and the obvious!

The second track "Every Little Girl" is the obligatory "I made it, look at me now" song, where Martinez rips on her critics (I didn't know anybody cared enough to be one), and puts those old lesbian rumors to rest once and for all. The albums Latin vibe begins on the following track, "Coast To Coast" – featuring Wyclef Jean – and continues on "Live At Jimmy's," featuring a posthumous appearance from Big Pun, and a sample from "Kokomo." Since Martinez actually has some Latin blood in her, it's acceptable for her to use the Latin beats and doesn't merely come across as an excuse to cash in on the Latin music bang.

The guest spots aplenty continue with the self-celebratory "Ladies and Gents" featuring Snoop Dog, where Martinez proclaims that she is "sittin on chrome with her status well known," and "Gutter To The Fancy Ish," where her and Busta Rhymes sip on some syrup. I mean margaritas, together. Track is featured in the no scrubs anthem (i.e. the "playa hater song," there's one of those three types of songs again) "Silly Niggaz," which also features an (very light) old school style beat box sample. Haven't had enough of the same yet? The "playa hater" song returns on the very next track, "No Playaz," featuring Lil Mo and Tony Sunshine. In it Martinez lets the world know that her ideal man is a "nice guy who likes to fuck a lot." The album's most creative moment, "Live From The Streets," brings in Jadakiss and Beanie Siegel, rhyming over a sample of police sirens. Martinez meanwhile basically plays the role of a news reporter introducing the rappers in the track.

The best of the guest spots comes from Jay-Z in "Mi Amor." The song features a playful hook where Martinez asks "How You Say My Love in Spanish? Mi Amor." To which the Jigga man replies, "How you say my love in thug? Can I hit it raw?" Jay-Z also further proves himself to be a modern day Romeo when he spouts the line "I like fast cars, and faster chicks." Most likely the hope was the collaboration would result in another hit in a similar vein to Jay-Z's work with Foxy Brown ("Aint No Nigga," "I'll Be").

With Martinez's average at best rhythmic flow, the album's lifeline is its production. And in this area it succeeds. The majority of the album is produced by Salaam Remi, who's past work has included The Fugees and Beenie Man. But the album's prime cuts include work from Rockwilder on "Mi Amor," and The Neptunes on "Dem Thangz" (parts jam by the way). While The Neptunes' precise and creative production has resulted in huge hits for the likes of Jay-Z ("Give it To Me") and Mystikal ("Shake Ya Ass"), and possibly in the future for N Sync, who the production duo just finished working with. Most likely "Dem Thangz" won't reach those levels, due to its overly simplistic beat and unexcitable chorus. Likely another reason why "Dem Thangz" won't be as big of a hit as "Shake Ya Ass" is because even though the song encourages the listener to "move dem thangz", it does not offer any precautionary advice to watch yourself while doing it.

Martinez seems to have a lot to say. The problem is we've heard it all before. Above average production combined with below average rhyming and song content results in, well...an average album. Which is exactly what this is.

Powerslippin': Wyndorf guides Magnet to an uncertain future

By Michael Delano

MONSTER MAGNET
God Says No
A&M

Monster Magnet is confused. One mask the band wears is the sludgetacular psychedelic so-called "stoner rock" that characterized the band's earlier work like the masterful Spine of God and the indulgent, bloated 25...tab. The other is leather pants (tassels optional) wearing, long hair swinging, dirty punk n' rollers reveling in money, girls, and excess. This version of MM can be seen on their breakthrough album, 1998's forceful Powertrip.

But which mask to wear? And are they masks at all? Some would argue that frontman Dave Wyndorf finally awoke from his drug slumber and made the rock record in Powertrip that he had always wanted to, but had previously watered down. Others contend that the MM's hazy early period was their only true expression, and the radio-friendly nature of Powertrip was nothing but a sellout.

God Says No plays like the battleground between these two warring styles, sometimes within the confines of a single song. "Medicine," a great song from Spine of God, returns for updated spin on this album. It is essentially the same song, so why rehash history? Is the motive to balance the Powertrip-esque first single "Heads Explode" with an exalted remnant from the stoned past? One would initially think not, since "Medicine" was, comparatively speaking, one of the most straightforward Powertrip-foreshadowing rockers on Spine of God.

But why then does "Heads Explode" rock out like a sore thumb between the gloomier "Melt" and "Doomsday?" And why is "Silver Future," the overlooked contribution to the Heavy Metal 2000 soundtrack, tacked on to the end as a bonus track, like an antidote to the trippy end-of-album cuts like "Queen of You" and "Take It?"

Truth be told, nothing on God Says No is as far-out as MM's earlier work, but the middleway achieved here between their two sounds turns out pretty well. Even without going full-throttle, these songs sound more passionate and a lot more creative than most of the stuff you're likely to hear on rock radio currently.

The pervasive sexual current that seems to run through all of Wyndorf's lyrics is very much intact here. Even when he's not talking about swimming "in the sweat of a million orgies," the snarls, grunts, and metaphors just reek of the ramblings of a proudly sex-obsessed mind. The tapered "All Shook Out" is one of the album's strongest tracks, since it pushes this energy in different directions, at first suppressing it, then unleashing it, making for some blissfully awkward melody.

God Says No has its few slow paced songs, although they're not up to previous efforts. The title track and "Queen of You" are serviceable, but they're certainly no "Black Balloon" or "Baby Gotterdamerung." They also seem to fall in familiar places in the album's sequencing, resulting in an off-putting structured and familiar feel.

Monster Magnet may be past their days of true recklessness and contempt for the music industry, but there are still sparks of life, especially in Wyndorf's songwriting, that make God Says No a solid effort, although not sufficiently wild and offensive.

PURE ROCK PARTY featuring 3 DOORS DOWN, TANTRIC, and SHADES APART
Hippodrome
April 24

The Hippodrome in Springfield was rocking Tuesday night, as the Laser 99.5's first Pure Rock Party hit the stage. 3 Doors Down, Tantric and Shades Apart all played solid, inspired sets. By all accounts, it had to be considered a rousing success.

3 Doors Down headlined the show. The five-man crew played a fifteen song, seventy-five minute set. Before it was over, 3DD had sizzled through every single song on The Better Life disc and had taken the wraps off of four new songs as well.

Highlights of the 3 Doors Down set were numerous. Taking the stage to an electronic thunderstorm-inspired blitz of lights and sounds, 3DD cranked through the title track of The Better Life, and then through staples like "Life of My Own," and "Not Enough." Frontman Brad Arnold then took a minute to introduce the first of four new tracks they played, "When I'm Gone." The tune, as Arnold put it, "is a song about unconditional love."

3 Doors then went back into The Better Life, rolling through versions of "So I Need You" and "By My Side." And while a touching acoustic version of "Be Like That" took some of the wind out of their sails, 3DD was back up and flying with a fun, fan-friendly sing-along version of their breakthrough hit, "Kryptonite." An extended version of "Down Poison" kept the crowd into it. The band then closed with the third #1 smash from their album, a searing, energetic version of "Duck and Run." In between, they introduced three more new songs, including a heartfelt song (about "stupid people killing one another," as Arnold put it) called "Most Dangerous Game," and a song about self-confidence called "This Time."

To the delight of the crowd, 3 Doors came back out for an encore and roared through "Smack," a quick, riff-heavy tune at the end of The Better Life. Their final tune for the night was a soulful version of "Loser."

By no stretch of the imagination was 3 Doors Down anything less than wonderful. Their set is filled with energy, passion, and joy. The members enjoy their newfound success, yet they are nothing less than gracious hosts to the crowd of thousands that scream their names. The two guitarists, Matt Roberts and Chris Henderson, both play to the crowd, coming right to the edge of the stage to have fun with the fans. In between songs, Arnold seemed thrilled to be where he is, with the permanent smile of a five year-old getting the attention on his face. It's refreshing, really, to see a hard rock band that yells, "God bless you!" to their fans instead of "Scream our names motherf—s!"

Tantric was the second band of the night to take the stage. The band is a four-man crew composed of three men that were formerly in a band called Days of the New and a new front man, Hugo Ferreira. They rolled through a dark, inspired, forty-five minute set from their new self-titled album, with Ferreira coaxing the audience along as they went. Opening with "Revillusion" and "Astounded," two of the better tracks on their album, Tantric quickly got the audience into their set. Highlights included "Live Your Life," "Paranoid," and "Inside Your Head." Tantric unveiled a new mystery song as well, and sizzled through it. They closed with a roaring "Breakdown," a rock-radio smash in heavy airplay. For many in the crowd, it was the first song of the night that they had ever heard before, and it whipped them into a frenzy.

Tantric excelled primarily on the basis of their rock chops, but Ferreira has a lot to do with success as a live band. He is the quintessential cocky rock star showman. He aggressively plays to the crowd, downing beer after beer in the process. In the course of a forty-five minute set he must have gone through a six-pack worth of froth and foam all over the stage. It wears thin after a while, but Ferreira does get you into Tantric's show for a while.

The opening band for the night was Shades Apart. A three-man band with punk overtones, Shades Apart sounds somewhat like Eve 6. They did their best to get a mostly apathetic and fourteen year-old (the over twenty-one crowd was still at the Hippodrome bar) early evening audience into gear with a thirty minute set. There is serious talent in the band, though: they'll make it big yet. Highlights of their show included a scathing cover of the 80's techno band Soft Cell's "Tainted Love." Shades managed to get a lot of the crowd jumping with that one. They also revealed a very upbeat, catchy song from their new upcoming album (set to be released on May 15) called Beat by Beat. If the rest of the album is like the song, their new album shows great promise.

Pierre ponders existence, asks questions of societal redemption

THE WIDOW OF SAINT-PIERRE
Directed by Patrice Leconte with Juliette Binoche
Playing at the Academy of Music, Northampton

The Widow of Saint-Pierre is a film of ideas: ideas about absolute morality applied to a shifting, subjective world; about the removal of formal systems of justice from the landscape of human emotion; and about the power (or lack thereof) of forgiveness to bring salvation. It is a human story that resonates across a wide moral and political space, a tale of second chances taking place in a social arrangement unprepared to grant absolution.

Unfortunately, these ideas are demonstrated at times implicitly, and at times not at all, but never with the sort of clarity that would change the characters and events with the desired political and moral spark. The goings-in of the film are lackluster, and at best may serve as a critique of a culture no longer around, and at worst plays out like a dull colonial melodrama.

Juliette Binoche stars as Madame La, wife of a Captain (Daniel Auteuil) stationed on the island of Saint-Pierre, a remote French territory off the coast of Newfoundland. Neel Auguste (Emir Kusturica), a crude local, is arrested for murder of which he is unquestionably guilty – he was drunk during the altercation, but the useless and unprovoked nature of the attack leaves no question about the baseness of the man's morality. He is not evil, but defeated, surrendered to apathy.

Although immediately remorseful, he is sentenced to death, and the law demands that a guillotine be employed. One is not available on the island, however, and it will be many months before one can be sent from France. In the meantime, Neel is handed over to Madame La's care, and begins to benefit from her sympathy and nonjudgementalism. He is taught to garden, accompanies Madame La on the long and severe day trip across the winter ice to nearby settlements, and performs a few feats of heroism that begin to earn the townspeople's forgiveness.

The potential for emotional and ethical discussion is clear, but the film never states its case explicitly, or even with consistent implicitness. The few remarkable events unfold slowly and uninterestingly, and the film feels like a formula not quite completed, a cake missing a few ingredients. The ending resounds with little strength, hoping the audience understands what it is to feel without being able to produce that feeling more organically or profoundly.

The Widow of Saint-Pierre is not without its strengths, however, the greatest of which being a stark beauty of location and costuming. Everything about the film's gloss feels authentic; "gloss," however, is the wrong word, because the scenery is defined by harshness, a bleak tone that has works its way into the absurdity of Neel's crime and the cold routine of the island's few aristocrats. The social structures and politics of France hand over the island, distantly but noticeably, and mix with a landscape that moves with its own grand and dreary machinations.

The film's central question, however, that of whether or not the man that committed the crime is the same man that is to be executed many months later, is never sufficiently addressed, leaving the audience with an unsatisfactory idea of what the film intended in telling its story. There is much potential here for an exploration of the transformative powers of empathy and friendship and the human capacity to change, and to accept change in others, but the film takes no opportunity to play with these ideas, instead merely noting their existence and then moving on with a steady bleakness that resolves quietly and articulates little.

Tommy Castro unleashed a wild night of soul Tuesday night at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton.

Just as the smoke was clearing from a heady weekend in the Valley, guitarist Tommy Castro arrived in town looking to spark a fiery evening of blue-collar rhythm & blues. After a late start and minor technical delays, Castro's California-based combo took the stage to the driving beat of a 12-bar blues progression, holding forth for two hours as they delivered a pair of powerful sets of rockin' soul.

Tommy Castro gave the Iron Horse a lesson in blues earlier this week

Undeterred by the sparse turnout for a mid-week touring gig, Castro made an early announcement of his intentions for his SoHo debut. "We gonna play Tuesday like it's Saturday night. This is a no-thinkin'-about-tomorrow zone!" The band launched into Wilson Pickett's "Three Times A Loser," doing apt justice to the soul legend's classic.

Castro's four-piece band lorched their way through a first set filled with pounding rockers, including new tunes from an upcoming album. Castro's lead guitar combined with Keith Crossan's meaty sax tone for a gritty dual attack that updates their brand of mighty Memphis soul for a contemporary era. Set against the high energy of up-tempo R&B, the highlight of the first set was a prodigious take of Buddy Guy's "My Time After A While". Clad in his trademark black leather pants, Castro scorched this slow blues piece with searing notes from his black Stratocaster. The band showed an impressive command of dynamics and tight execution, belying the many years of touring that shore up any good blues outfit.

Castro and company maintained the momentum that grew out of the first set, returning after a short break with a string of original tunes, several of which were featured on Castro's excellent recording "Live At The Fillmore". Truly a workingman's band, Castro's rhythm section was tireless and bombastic. Bassist Randy McDonald was lively and reliable, and held down harmony vocals from behind tinted glasses. Badass skinman Billy Lee Lewis threw down funky fills and steady kicks, his shaven pate and chrome DW rims gleaming equally from behind the kit.

The raw funk of "Nasty Habits" drew some adventurous patrons to the aisles to dance, a rare sight at the culinary-minded venue, and Castro kept the room swinging with "Lucky in Love".

Castro's guitar work is beginning to approach the level where the lines between rhythm and lead disappear, and he has mastered a command of the mic after years of honing his chops on the Bay area blues scene.

The mid-tempo strains of "Just A Man" were echoes of the vintage Hi sound. Willie Mitchell would have been proud.

Castro elicited vociferous approval from the Tuesday night revelers, and drew a standing ovation as he closed with the title track from his sophomore effort "Can't Keep A Good Man Down". This may prove to be a harbinger of Castro's burgeoning career, with four solid albums for Blind Pig Records under his belt he seems ready to join the likes of Johnny Rawls and Robert Cray in the pantheon of soul blues. This summer Castro will be returning for a second season of touring alongside guitar gods B.B. King and Buddy Guy, and the days of seeing Tommy Castro on a Tuesday night in Northampton may be numbered.

Crew to defend A-10 crown

By Kathe Landers
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's crew team will head down the New Jersey Turnpike this weekend to defend its title as the five-time Atlantic 10 Champion.

The annual A-10 Championship in Camden, NJ is looking to be the bright spot of the season. It's been a bumpy course down the river this season as the Minutewomen have faced challenges never seen before.

After winning last spring's A-10 Championship for the fifth straight year, the team has been lost for a win on the road.

The team had a strong showing last fall when it came in first for A-10 teams at the infamous Head of the Charles Regatta, but the spring has been full of obstacles that the Maroon and White have had to improvise with.

"It's been real disappointing," co-captain Heather Walker said. "The whole season has been so close and we couldn't pull out that last second."

The flooding of the Connecticut River brought the team out from Connecticut and gave them its only home race of the season in Northampton.

The home waters proved lucky for the team with the second Varsity A boat rowing to a first place finish. The team has been on the waters hosted by George Washington, University of Kansas, Villanova, Boston University and Columbia. The Minutewomen raced through the holiday weekend two weeks past against GW, Navy, Columbia and other teams they faced more than once this season. The first boat has come up short for top honors this spring but the second boat has proved itself to be a strong leg. The second boat beat out Columbia last weekend in a good race with time to watch Navy take third.

Both varsity boats are looking forward to this weekend of racing and are confident about the outcome. With five race championships under its belt, UMass is looking to bring home a sixth cup to shine in the trophy case.

"We're fairly confident that we're going to take the championship again," Walker said.

The Minutewomen will see GW again this weekend, one of their toughest competitors of the season. The Maroon and White has grown stronger since the 2000 season and feel that the Colonials won't pose to much of a threat in the race. GW has had a struggling season coming in last against BU, Navy and Iowa on the Charles River this month, and being defeated by Cornell University just a week before. However, GW did pull a fourth place finish when it hosted the George Washington Invitational Crew Classic – five spots ahead of UMass.

The women's team has been on the water all week preparing for this weekend. With a regiment of tough workouts and seat racing to earn a spot in Saturday's A boat, the Minutewomen are looking for a chance at a big win. The present seating for the varsity A boat has co-captain Sara Pragluski as coxswain, Danielle Smith, Mary Neubecker, Sarah Pollman who is back from an injury, Heather Walker, Claire O'Donnell, Laura Kramer, Katia Prokopenko and Mila Gorzkowski.

The seating has been a competition to the end all week as the Minutewomen put it all on the line to make this weekend their weekend. The trial race is set to start at 8 a.m. Saturday with the finals following at 11:30 a.m.

Duke lax takes conference

Blue Devils one step closer to NCAA tourney

By Nick Christie
The Chronicle (Duke U.)

(U-WIRE) DURHAM, N.C. – Despite last weekend's ACC tournament championship, Duke men's lacrosse team has yet to completely secure a coveted NCAA tournament berth.

This Saturday, 12th-ranked Duke (10-4) faces No. 16 Hofstra (7-5), and the Blue Devils' performance against the Pride will undoubtedly influence their postseason opportunities, a fact not lost on coach Mike Pressler and his squad.

"If we beat Hofstra, we're in – if we lose, we're on the bubble," Pressler said. "[Our goal] to solidify a spot in the tournament goes through Hofstra. We don't want to put it in the committee's hands. We realize how important this game is.

Accordingly, the Blue Devils do not have time to bask in the glory of their 10-6 win over Maryland in the championship game. Instead, Duke must concentrate on its upcoming matchup in New York.

"It's easier to forget those losses, and move on to the next game," Pressler said. "You have to be mature enough to do the same thing after a win."

Pressler's team shares his determination, as the Blue Devils' attitude at practice this week is one of intense focus. Clearly, the squad does not want to rest on its laurels.

"It was nice to win the ACC tournament," co-captain Hunter Henry said. "It was definitely the biggest win I've had since I've been at school. But my focus has already changed to Hofstra. As sweet as that victory was, it's over."

Like Henry, fellow co-captain Michael Keating has shifted his attention toward preparing for the weekend's contest.

"When we come out on the field tomorrow, we're going to have two-and-a-half-hours of practice," Keating said. "Those two-and-a-half hours are going to be the most important two and a half hours of the season."

The Minutemen have accomplished countless goals this season, rising above just about everyone's expectations after a 6-8 finish last year. They were ranked as high as fourth in the country, matching the highest the team has ever been ranked. They have ten victories already, totaling the same number of wins the team has recorded the two previous seasons combined.

When it comes to college sports, the Syracuse lacrosse team runs parallel to Duke in basketball, Florida State in football and (dare I say) Boston College in hockey. A win against this team does more than a team can imagine – until that team finally accomplishes the feat. UMass has given itself and the university the opportunity for ultimate success, a piece of the prize. Now is the time to take it.

A Carolina upset in mind

Women's lax to conclude season

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

With postseason play looming on the horizon, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will jump on a plane this weekend and head down to Chapel Hill for its season finale against the University of North Carolina. The Minutewomen head into the match in the midst of four game winning streak and will be looking to make it five in a row against the Tar Heels on Sunday afternoon.

Last year the Maroon and White dropped a 12-6 decision to the Tar Heels in the final regular season home game at Totman Field, and it will be looking to return the favor on Senior Day at Henry Field.

"Carolina is a really good team, they're really competitive," said UMass sophomore Jada Emery. "I last year we stuck with them and gave them a run for their money and I know it will be another really competitive game [on Sunday]."

In order to reverse last year's scoreline, the Minutewomen's first order of business will be to shut down one of the best players in the country, junior attacker Kellie Thompson. Thompson, a third team All-American last year and All-ACC performer this year, leads the Tar Heels in scoring this season with 37 goals and 48 points and was just named as one of 19 finalists for the prestigious Tewaaraton Trophy. The Tewaartton Trophy is given annually to the best male and female college lacrosse player in the nation.

If Thompson is to add to her team-leading goal tally on Sunday, she will need to find a way past the defensive pair of Denise Brey and Bridget Byrne, as well as goalie Jen Nardi. The Minutewomen have not given up more than nine goals since a 12-9 loss to Duquesne two weeks ago. Both Brey and Byrne have been handed the job of shutting down the opposition's best scorer this season and UMass head coach Phil Barnes has not yet decided who will be handed the assignment on Sunday afternoon.

"Kellie is one of the best players in the country, but we're not changing anything defensively," said Barnes. "It is all about team defense and having backup, it's not just one player on one player so we're going to stick to what we've done the last couple weeks."

One thing that UMass (6-8, 3-2, A-10) has definitely done over the past few weeks is put the ball in the cage. The Minutewomen have scored 60 goals during their four game winning streak, including 19 in back to back games against Albany and LaSalle. Leading this offensive outburst has been a trio of seniors as well as the sophomore Emery. These four have combined for 39 goals and 15 assists since the April 14 matchup with St. Bonaventure and currently occupy the four top spots on the Maroon and White scoring chart.

"We've made tremendous progress pushing forward," said Barnes. "We have good speed so we are going to just keep pushing and going to the cage."

"I've been given an opportunity," said DePaula who is currently tied for fourth on the team with Leslie Pollock with 21 points. "I've been mustering up all my energy for three years and this is the final time that I can show what I can do. It has just been a matter of stepping up when it's time for me to step up. This year has been a year for me to show what I can do."

Coming into the season DePaula, a native of Saratoga Springs, N.Y. had managed just 14 points in 29 games during her first three years at UMass. But this season she has flourished in the Minutewoman attack, setting new career highs in shots, goals, assists and points.

The Minutewomen are 6-0 when scoring at least ten goals this season and winless in contests where they have not reached the 10 goal plateau. Leading the charge to stop the potent UMass attack for North Carolina will be a pair of All-ACC Tournament defenders. Andy Fortino and Jazmine Norton. The sophomore pair leads a Carolina defense that has allowed ten or more goals on just six occasions this year and only 125 tallies total in the 2001 campaign. Fortino and Norton were the only Tar Heels named to the ACC All-Tournament Team following Carolina's 10-5 semifinal loss to No. 2 Duke.

There are few better teams than the Tar Heels that would prepare UMass for next weekend's A-10 Tournament. A good showing on Sunday should give the Minutewomen the momentum and inspiration they will need to defend their A-10 crown.

Difficult to disturb

UMass softball not to be rattled in final weeks

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

In the early evening of April 24, the marathon of winning finally came to an end for the Massachusetts softball team as its 24-game winning streak was snapped by Connecticut in a tight 2-1 battle.

UMass went just under a month and a half without a defeat – an amazing accomplishment. However, according to many of the team members, it is time to refocus and concentrate on the rest of the season.

In-conference rival, Fordham University, gets the honor of facing the Minutewomen first, starting with a doubleheader on Saturday and a single game on Sunday. The Maroon and White players are ready for the three-game set this weekend in the Bronx.

"We have to have the mindset that we are going to win," said junior pitcher Jen Hadley. "We have to come out extra hard this time around."

After an impressive 5-0 week where she compiled an extraordinary 0.91 ERA, Hadley was named the WHMP/UMass Co-Athlete of the Week at the weekly sports luncheon on Wednesday.

"I was happy with the way I pitched last week," said the co-captain, Hadley.

So far, Fordham has had an inauspicious year. In fact in the last ten games, the Rams have only been victorious in two. They have struggled all year, mainly because of their lack of hitting. For the year, the team has compiled only a .209 team batting average. Despite Fordham's inefficiencies at the plate, UMass knows that it cannot take any team lightly.

"We tend to let down against the weaker teams," said senior pitcher Carrie Jeffries. "We can't play down to their level, we have to rise above it."

"We have to have a good start and withhold our good play throughout the game," said Hadley.

Massachusetts has had its share of inefficiencies in the past couple of weeks – specifically on the defensive side. For the first time in a long time it got time and practice this week to work on those nagging problems. Ever since their lost to the Huskies on Tuesday night, the Minutewomen have had three full days without games – their longest break in over a month. According to pitchers Hadley and Jeffries, "it was a well-needed break."

"We had so many games in such a small amount of time so it feels good to have a break," said Hadley. "I got the opportunity throw a little and work on my mechanics."

"Our defense has been poor," said Jeffries. In practice we have been able to work on the little things that we normally do not get to work on when we have so many games."

Many times in sports when a team has a long winning streak snapped it goes through a period where it lingers too much on how it could have kept the streak going. The Minutewomen were one game away from breaking the school-record for most consecutive wins but came up short with their loss to UConn. It's possible that UMass may go through this period, but the players think otherwise. They believe the defeat may have been a blessing in disguise.

"The loss might have helped us," said Jeffries. "We now know that we have to focus on sharpening our skills for the post season."

Determining the future

Tourney hopes on the horizon for men's lax

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

There's a good chance that fans will be searched for oranges before entering Richard J. Garber field Saturday morning.

And it'll be no surprise to the Amherst faithful. Two years ago – the last time Syracuse visited the area to face the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team – the game was interrupted multiple times due to fans throwing that citrus debris on the turf.

It's always a stirring atmosphere when the Orangemen come to town – Garber field is expecting its highest attendance of the season. And it's because Syracuse – the defending National Champions – rarely falls from the high ranks of Division I lacrosse.

"This a game that I think a lot of players on our team have been looking forward to play," senior captain Jeremy Guski said. "You always look forward to playing a top team just to show people that you can play with anybody."

The No. 2 Orangemen (9-2) come in riding a four game-winning-streak – their last loss coming on a one-goal disappointment April 7 at Loyola.

UMass (10-1, 4-1 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference) is coming off a 13-12 loss to Georgetown last Saturday – its first loss of the 2001 campaign. The blunder dropped the Minutemen four spots to No. 8.

Though nothing is certain, many "experts" have determined Saturday's match as a tell-all for the Maroon and White's immediate future. If UMass pulls off the upset, the NCAA tournament is a virtual lock. A loss, those "experts" say, knocks the Minutemen out of contention for one of the 12 tourney bids.

"If UMass beats us on Saturday they'll definitely be in the playoffs," Syracuse coach John Desko said. He would not speculate on UMass' post-season chances given a loss this weekend.

Insidelacrosse.com says that Virginia, if it wins its two final games, will probably fill one of the final spots in the bracket – despite its six losses. The website has also penciled in Hofstra – who the Minutemen drilled 17-13 in the first game of the season – barring a blunder by The Pride in the America East tournament. UMass' position is being accredited to a supposed weak schedule.

Still, coach Greg Cannella and his avengers remain focused.

"We're going into this with the notion that we're going to win the game," Cannella said. "Hopefully we can play well."

Last year, Syracuse destroyed the Minutemen in the Carrier Dome by a score of 17-7. The 'Cuse scored five goals in the first five minutes and never looked back.

"Syracuse really dominated us," Cannella said. "We weren't in the game for more than five minutes."

But UMass is a better team than last year. It fields one of the most potent offenses in the country (No. 1 in scoring margin, 7.91), led by senior Rich Kunkel – who was held scoreless for the first time this season versus Georgetown. And its defense has had little flaws, killing 36 of 65 man-down situations thus far.

Syracuse is directed by first-year attackman Michael Powell who ranks fourth in the country in points per game (4.36) and is tied for fifth in the nation in assists per game (2.5). The Orangeman defense is also very strong, led by junior John Glatzel in the middle.

"We've been competitive in every game that we've played, even in our losses," Desko said. "We have a lot of confidence in our close defense and our goalie has been playing extremely well so we aren't going to come in with any new schemes or game plans. We're going to play our Syracuse style of ball and if we have to make adjustments throughout the course of the game then we'll do that."

Though both teams should prove to be scoreboard killers, their respective goalies will give strong efforts to lessen that probability. Look for UMass' Chris Campolettano and Cuse's Rob Mulligan – who were the top two high school goalies in New York State five years ago – to make some exciting saves between the pipes and keep this one close.

But the key to UMass victory may lie in the face-off circle. UMass senior Jeff Seals, ranked No. 10 in face-off winning percentage (61 percent), will face the nation's best, senior Chris Cercy, who is winning 70 percent of his draws. If Seals can grab the majority of face-offs – the biggest momentum killer in the sport of lacrosse – then the Minutemen offense will be faced with less pressure on the 'Cuse end and have an easier time squeezing those oranges.

Saturday is UMass' future. A win stops all the second-guessing and kills every negative critique.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

The UMass men's lacrosse team knows that a win against Syracuse could be its ticket to the NCAA Tournament.

Syracuse tradition grim reality for Minutemen

In any athletic season, there are two steps that must be taken if a team is to succeed. The first step brings a team confidence, respect, and most importantly, an opportunity to reach the ultimate that the sport has to offer. The second step is to seize that chance and push one's way to the peak of the sport.

The 2001 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has accomplished the initial goal. The second challenge awaits them tomorrow.

The No. 8 Minutemen (10-1) had a slight setback last weekend, falling to Georgetown by a single goal, yet the game slated for 1 p.m. tomorrow afternoon at Richard F. Garber Field may well decide whether this squad can accomplish what it has not done since 1997: make the NCAA Tournament.

In an ironic twist, just when the Minutemen are reeking that playoff birth, they square off against one of the top programs in college lacrosse history. No. 2 Syracuse (9-2) comes to town high off last year's National Championship run and is riding a 20-game winning streak against UMass.

Steeped in tradition, Syracuse has won six national titles since 1983 (one was stripped due to the Orange using an ineligible player in 1990) and has been to two consecutive title games. It is only one title behind seven-time champion Johns Hopkins and comes in averaging over 5,000 fans per home contest. It has the experience, the confidence and the overall talent to take home the gold every year.

And the numbers do not lie. Behind legendary retired coach Roy Simmons, Jr. and current head coach John Desko, the Orange have used that experience and talent to go an astonishing 61-5 in the month of April since 1990. In addition, 'Cuse has gone 10-1 in regular season May games and 24-7 in the NCAA Tournament during that same span.

Which is precisely why UMass needs to win this game.

Not only would a victory solidify a spot in this year's tourney for UMass, but the Minutemen could finally get that proverbial monkey off its back and ride that cloud of confidence to the green pastures waiting at the end.

Of course the run won't be an easy one. Despite the loss of All-American and SU all-time leading scorer Ryan Powell, Syracuse comes in boasting one of the top teams in college lacrosse on both ends of the spectrum. Powell's younger brother, Mike, comes in fourth in the nation in points per game, averaging 4.78 goals per contest. Juniors Liam Banks and Josh Coffman, who combined to torch the Minutemen for six goals in the Dome last year, are back also. Chris Cercy is also back and leading the nation in face-off percentage, winning 70.4 percent taken. As a team, the Orange are coming in having beaten its opponents by an average of five goals per game while allowing a measly eight goals per contest.

UMass is a woeful 4-22 all-time against its foes from upstate New York, and has not beaten Syracuse since 1981, when it took home a 12-8 victory in Amherst. But two years ago, the Minutemen kept the game close at Garber Field, falling in the end 8-6. In 1996, the Minutemen lost in overtime 10-9.

UMass has a tradition of its own too. It is the seventh-winningest program in Division-I lacrosse history while its first coach, Richard F. Garber, is the all-time winningest collegiate lacrosse coach ever with 300 victories. It also has gone to 13 NCAA Tournaments, including nine since 1986.

UMass has the tradition and has proven that it can play with the six-time national champions. Now is the time to step up to the plate.

UMass crosses up Crusaders

Minutemen creep back above .500 in Worcester

By Matt Despres
Collegian Staff

As much as baseball is a day-to-day game, fought anew with the release of each pitch, there are times in a season when things just roll; your hitters connect, your rotation dominates and everything simply falls into place.

Enter the Massachusetts baseball team.

The Minutemen (16-15, 8-5 Atlantic 10) have done a fine job in their last two games of re-establishing that tone, defeating Holy Cross (15-19) yesterday afternoon, 10-4, to pick up their second consecutive win and once again climb over the .500 mark.

Junior outfielder Mike Kulak stood atop the offensive showcase, going three for five with four RBI's, including a huge triple in the top of the seventh that gave UMass ample breathing room to walk away with the win.

Trailing 3-2 after two innings of play, the Minutemen began to turn things on, as senior Nick Gorneault stepped up and singled home left fielder Connell Clark to knot things at three.

Not wanting to rest on their heels, the Minutemen again dug themselves out of a one-run deficit, scoring an additional two runs in the top of the fourth to regain the lead, this time for good.

Kulak began the rally by driving home senior Gavin Clark with a single to right field that tied things up at four. In a position to give UMass the edge, Connell Clark ripped a triple to left center, sending home Kulak and giving the Maroon and White the go ahead run.

Freshman Adam Stojanowski led off the decisive seventh inning by reaching on an error, and was followed by Gorneault, who took his base after watching the leftfielder misplay the ball. With one out, Aaron Senez singled through the left side to score Stojanowski, putting UMass up by one. With a chance to put things away, Kulak delivered, sending a triple to center field that scored Gorneault, Senez and Scott Anderson, giving the UMass rotation a comfortable cushion from which it could work.

Supporting the comeback was senior lefty Craig Szado, who allowed four runs on seven hits and struck out six over six innings of work to improve to 3-3 on the season. Senior Nick Skirkanich came on in the seventh to secure the victory, allowing no runs on three hits and five strikeouts to earn his second save of the year.

Jay Carberry took the loss for Holy Cross, allowing six runs on eight hits in 6 2/3 innings of work.

The Minutemen return to action on Tuesday, May 1, as they travel to Fenway Park in Boston to face the Harvard Crimson in the first round of the annual Beanpot Classic. UMass will have revenge in mind, as the Crimson dealt head coach Mike Stone and his team a devastating 21-11 loss on Tuesday.

Since that loss, however, the Minutemen have turned in what are arguably their strongest two outings of the season. By settling in at the plate and looking to its top four starters for solid pitching, UMass has, at times, made a legitimate case for itself in the A-10.

UMass took the Beanpot crown last year, defeating Northeastern University 13-8. Then, freshman Jeff Altieri had a superb afternoon, going three for four with a double, two home runs and five RBI's.

The Minutemen are 8-1 all-time in Beanpot play, having won four of the last five tournament titles.

'Real World' members talk about safe sex

By Chanel Dubofsky
Collegian Staff

Admit it. You watch it. Even if you have never seen an episode of MTV's "The Real World" before, you still might have found yourself in the Campus Center Auditorium on Thursday, April 26.

"The Real Truth from The Real World," sponsored by the Stonewall Center, was part of Queer Fest, a week long promotion and celebration of the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender community at the University of Massachusetts.

A recurring theme throughout the evening was the importance of finding an accepting community in which to be proud of one's identity. The event included a performance by the Not Ready for Bedtime Players and featured Ruthie, a cast member from "The Real World Hawaii," and a panel of students and community members who answered questions from the audience in a scenario meant to mirror the MTV show "Loveline," where viewers call in with their questions on sexuality and relationships.

In addition to commenting on questions related to identity, family and coming out, the subject of safe sex was also mentioned. While all the panelists concurred that safe sex was important, many admitted that they did not practice it.

"You don't hear about women contracting diseases from each other, but it's definitely possible," said one panelist. A representative from University Health Services noted, "It's important to make an informed decision about your health by knowing the status of your partner."

Ruthie took a semester off from her studies at Rutgers University in order to film "The Real World," for which she says she was the "quickest person to get picked in the history of the show. You have to be open and not afraid to do silly stuff on video tape." At Rutgers she took part in several pride marches, as well as Take Back the Night, an event focusing on the experience of violence against women and won several awards for her spoken word poetry.

When asked by an audience member about confronting her bisexuality, she replied, "At first I was afraid to come out, but after the show began, I wasn't afraid to go out there and just be. I don't feel like I'm out, I feel like I'm me. I wish a lot of people felt that way." She also spoke of her reticence in admitting her sexuality to herself. "I didn't want to be gay. I dated a lot of guys, but it didn't work."

Steven, a panelist, is also a member of the Stonewall Center's Speakers Bureau, a group of students who share their experiences being gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgen-

Butterfield fall leaves student injured

By Jessica May
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student suffered critical injuries when he fell 35 feet from the roof of Butterfield dormitory while attempting to retrieve a flag early Friday morning.

Thomas Degnan, 20-year-old sophomore Natural Resource Conservation major from Marshfield, Mass., fell from the slate roof that shelters Butterfield. Degnan is a resident of Baker dormitory, which lies on Clark Hill Road across from Butterfield.

According to UMass Police Chief John Luippold, Degnan exited the building through a fourth floor bathroom window and while on his way back into the building, slipped and fell onto the patio.

"It was a prank," he said. "The flag belonged to a student or students in that building.

The UMPD was alerted to the incident at 2:14 a.m. While three officers initially responded, additional officers as well as Amherst Fire Department ambulance personnel had to be dispatched due to the severity of the incident. The AFD administered first aid to Degnan at the scene.

Degnan was transported a half mile to the North Fire Station by ambulance, and then air lifted to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield, Mass. where he is currently being treated in the intensive care unit.

"There is no indication of a party or a group of students," said Luippold. There was, however, a witness who did not go out on to the roof. The witness is a student at the University who lives off-campus and is still being questioned by UMass police.

The witness indicated to UMass police that Degnan was attempting to capture the flag as part of a prank. Students of Butterfield indicated that there is a rivalry between Butterfield residents of those of surrounding dorms to capture and keep the flag.

It has yet to be determined if Degan was under the influence of drugs or alcohol at the time of the incident.

"We're still waiting for the toxicology report from the hospital," Luippold said. "The report will not be available for 2-3 weeks."

Butterfield residents, who gathered on the lawn outside the dormitory, were somber after they witnessed the incident. A Friday night prayer vigil was planned.

The flag attempted by Degnan was black and depicted an image of a skull and cross bones. According to campus lore, the flag has been flying over the dormitory for about 30 years. It was allegedly placed there when the dorm declared itself to be a separate country free from University control. This goal was never achieved, though the residents of Butterfield must purchase a separate meal plan.

"The skull and crossbones flag is not the flag of rape, pillage and piracy," Ben Sandrof, former Butterfield resident told the Daily Hampshire Gazette. It is a symbol of the cooperative dormitory's independence and community, other students said.

At this time, no charges are being brought but the incident is still under investigation.

UMass News Director Barbara Pitoniak said, "[There is] no comment at this time from the Chancellor." However, she assures that if students feel they need support "they can avail themselves to mental health services, chaplains or residence hall staff."

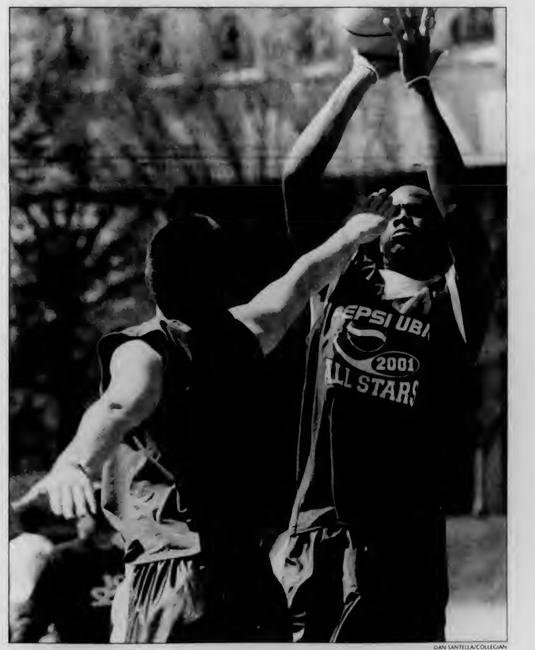
HAIGIS HOOPLA



DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

The face of determination. One of over 1,000 Haigis Hoopla participants elevates for a jumper in the face of tough defense.

For all the Hoopla: it's still for love of the game

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

There was a point on Saturday where, next to the campus pond, the cacophony of Haigis Hoopla couldn't be heard. No blown whistles, no booming hip-hop, no shouts, nothing. The only sound was of a goose sunning herself in the middle of the pond, gliding along under a cloudless sky.

There wasn't anybody at the Campus Pond Saturday; they were all at Haigis. Nobody witnessed the serenity. There was basketball to play.

If Caligula had been a basketball fan, he would have been at Haigis. It is an orgy of basketball: more than 30 courts, 300 teams and at least 1,000 players. On two days that were deceptively cooler than they appeared to be, at least 600 games were played. But it isn't about the specific numbers, as impressive as they might be. It's about the game.

Maybe it's about the game anyway. There was a lot of promotion going on during the tournament on the Haigis lawn. Everybody's got a t-shirt with sponsors on the back. The Army set up a large climbing wall; Bueno y Sano sold burritos; YooHoo showed up with the biggest bottle of YooHoo ever made; boxes of Cape Cod Potato Chips kept blowing over in the wind. New Balance gave away shoes; and nothing says basketball like AC Delco auto parts. Haigis isn't just basketball, it's a chance to sponsor and advertise. On the bottom corner of this year's Haigis poster, there's even a little Daily Collegian symbol. And despite all of that, plus the logos that covered players' clothes and shoes, Haigis was about the game.

And the sponsorship. But mostly about the game.

That's why there are so many people getting sunburned; they are there for the game. They are playing or they're watching or they're waiting. A significant part of Haigis is the waiting. Everybody's always waiting for the next game. Each team gets to play three. It's guaranteed in the contract. Games are, inexplicably, to 14. Teams have to win by two or it's the first team to 17. Fouls only get counted after eight points. When the teams aren't playing, they're waiting. Few people seem genuinely interested in the vendors on the lawn. There are a few people climbing the Army wall, but everyone wants to watch the other games. Little kids and older men, local coaches and the referees; they all seem so interested with the game itself.

If they're interested, the teams playing are intense. They've all got a strategy that's going to put them over their opposition. Some of the teams try to overcompensate for a lack of size with speed and hustle. Some of the teams try to out muscle their opposition. Some teams try to out-class the others. And some teams dominate.

That's what the Spuds did against the Drake Ballers on Saturday afternoon. The Spuds are an older team and two of the players, Brian Dandrea and Rod Paymeneyer, are 44 and 45 respectively. They're much slower than the Ballers. They can't jump as high. They aren't as quick, even when they're not being forced to run. The Drake Ballers know this and try to take the game right at the Spuds. Between the two of them, Dandrea and Paymeneyer, neither score more than three points – two taller players on the team do most of the scoring, including an outside shooter who's on early – but their team wins, 14-5. Constantly subbing, the Spuds absolutely dominate the Ballers, who can't hit a shot. And when Dandrea hits his only shot of the game, a bank shot from the top of the key, his defender rolls his eyes in frustration.

Both love the competition. Paymeneyer says he doesn't know who "this Haigis guy is, but he puts on a great tournament." Dandrea sums up his game, saying that he wished he were 20 years younger. He's a project engineer for Avery Denison during the day, and he only plays for fun otherwise. Paymeneyer's a landscaper – he took the weekend off for the tournament – and he says he enjoys playing and watching the games.

While the Spuds were handling the Drake Ballers, there was a man in a Magic Johnson Lakers jersey (a sacrilege in this part of the country) on an adjacent court, shooting from beyond the spray-painted arc. He doesn't miss. He's balding with faint tattoos on his shoulders. During his game (games are always going on), he throws a no-look pass over his shoulder, Magic-like, to an open teammate who drains the shot.

Dandrea and Paymeneyer breath heavily after their first game – Dandrea is particular sweaty – and get ready for their next.

Their opposites, players in the 10 and 11-year-olds game, run around on another nearby court. They're almost aimless in their strategy. At that age, they've graduated from a rundown approach to their offense, but they're certainly not ready to run the Princeton backdoor cut. One of the players, one of a set of twins, Dan Clark, looks like a little Jason Williams. He's lanky with a shaved head. He's the best dribbler and scores because he grew before the rest of the kids on his team. Like everybody else who's playing, he seems to love throwing no-look passes.

A coach is flailing his arms, begging his team to run a pick-and-roll, but when they finally get the message, the play is busted so Dan just scores again. His dad Mitch likes the experience that his boys are getting.

He says it's good for them to play against kids they never met (they're from Deerfield), because in local recreation leagues, they're constantly playing against their friends. For his part, Dan is frenetic and gives quick answers.

Who's your favorite player?

"Vince Carter," he says, looking away quickly. He runs off. The coach's wife, whose own daughter isn't playing because she's too young, is mad because the kids are going to get swelled heads from getting interviewed for this article.

Nearby, the Rednecks have just won 14-12. There's a lot of jawing with the referee during the game (nothing like setting an example for the kids), but afterwards, everyone pats one another on the butt. Scott Wood, who's in his thirties, but seems much younger, was on the post and tries to explain to the ref that his opponent was hooking his arm.

"This is a good time and everyone's allowed to go to the second day, so at least we get our money's worth," Wood says. His team is playing in Weekend Jammers. The skill level of the teams seems to having nothing to do with their division. Half the teams interviewed for this article seemed to be playing way over or way under their heads, respectively. In fact, the only division that really seems to feature players in their appropriate division is the top one.

Yesterday, they're all playing on the front courts in front of the Fine Arts Center. The day before, a player injured himself running into WMUA's radio equipment during a pick up game. Two players suddenly scrambled for the ball and one ran the other into the setup. The booming hip hop music cuts out, then back in, then stutters, as the CDs in the tray were knocked free.

The problem with games on the front two courts is that they're impossible to watch. The games on both are always pulsing affairs. Right after the transmitter is hit, a player shoots from outside and looks away before it hits the bottom of the net. The game is over and they've won, 14-7. Everything happens too fast for any one person to follow and that means picking favorite games. On Sunday, there are plenty to choose from.

Mike Babul, a three-time Atlantic 10 All-Defensive Team selection, is playing. No more Mullins Center. No more NCAA Tournament. No more Rip Hamilton or Ron Artest or Kenny Gregory to guard. He's reduced to playing in front of maybe 100 people in the hot sun in the mid-afternoon against guys who might have started their senior year in high school. He still doesn't shoot and realistically, it doesn't look like he cares that much. He throws passes and lets his team do the scoring. He watches from the top of the arc. One of his teammates keeps trying to use a ridiculous hand-fake that nobody's bought yet. Babul's twin brother, Jon, is watching from the sidelines. A player tries to drive to the basket by dribbling through Babul's legs. Mike knew it was coming; the player gets the ball back and tries again. It won't matter in the long run, as Babul's team moves on, 14-8.

Cut away to Court One, with the bent rim from the dunk competition that Jameel Pugh would have won had he only competed, where a player going up for a rebound gets undercut and grabs his wrist in pain. The injury becomes important later in the game. KFC, a team from Fitchburg, is griping to the referee even though they're up by 10.

"C'mon referee, call it," a player whines.

"I won't bail you out in front of these people," shoots back a disinterested referee. The team from Fitchburg is the kind of team that abuses the rules and complains every time their opposition does the same thing.

"That's just unsportsmanlike," says a woman in the crowd, decked out in UMass women's basketball warm-ups. Her favorite team is losing to the Fitchburg team.

It's 11-5 and the Fitchburgers start up again. It's 13-7 and they still haven't gotten a call. It's 13-9 and they can't finish the game. From the top of the key, the player who has been the loudest lobs a pass to a cutting teammate who reverses the lay-up, finishing the other team. The teammate beat the injured player's replacement on the play.

The referees complain about the volume of WMUA's music after one of the next game's players does. He's quite short and it is a bet that his team is going to play the quick game. Out-hustle, out-shoot, out-think and pray that enough goes in before the opposition's big men can beat them. It's a simple style, but nobody's supporting them, at least no one from the WMUA table.

3Dom Ring, the shorter team, starts out hot, burying four two-pointers in a row. It's 8-0 in the blink of an eye. With the music quiet, they communicate as best they can and eventually make one more two-pointer.

The opposition is, predictably, unorganized and unready to play against such speedy opposition; Ring loses its long-distance shot, but they've opened up their opposition, Excellent Money, and four quick lay-ups later, Ring wins 14-8.

Back to the other court. Kathy Coyner, the UMass women's basketball standout, might be playing her last pseudo-official game on campus. Graduated former teammates Tonia Thomas and Jaywana Bradley and a cheering section of current UMass players join her. Coach Joanie O'Brien disappears before the game begins.

Coyner drives the baseline and makes a double pump lay-up after a foul had been called. Her teammates stand and shake towels at her. Meanwhile, the opposition never had a chance, but Thomas is playing the game with a ferocious intensity, and when a call goes against her, she turns around and screams "motherfucker." She posts up against a player much taller than she, turns around and buries a jumper. She wobbles her head a little bit, acknowledging how badly she just schooled the other girl. Her opposition can only agree with Thomas.

And that opposition is later soundly beaten by a crossover reverse layup from the UMass team's fourth player, someone's friend from New York. She's who's wearing glasses and a pink bandana tied around tight braids and a white tanktop. Nobody really knows who she is, but one of the UMass players says she's "nice" and they mean her style of play, not her demeanor. UMass wins 14-11.

This is Haigis. Games that don't, in the long run, matter. The sun's unforgiving – nobody goes home without getting burnt – and the winner's euphoria won't last for more than a few hours. Nobody will remember who won tomorrow and it won't matter anyway.

It isn't about the championship or the individual points scorer or the best rebounder; it's about basketball and all of the different people who come together, for two warm days at the beginning of a Massachusetts spring, to play a simple game.

So yeah, nobody was next to the pond Saturday afternoon watching the peaceful scene. Why would they be? There was a game to be watched and everybody was playing.

der with the community. He pinpointed the "self identification process" involved in coming out, and remembers thinking "Maybe if I try, I'll be straight."

Several panelists also spoke about the pain of being cut off from family and friends once they had come out.

"It takes a lot of inner strength," said Steven, who in his experienced learned to redefine the concept of family. Rather than biological, he feels that what constitutes family is "people who actually love you."

While Ruthie admitted she had been fortunate in not being harassed for her sexual orientation, Steven stressed the importance of creating dialogue with people who express a homophobic mind-set.

"If there is an opportunity for dialogue, make it. Make them think about themselves."

Historical Perspectives

Who is Morrill? And how did the building get its name?

By Laura Leonard
Collegian Correspondent

The Morrill Act, signed by Abraham Lincoln on the second day of July 1862, assured the Commonwealth of federal assistance and brought its leaders to a point of action in building a state college.

Gov. John A. Andrew undertook the task of supplying direction. On January 9, 1863, Andrew presented his plan to the Legislature.

"I have no idea!"

The conditions of the Morrill act were accepted on April 18, 1863, and nine days later the measure dividing the land grant revenue became law. On April 28, the charter for the new college was passed, and was signed by the governor on the following day.

The board of 14 trustees, most of whom had appeared before the caving committee as representatives of the state board of agriculture, were entrusted with the task of creating the new college.

Massachusetts established more private colleges in the era of the Civil War then it had in any previous decade. None of these colleges, however, faced more problems then did the newly chartered state college of agriculture. Andrew had failed to commit the Commonwealth firmly to a policy of state support of the new institution.

The town of Southampton fought for the college. The Hampshire Gazette, while shuddering at the thought of spending $75,000 on mere education, nevertheless cheerfully urged its wealthier farmer readers to loosen their purse strings that the town might profit from the presence of this college. On February 9, 1864, it was announced that $50,000 had been pledged and that the Willow Oliver Smith seemed to offer possibilities of further bid.

Meanwhile, interest in the college was developing in Amherst, across the river from Northampton. For more than a decade the Hampshire County Agriculture Society had centered in this community. Several members of the Society were called faculty and were listed in its membership, and the institution's college home was utilized for its annual meetings. William S. Clark of Amherst College, and Levi Stockbridge (a farmer of neighboring Hadley) were both members of the state board of agriculture and both held seats in the House of Representatives in 1864. Both would play an increasingly important part in the history of Massachusetts Agricultural College.

Amherst's efforts to win the new college were persistent ones, which eventually met with success. By January of 1864, $75,000 was raised by members through subscription. One-third of this was promised by Amherst College, the remainder by a number of public-spirited citizens. Col. William S. Clark assured the town that it faced no serious competition from Northampton; he felt that people there were lukewarm to the idea and that legal encumbrances which the college would meet from Smith would decrease the likelihood of the trustees undertaking such an ordeal.

In October the campus of 310 acres was purchased from six Amherst owners at a cost of $34,999.50.

Seventy-three adjoining additional acres desired by the trustees (but beyond their immediate resources) were assured for the college when Nathan Durfee bought them with $8,000 of his own money. Massachusetts Agricultural College, or M. A. C., came into existence.

Rock the Vote

All Collegian staff members must vote for in Editor-In-Chief elections by 3 p.m. today!! We don't want another tie and every vote counts.

The Provost of the University of Massachusetts, Dr. Cora B. Marrett, and the Phi Kappa Phi Chapter of this University are proud to announce the following new members invited from the Junior and Senior classes as well as the Graduate School and approved by the Chapter in accordance with the by laws of the National Society.

Phi Kappa Phi was founded in 1897 at the University of Maine and was originally named The Morrill Society, in honor of the sponsor of the Congressional act which provided for land-grant colleges and universities. In 1900 it was transformed into a national society by the Presidents of The University of Maine, The University of Tennessee, and Pennsylvania State University. The next Chapter to join was the University of Massachusetts Amherst, which remains the fourth-oldest Chapter in the United States. The society was renamed Phi Kappa Phi in 1900, form the initial letter of the Greek words forming it's adopted motto: Philosopia Drateito Photon, "Let the Love of Learning Rule Mankind."

The Honor Society of Phi Kappa Phi

To be eligible for membership, Juniors must have a GPA of 3.80 and Seniors a GPA of 3.75. Only two Graduate Students per program are nominated by their Graduate Directors.

The Phi Kappa Phi Initiation Ceremony will be held in Mahar Auditorium, on Sunday, May 6th, 2001, at 11:00 AM. University Chancellor David K. Scott is the featured speaker, and music will be provided by bigband piper David de la Barre and the University of Massachusetts Graduate String Trio.

Still having unsafe oral sex?

Get Real

Last Thursday, April 26, the Stonewall Center hosted "Real Truth from MTV's 'The Real World,'" an open panel with a mission: to talk about being queer, sex, and "what life is really like when people stop being polite and start getting real." The featured guest was Ruthie, from "The Real World: Hawaii." Topics for discussion ranged from how starring on a so-called reality TV show affected relationships, to how many notches on a belt constitute promiscuity.

The conversation was a mixed bag of uncensored questions on many sensitive topics, the answers to which highlighted truisms of college sexual activity that are seldom voiced. For instance, the panelists and the participating cast member revealed that though they believe in having "safe sex," they often forego precautions that they perceive limit pleasure. One bisexual participant noted that she practices safe sex with men, but turns a blind eye to the risks of female-to-female oral sex.

It is a common misconception that only penetration constitutes "real" sex, and that oral sex, since it isn't real sex, is less risky than intercourse.

Sure, you won't get pregnant from giving head. But you could get gonorrhea of the throat.

Those students who have attended one of University Health Service Dr. Abel's sex lectures (perhaps through the Honors Program) will remember that one in four college students has at least one sexually transmitted disease by the time he or she graduates. Hate to break it to you, but oral sex counts as a method to transmit those viruses and bacteria. Those fluids are going somewhere, kapeesh? The mint-flavored dental dams he plugged: learn how to use 'em.

How can anyone make safe sex more palatable (no pun intended) to the college crowd? The simple answer is, "not possible." You can't frighten most people into compliance with a code of condom conduct. You can't mandate the inclusion of rubber in a deeply personal, intimate act.

All you can do is protect yourself. When you participate in sex, including oral sex, remember that you have the option to use a condom or dental dam.

Or you could avoid it altogether. A few years ago renowned talk show "sexpert" Dr. Ruth spoke in the Fine Arts Center. She advocated mutual masturbation as a healthy form of sexual activity with relatively low risk for STDs. When asked to provide more suggestions, she arched her eyebrows and said, "An armpit?"

Jackass

LAURA SICILIANO

I love MTV. I love "The Real World," "Road Rules," "TRL," "DFX," "Making the Video," "Undressed" ...I love it all. MTV is cheesy, easy fun for me. However, there is one exception to my watching of MTV ...Sunday nights. I don't like "Fear." I don't like wrestling, and I certainly don't like "Jackass." For me, a good time is not watching people be injured. Apparently, however, seeing people become battered, bruised and beat up is pretty amusing for some.

"Jackass" forms the centerpiece of MTV's "Jackass Sunday Nights." Jackass features a star named Johnny Knoxville who, along with his buddies, performs stupid, usually dangerous stunts, such as setting himself on fire, riding bicycles into walls and port-a-potties, and being a human "steak" on a barbecue.

The show has quite a large following among middle and high school boys, who are attracted to "Jackass Sunday Nights" by the title of the show as well as a WWF wrestling television show. Despite a warning not to try the stunts at home, several middle school aged boys have been hurt imitating the stunts. One boy tried the barbecue trick and received 3rd degree burns (the boy did not wear the heat safe suit the Johnny Knoxville wore) and another boy sprayed his leg with bug spray and then set it ablaze, also suffering severe burns. Although MTV does not accept videotaped submissions of stunts from viewers, last week in Kentucky, some high school boys tried to make a tape suitable for submission to MTV.

Four friends set up a stunt where one boy stood in the middle of the road, two boys got in the car and drove at him, and the fourth boy videotaped the entire incident. The car hit the boy in the road somewhere at a speed between 30-40 miles per hour. The boy who was hit sustained somewhat severe injuries, including several broken bones. The two boys driving the car are being charged with reckless endangerment and there is discussion of the other two boys being charged as well, including the victim. The district attorney from the area in Kentucky claims that MTV is "morally culpable" for the accident, and is looking into what can be done to hold the station responsible. As in the other cases, MTV has not claimed responsibility, and has also claimed total innocence in this case because no stunt like the one the boys set up has appeared on the show.

The question arises as to why these 16-year-old boys would want to perform such a stunt, in particular, why one 16-year-old would be willing to be hit by an automobile. The warning "Do not try this at home" would seem to me to be enough to stop me from trying a dangerous stunt. It did not stop the 11 and 13-year-old boys from Connecticut who were severely burned in their stunts. In fact, one of the boys said something to the effect of, "It says 'do not try this at home,' not 'do not try this.'" These boys seem to be ignorant of the severe dangers that their actions put them in and unaware of the injuries that they later would sustain. In this day and age, this ignorance is frightening, and the bravado, machismo and recklessness of the actions of these boys is horrifying.

Who knows why these boys would do such things? Apparently the risks and dangers that stunts such as these pose are not clear to the young men. Perhaps Johnny Knoxville and his "Jackass" cohorts seem invincible. I would argue, however, that it is not just "Jackass" that is sending a feeling of invincibility to young boys. Since these children were young, they have been playing video games that have gotten consistently more realistic, where murder and mayhem constantly occur, and then when kids have had their fill, they can just turn the game off and do something else. People have become desensitized to violence and things seem to happen without repercussions.

I don't think that MTV is to blame for the stupid acts of these kids. I do not feel this way just because I am such a big fan of MTV. Rather, I believe that people should be held accountable for what they do. Personal responsibility (or lack thereof) needs to be addressed. These boys put themselves at risk and should have known better. Fire burns and cars can kill. However, the producers of "Jackass," and other shows, movies and video games, which show violence occurring without all of the repercussions, need to think long and hard about what they are doing. As sad as it is, television does have a strong influence on children, and television should try for that influence to be positive, rather than negative. In the meantime, MTV should go back to its roots, play some music videos and make sure that its lineup remains easy, light, and fun, rather than based on the violence and danger of "Jackass."

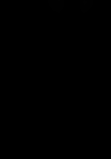
The dirtiest words are "Never, Won't and Can't"



RYAN BENHARRIS

It's kind of creepy. The countdown to my non-existence at this University and more importantly of course at this newspaper is winding toward an instantaneous halt. After this column, I only have two more editorials remaining. It's sad that I count the amount of time I have left of school by the number of ed/ops I have left to write, but when you've put so much effort into something like I have at this newspaper, it becomes your most treasured way to express yourself, and ultimately your device for determining how long your connection with the rest of the outside world will actually last.

In the last few months, I have written a variety of pieces. I've tried to alternate weekly between something humorous and something serious. Most of my humor columns are better received than my sadder ones. I think this is because people have difficulty acknowledging sadness as a form of effectiveness. It's much easier to walk up to someone and say, "Hey, your article was really funny," than it is to say, "Hey, your article was really sad." I think people feel guilty admitting that they enjoyed a more depressing piece, but it is okay to do so. As a writer I feel that I have the obligation to work with both emotions and fuel a readership off of that. Anyone who takes pride in what they write will tell you that you simply cannot stick with one thought or one emotion. You need to keep it fresh, with something different to stir up a new response every time. To be as powerfully gripping when you write melancholy as when you write funniness is quite a challenge, if you do it right, it has to leave an impact.

That being said, I'll tell you that this will be the last time you will read anything less than happy by me in the Collegian. This is a relatively big claim to make because I presume all that I'm going to be unhappy all of the time, and therefore I'll always have something miserable to write about. But my pledge is to at least try to make my last two columns pleasurable.

Pleasure is difficult to find when you're such an utter pessimist like I am. It's funny, after I wrote my "Notes from the Campus Center Basement," last week, someone anonymously responded on the web-board about the part where I assumed I would end up in a ditch somewhere, because some random woman, sometime in life pushed me in it. The message said, "Way to be an optimist Ry," sarcastically. Humorously, the poster signed her comment, "randomgirl."

Being a pessimist is something that I've discovered you really can't help. It's a disease. No one wants to be pessimistic; it just happens. It's automatic. You don't even think before using words like never, won't and can't. They are as regular a part of your vocabulary as your own name, and they are a stigmatic disgrace for everything you say and do. Pessimists of the world can certainly relate to me on this. You just always have that feeling like you're doing something wrong, and it's not good enough for anyone. It's a really sad thing. I don't feel bad for myself about it, I just really would love to make it go away. Like a 12-step program, the first step is to recognize the problem. The next eleven steps are just fighting to stop yourself from always sliding into the addicting habit that pessimism so quickly becomes. I'm just really, really sick of being a pessimist...

I'm sick of always assuming that I'm the ugliest person in the room.

I'm sick of not being able to tell a woman how I feel about her, because I'm one hundred percent sure it will result in rejection, which only forces me to end my day in disappointment and longing, instead of happiness or at very least, assurance.

I'm sick of watching someone else take exactly what I want from right in front of me, because I didn't even bother to ask for it.

I'm sick of complaining to Elena, Rob, Jackie, Mike, Ben, Scola, Alicia, Josh, Scott, Ken and whoever else I can think of, about the same damn thing, over and over and over again until I know you're so sick of me, but still listen because you're good friends. Thank you, and I'm so sorry to all of you.

I'm sick of being that guy who walks into every exam whining, "I'm definitely going to fail this."

I'm sick of not trusting people: friends in particular.

I'm sick of mentally devising these ridiculous stories about why people are trying to screw me over, when in reality, no one's trying to screw me over and I know that.

I'm sick of cringing every time my parents call because I'm sure they have something to yell at me about or some reason to ruin my day.

I'm sick of picturing myself as this mammoth fat kid who gets larger every time he eats the smallest piece of food.

I'm sick of visualizing my life as one that, thirty years from now, includes me applying for my fiftieth job, still living at home with my dad, un-married and crying nightly.

I'm sick of crying nightly.

I'm sick of fearing my high school reunion, even though it's like a year away because I know I'm going to be considered the failure in the class.

I'm sick of complaining about how much my last year in college predominantly sucked so much. If I think this is bad, wait till next year when there is no college.

I'm sick of thinking that people who don't call just don't care.

I'm sick of believing that when people don't IM me on Instant Messenger when I sign on, it's because they have a problem with me. There is something very wrong with that train of thought. If I've said it once, I've set it a thousand times: Instant Messenger is the worst device ever created.

I'm sick of using the phrase, "If I wasn't here, no one would care anyway."

I'm sick of climbing into my car hoping that the only thing that happens is that I don't crash and die, and having that hope dictate the whole way I drive.

I'm sick of hiding behind my writing. It seems like the second I sit down at a computer, I'm Johnny on the spot with the right thing to say and do.

I'm sick of presuming that if I have a crummy day I can just write about it in the newspaper and get some sort of public sympathy for it. That's such a horrible thing to do to anyone who reads our publication, and ultimately is more of an embarrassment to it than anything else.

Being a pessimist has a lot to do with self-confidence. If you don't have a lot, or any at all, you'll automatically assume that things aren't going to go your way and that you're going to be the victim of the shorter end of the stick. I guess I'm just constantly inclining myself to be victimized, and I'm sick of being unconfident. It hurts so much that the ideal world I truly want can never be a reality because I don't ever believe in myself about anything.

You know what though? I may be a pessimist, but I'm also pretty certain that I'm a good person. I simply wish I could make that goodness stimulate my energy and actions instead of my dominating pessimism. But I'm sure I'll never be able to do that. I won't. I can't.

Ruby Dune to celebrate first LP at Iron Horse

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

Ruby Dune, one of the many promising bands to coalesce out of UMass' jam/groove community, will be taking a major step in its career with the release of its first album, Wanderings, at a CD release party at the Iron Horse Music Hall on May 3.

The album represents not only a material accomplishment for a band that has been paying its dues in the somewhat cramped UMass music scene and the next step in its maturation, but an opportunity for the band to finalize a body of material that has been in a state of development and flux since Spring of 98, when Ruby Dune formed.

"This recording that we're putting out is kind of like a completion of these songs that have been reworked for around 10 years," said guitarist/vocalist Vim Tingle, who wrote much of the material for the album well before Ruby Dune came together. "We've been using those songs to learn how to play."

Since the band's inception, the music has been examined and changed and changed again, to the point where the band finds their old tapes uncomfortable to listen to.

"Going back to tapes of us, we see how much better we play, things that didn't work, things that did work," said drummer Vin D'Agostino.

Ruby Dune (completed by Jordan Richmond on bass and Jay Zubiel on keyboards) had made previous efforts at putting together a live album to sell at their shows, homeproducing around 30 copies of a disc none of the band members were fully satisfied with. Similarly, before deciding to record Wanderings themselves using digital recording technology and computers as the backbone of the operation, the band had dropped a lot of money on a one-day studio session that left them with a single lackluster recording.

"We spent a good chunk of money on a song that we were totally disgusted with," said D'Agostino on the band's 10-hour struggle against the depletive studio atmosphere.

The May 3 show will be the band's fourth performance at the Iron Horse, an accomplishment in itself and something about which the band members are understandably proud, their last appearance at the venue being one of the highlights of their careers thus far.

"Musically we were really great that night, and the crowd was loving it. Even employees at the Iron Horse were loving it," said D'Agostino, adding, "We're a live band – we always do something to make people want to stick around."

One of the band's favorite strategies for maintaining that style of fun and uncertainty has been an unlikely assortment of cover songs, including Michael Jackson's "Billie Jean," Guns N' Roses's "Sweet Child of Mine," The Jackson 5's "I Want You Back" and (a crowd favorite) "Take On Me" by 80's pop sensation A-Ha.

Ruby Dune will also be playing the main stage at Fill the Hill this semester, and will be playing with The Slip at Dartmouth College on May 26.

VH1 airs "Pearl Jam: Touring Band" toinight

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

Tonight VH1 airs, "Pearl Jam: Touring Band," a behind the scenes look at the making of a DVD (of the same title as tonight's show) to be released tomorrow about what is arguably the most successful alternative rock band of the past 15 years.

The VH1 special, which premiers at 8:00 p.m., provides an in-depth look at the video to be released in stores tomorrow that follows Pearl Jam through last year's summer tour. The tour came after a relatively unsuccessful launch of their most recent release, Binaural. Regardless of the stability of the album, the tour preceding it was one of the highest grossing concerts in 2000, and each crowd in each city was met with sell-out after sell-out, night after night.

The DVD that VH1 will spotlight is a compilation of 28 Pearl Jam songs from their six studio albums. It features live versions of songs such as mega-hit singles "Daughter," "Betterman" and perhaps their most recognizable recording, "Jeremy." The DVD also contains lesser known cuts as well as untitled tracks. Special features on the DVD include outtakes of the band backstage and the entire video for "Do the Evolution," which was directed by Spawn creator Todd McFarlan. The most intriguing special feature is known as "stationary Matt-cam." On "Evacuation" and "Even Flow," a heavier percussion mix from drummer Matt Cameron is blended into the soundtrack. The DVD also contains the video for "Oceans" from Pearl Jam's critically acclaimed debut Ten, which was named one of the top albums of the 1990s by Spin Magazine. The "Oceans" video has never been released before in the United States.

Tomorrow's widespread release of "Pearl Jam: Touring Band," comes just months after the band released bootlegs of every show on both their European and North American tours from 2000. The albums, which total 72 different bootlegs and one live compilation album from their 1998 tour, entitled Live on Two Legs, is the largest known collection of retail live music for one particular act in existence.

Representatives for Pearl Jam claimed that the release of all of the bootleg albums would dissuade people from buying extremely low quality bootlegs from other people, especially online for extraordinarily high prices. Each bootleg retails at $16.99. Illegal bootlegs traded online could cost over $50-$75, sometimes even more if purchased through an online auction with no capping price limit.

Though the DVD goes on sale tomorrow, it has been available for several weeks through the band's web page online. Members of Pearl Jam's Ten Club have been able to purchase the album for a special price. The suggested retail price of the DVD is $24.99.

Tonight's VH1 special will highlight the making of the DVD. It acts as a behind the scenes of the behind the scenes. One can only imagine if another company, such as the E! Network will make a behind the scenes of the VH1 special. It could be called, "Behind the scenes on the network that produces 'Behind the music,' and its production of behind the scenes of a DVD about Pearl Jam, that goes behind the scenes of Pearl Jam's touring experience." That title probably wouldn't fit in TV Guide though.

I was desperately trying to think of what I could write about this week, because thanks to John, who demanded a humorous column, I experienced my first case of writer's block. You can't tell someone to be funny, damn it! This, as you can tell, embittered me. And so, this is the column that I would like to dub, 10 Things I Hate about U(Mass)... Fashion.

Hootchies – Fakeness and I just don't get along too well, so I'm especially annoyed by the UMass Queens of Hootch running around with neon-orange fake-and-bake tans, Saran Wrap-like tube tops, the most malnourished bony little arms and bleached out hair. I swear the school provides incoming female students with a hootchie-kit – complete with glitter, four-inch platform boots, tanning certificates to Carla's Creations, a white tube-top and a bright teal thong. I think it's just me. Queen of the 45 SPF with her sadly pale arms, who finds these girls not so good, because they always have tons of guys. But it's not so much the look I dislike, it's more the completely hiding everything that you are that I dislike. Unless, of course, you are on the lam or are a Bearded Lady, then feel free to hide everything you are.

The Barefoot People – I think that there's some kind of R.S.O. on campus for people who hate shoes. There are rather large quantities of folks who strut all over campus barefoot with shoes in hand. I've got a solution for that pesky glass-in-the-foot problem that the barefoot people must have... they're called flip-flops (or as my mom prefers to call them, thongs). It's the next best thing to being barefoot, and you don't have to worry about updating your tetanus shot. Just a side-note on the whole foot-wear thing... if you are part of this no-shoe crew and you decide to wear shoes one day to class, do us all a favor and leave them on for the duration of the lecture. Last semester this guy came into class, sat down at his desk, and proceeded to pull off his sneakers, yank off his socks and carefully lay them across his backpack to dry. It was smelly. It was disturbing. Please don't do it again.

Pajama Mamas – These are the girls who go to class in their pajama pants and a sweatshirt. I've done it myself before – it's wicked comfortable, and you're golden when you get back home for an afternoon of chilling. However, what is up with the girls spending a half-hour doing their hair and make-up, while dressed in their pajamas? What are you trying to pull? We all know that you didn't roll out of bed with that steam-straightened hair and lovely blue eye shadow! Either embrace the I-just-rolled-of-bed look and take a day off from the morning cosmetics routine, or take the extra three minutes and put some clothes on.

Hmbos – Don't think I'm only going to pick on the girls! Guys have a lot less room for error in their wardrobes. You wear pants, a shirt, shoes and maybe a hat. Guys don't go around wearing one-shouldered tanks or platform sandals. But there is definitely room for error, and I see it mainly in the guys that work out. Most guys wear a T-shirt and shorts. But what's up with the guys that wear the Daisy Dukes when they go running? I don't want to jog behind that booty! It's just wrong! Or the guys that wear the really tight pants to the gym. Please, refer to the last sentence of deep-seeded hatred number two for my fashion tip on that one.

Actually, you know what? That's about all I hate about fashion at UMass, but let me throw into the mix, a wide variety of other hideous fashion items that irk me. A major one being the skort. It's neither skirt nor short, much like a spork is neither spoon nor fork. One would think, hey, it's the best of both worlds. But take that spork for example – it doesn't make a good spoon for soup, because everything falls through the tines, and it doesn't make a good fork, because it's rounded. So, the skort – no good. It's a skirt in the front, and shorts in the back. I think it makes people's butts look large. What I want to know is why didn't the skort creator just put the shorts completely inside the skirt? Then it would have all the looks of a skirt, and all the comfort of shorts. Hmmmm.... Maybe I should market that.

The shrug sweater. Thank goodness this has basically left the fashion atmosphere, except for a few die-hard fans who are still holding on. The shrug sweater, for all you who are baffled, is a cardigan with just arms. Yes, that's right, an arm sweater. It was made popular a few years back by such disappearing singers as Fiona Apple and Erika Badu. Is there a connection that they loved the shrug sweater and we haven't heard much about them of late? I think so. But what I'd like to leave you with on this subject is, that if it is cold enough that you need to wear the shrug sweater, then A) Wear an actual shirt instead of a tank top or B) Keep your whole body warm and wear a full fledged sweater or cardigan.

Speedos. I know that this makes everyone's hate it list every year, but I have to include it in mine as well. Speedo racing suits on guys – there's a time and a place for it, namely swim meets, the Olympics and on Shawn White who wore a strategic swim suit when he flashed everyone in the Theatre Guild's "Hair." Other than that, put some shorts on buddy!

All my rantings are keeping me from getting the list up to the ten things I hate most, so I'm going to have to put an end to the list with just seven things. No Hootchies. Hmbos. Pajama girls, skorts or Fiona Apples were harmed in the writing of this column. I wish I could say the same for the Bare Foot people, but I saw them lining up at Health Services for some pebble removals in the minor surgery wing.

GLBT filmfest in Boston

By Sarah N. Kunz
Harvard Crimson (Harvard U.)

(U-WIRE) CAMBRIDGE, Mass. – It seems as if every time you turn around in the film industry, you see yet another romantic comedy. From the cheesy to the touching, they are everywhere. You know the typical story: boy meets girl, boy and girl fall in love, boy and girl encounter obstacle, boy and girl eventually end up together and live happily ever after.

However, replace the girl with a boy and you will have a tough time finding even a handful of blockbuster movies that apply. Recently, Before Night Falls made a splash as the story of gay Cuban writer Reinaldo Arenas. For those thirsting for more such movies, the Boston Gay & Lesbian Film/Video Festival is running from May 2-20 and promises to bring a variety of films and videos that will delight a wide range of audience members.

One of the feature films of the festival is All Over the Guy, which makes its world premiere at the Men's Opening Night Screening on Tuesday, May 3. Directed by Julie Davis and produced by Don Roos (who also wrote and produced The Opposite of Sex), All Over the Guy is a romantic comedy about two men who have been set up and do everything in their power not to fall in love.

Richard Ruccolo ("Two Guys and a Girl") plays Tom, a special ed. teacher who is a recovering alcoholic and dislikes any threat of commitment. While Tom grew up making martinis for his alcoholic parents, his love interest, Eli, played by the film's author, Dan Bucatinsky (The Opposite of Sex, Bounce), has to deal with a set of overemotional, intrusive parents who made him play with dolls as a child.

The two are set up by mutual friends Brett and Jackie who fall in love while Eli and Tom are busy resisting any attraction to each other. The problem in the central couple's relationship arises mainly from Tom's desire to take things slow, or as everyone else in the movie sees it, an intense fear of commitment. His one-night-stand personality directly clashes with Eli's more sensitive, long-term view of life.

In seemingly endless cycles of happy moments, feisty arguments, storming out of houses and hesitant reconciliations, the story of these two men stagnates towards the middle and early end of the movie. During these parts the movie loses a little bit of its hold on the audience, although a few good one-liners and running jokes keep some of the momentum.

As Tom articulates at one point, the only men he can rely on are "Ben, Jerry and Jose Cuervo" while he is at Jackie's place watching "Lifetime-television for women and gay men." Further oddities that weave in and out of the movie include Eli's passion for Planet of the Apes action figures, his persistent nagging whenever anyone uses a word or phrase in the wrong way, as well as the very way in which the story is actually told: Eli tells his story to the receptionist at the AIDS clinic where he is being tested for HIV, and Tom tells his story to a fellow recovering alcoholic at an AA meeting.

All Over the Guy, which also features Christina Ricci, Lisa Kudrow and Doris Roberts, is sweet, funny and romantic, even if it drags at times. It's running themes apply to relationships of all kinds: the awkward blind date experience, unrequited love, mixed signals of all sorts, the joy of reconciliation between two quarrelling partners.

For those people looking for a slightly different film experience, History Lessons by Barbara Hammer will certainly fit the bill. Far from being a mushy love story, History Lessons is instead a documentary, of sorts. Barbara Hammer (Tender Fictions, Nitrate Kisses), a pioneer in the lesbian film industry who is widely acclaimed for her over 70 films and videos, delves deeply into the history of lesbianism, providing a somewhat irreverent, comical and often very intense look at the portrayal of lesbianism from the first days of cinema. Beware these history lessons are not for the faint at heart. The film contains such strong and explicit sexual content that it borders on pornography, which can be potentially offensive to all audiences.

Set within the framework of a person selecting films from an archive, History Lessons has very little dialogue but makes up for this fact with attention-grabbing visual effects. Hammer uses her artistic license generously as she dubs in lesbian-rights messages over women's voices in old films of a roundtable discussion. This effect, which Hammer uses throughout the film, provides a bit of needed levity. Her presentation of antiquated photographs, transposition of negatives and reverse negative images, and carnival-esque background music creates an interesting mixture of the serious and the playful, the historical and the present.

Many of the visual images that are utilized in History Lessons are actual magazines, books and movies from the past, almost all of which make a negative statement about lesbians. Though it seems odd that such derogatory images should be used in a film that is a celebration of being a lesbian, the juxtaposition of these divergent images is a stark, but very effective, contrast. In doing so, Hammer challenges the "traditional" notions of lesbians as being "butch" and "she-males." Overall, History Lessons is a compelling, sometimes offensive, but always unpredictable journey into the roots of lesbianism back as far as the 19th century.

Also featured at the film festival will be the Lesbian Short Film Program (May 4), a compilation of short films touching on a wide variety of subjects and lengths. Above the Dust Level, for example, is a 12-minute Australian film by Carla Drago about stolen men's underwear, cross-dressing ex-lovers, AIDS and one woman's obsession with allergies and dust. Girl Under the Table, a three-minute film by Dominique Zeltzmann, is about a young girl who recalls, "when I was six, I fell in love with my brother's girlfriend. She was 26." In a short period of time, we follow the girl to adulthood with a new semi-stalking personality. Not in the short film program, but featured before the film Boy Named Sue, is the 13-minute film XXXY by Porter Gale and Laleh Soomekh.

This emotionally gripping short film centers on two people who were born intersex – Kristi, a bike messenger, and Howard, a clinical psychologist. Their stories share the common pain of being raised after having undergone corrective genital surgery as children. Fighting against a world in which doctors make arbitrary choices about children's sex and gender, independent of their parents, Kristi and Howard relate the horrors of adolescence and adulthood when one is "not wholly male or female." Kristi, who was born XY (male) but was raised as a girl, sums up the confusion and pain of hermaphrodite individuals when she says, "I'm not a girl. Stop treating me like I am!" Other short films deal with coming out to one's family, the joy of lesbian cooking (Baking with Butch), and what happens when a gay couple and a lesbian couple live next door to each other.

There will be something for everyone at this year's Boston Gay & Lesbian Film/Video Festival, from self-proclaimed dyke dramas to documentaries to the ubiquitous romantic comedy. Whether films under five minutes are your fancy, or you enjoy full-length movies with developed plots, you will be able to find what you are looking for.

Syracuse

Just under a minute later, Syracuse sophomore Matt Bontaites was faced with an easy chance for the equalizer but was denied by UMass' netminder Chris Campolettano. Open in front with room to maneuver, Bontaites approached the goal with and faked attempt to the right before releasing the ball toward the lower left portion of the cage. Campolettano, quick to his reflexes, kicked the ball away for one of his 19 saves.

Junior Tom Fallon picked up that groundball and led the ensuing drive down the field. The "A.O.D. (Angel of Death)," – as he's known in the UMass lacrosse community – didn't give the ball up as he passed midfield. Instead, he took a few more strides and fired the sphere into the top right corner of the net for his first-career goal and the 8-8 tie.

"I was bringing the ball up the field in transition and there was a guy that was trying to cover me," Fallon said. "But he was one of their short sticks and I saw that he was kind of out of position so I made a move to run by him, threw out a one hand check and ran right through him."

"[That goal] just got our whole team fired up by getting us back in the game," Morely said. "It boosted our offense because we got a goal out of our defenseman and got the whole crowd into it but it also pumped up our defense because you don't see that too much – a long pole scoring on Syracuse."

But one minute later, Garber Field was silenced when Syracuse freshman Mike Powell (two goals, three assists) found senior Jason Ianuszkiewicz on a cut to the middle for the game-winner. Mulligan and the Orangemen defense held for the remaining 11:16.

The last good Maroon and White chance came with under one minute left in the contest when Kunkel, sophomore Chris Fiore, and senior Chris Gabrielli had consecutive attempts to freeze Mulligan – but failed. For the first time this season, UMass was held to a single-digit output.

"We were just pretty much putting a rush on them and just trying to get any shot we could and hopefully score a goal and tie it up," Kunkel said after playing his final game at Garber Field. "We had good chances; we just couldn't capitalize on them."

The second half began with two quick Syracuse tallies. Junior Liam Banks netted the first, taking advantage of a UMass double-team and then found Powell one minute later at the 13:22 mark to put Syracuse up, 6-4. Kunkel and Morely, who both netted hat tricks on the afternoon, answered for UMass with two consecutive goals, but the Orangemen fired back with another pair scores right before the buzzer to go up 8-6 at the start of the final stanza.

"I thought it was a well, hard fought game and a great game for the spectators to watch," Syracuse coach John Desko said. "There aren't too many lacrosse games today that are played where two teams just kind of go after one another and aren't afraid to push the ball. It was a fun game to watch and a fun game to play.

"I thought the way [UMass] played today as a team – both offensively and defensively with their goalie – was [like the play of] a playoff caliber team."

The teams traded goals for the first 15 minutes, with Syracuse goals beginning and ending the stretch, leading to a 4-3 Orangemen early advantage. But Campolettano and Mulligan – the top two high school goalies in New York five years ago – settled down thereafter and traded masterful saves for the rest of the game. Junior Don Little's perimeter blast with 36 seconds left in the half to tie the game at 4-4 was the only goal of the second quarter.

A fairly even game throughout, the only major statistical difference came within the face-off circle. Syracuse took 13 of 20 draws in the game, behind the work of the nation's best face-off man, senior Chris Cercy.

"We're really spoiled with Chris [Cercy]. Once again, he won his fair share of the face-offs and those are huge possessions," Desko said. "We've been able to keep pressure on other teams by scoring a goal, winning the face-off, and coming back up in an offensive situation. Chris has been coming up big for us all year and we expect that from him now."

game."

The perseverance paid off big time, as the UMass keeper let Syracuse know that maybe they recruited the wrong Long Islander.

But as shocked as Syracuse may have been to see a Maroon and White wall wearing No. 11 and begging them to 'bring it on,' it came as no surprise to his teammates and coaches.

"We knew he was going to play well this weekend," Cannella said. "He wanted to prove it to his teammates, his coaches and to himself."

Both goalies made crucial saves when their team's needed it most, as the battle between keepers became a slugfest in the ring of Richard F. Garber Field.

Mulligan put his stamp on the game in the second quarter, which UMass won 1-0. The senior keeper managed to keep the game tied with five saves on 15 shots in the second frame.

Campolettano waited until the crucial fourth quarter to reach his peak. Trailing 8-6 and entering the final frame UMass was in desperate need of a spark. They received that shot in the arm from their stalwart in net.

The senior not only made an impact with his play in the cage (five saves in the fourth), but with his aggressive style. Early in the final frame after a Marc Morley goal brought the Minutemen within one, 'Cuse's leading scorer, Michael Powell, wrapped around the net in a bid to put the game away.

The freshman faked high then shot low, but Campolettano was quicker than the ball as he dropped to kick out the shot. The save ignited a full field rush by long pole defenseman Tom Fallon who knotted the game up at eight after rumbling 60 yards downfield.

Unfortunately for the home squad, the Orange managed another goal and Mulligan stood fast in the closing moments to secure the win.

which the Minutewomen ended up coming in narrowly short, with a second-place 7:08.23 to GW's 7:02.60.

Other teams, which gained points in the regatta, were the Novice 8-B (second place), the Lightweight 8 (third), Varsity 4 (third) and the Novice 8-A (fourth).

This was the sixth year running in which the Maroon and White have taken home the A-10 championship (and accompanying custom watches), the largest current conference-winning streak in UMass sports. The 2001 event also marked the second year in a row that the Quad and 2nd Varsity 8 have become the A-10 champions.

In other awards presented at the championships, George Washington won the Novice 8-A and Novice 8-B, Rhode Island the Novice 4, St. Joseph's the Lightweight 8, and Fordham the Varsity 4. George Washington's Steve Peterson took home the Coach of the Year award for the second consecutive year.

The Minutewomen will be rowing against the Orangemen this weekend in Syracuse, N.Y. and wrapping up their regular season at the Dad Vail regatta in Philadelphia on May 11.

Women's crew races to victory

By Rob Schulze
Collegian Staff

COLLINGSWOOD, N.J. – It is a dream that most rowers are awakened from at 5:30 a.m. six times a week – an Atlantic 10 championship – a shot at a national title.

For the Massachusetts women's crew team, this dream became a reality on Saturday afternoon with an 12-point triumph over rival George Washington in the Verizon Atlantic 10 Women's Rowing Championship, its sixth straight A-10 crown.

"We're kicking ass!" said UMass senior varsity rower Mary Neubecker three-quarters of the way through the day, and as the final boat crossed the finish line, her words rung true.

It was a beautiful but cold and windswept sunny day on the Cooper River, the perfect setting for the Minutewomen to flex their oars at some of the conference's finest. Of eight final races, the Maroon and White won three and took home two of both second and third place finishes. Each finish guaranteed a certain amount of points – the team finished with 47 to secure a 12-point win.

The most glaring example of UMass's dominance was in the Varsity Quad, as in both the qualifying heat and the final, the Minutewomen coasted to what appeared to be effortless victories far ahead of their nearest competition. Composed of Sarah Pollmann, Julie Vander Ploeg, Heather Walker and Anna Talucci, the Quad finished with a truly alarming time of 7:48.90, 16.87 seconds ahead of 2nd place St. Joseph's.

The Varsity Lightweight 4 composed of Erin Cooke, Cleo Buster, Amy Folta and Melissa Gorey (coxswained by Reese Barton) captured first in its division with a score of 8:32.90 in a one-on-one duel against Duquesne, who were caught in the wake with a score of 9:15.25.

The Minutewomen's other winning finish was in the 2nd Varsity 8 division. Colleen Banfield, Erika Earl, Laura Kramer, Kate Tynan, Kelly Tiarks, Katie O'Brien, Melanie Laur and two-medal winner Anna Talucci (coxswained by Megan Mastropolo) took the closest victory of the day over five other schools with a winning time of 7:06.00.

The Varsity 8 boat (Danielle Smith, Sarah Pollmann, Mary Neubecker, Heather Walker, Claire O'Donnell, Julie Vander Ploeg, Katla Prokopenko and Mila Gorzkowskl [coxswalned by Sara Pragulski]) may have raced in a six-team field, but it ended up being a straight duel with the Colonials in

Orange squeeze out win

'Cuse too much for Minutemen

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

In 14 days, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has fallen from atop the Division I lacrosse world to "on the bubble."

Because for the second the straight week, the Minutemen dropped a one-goal decision – this time to defending national champion Syracuse, 9-8, before 4,723 Saturday at Richard F. Garber Field.

Winners of 10 straight to start the season, UMass (10-2, 4-1 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference) must now win its final two games (Rutgers and Brown) of the regular season in order to have any shot at an NCAA tournament at-large bid. Georgetown's 15-7 victory over Rutgers on Saturday secured the conference's automatic qualifier to the Hoyas.

"I'm not sure [what happens now]," coach Greg Cannella said. "I'm not on the committee. I don't have to make those decisions. But we have two games that we have to take care of before anyone can talk about that. And we'll try to do it this week. But if we win two this week, I think we have a good shot at it – as good as anybody that's on the bubble."

Down 8-6 heading into the fourth quarter, the Maroon and White orchestrated a quick comeback. With 13:37 left in the stanza, senior Rich Kunkel –

Revolving coaches continue as GW's Penders steps down

By Zachary Leibowitz
The GW Hatchet (George Washington U.)

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON – Tom Penders resigned as George Washington men's basketball coach calling it "time for a sabbatical" from coaching as he addressed a Smith Center room filled with players, students, his family, local media at a press conference. He said the decision has nothing to do with events in the last few weeks.

"I've given all I have to this chosen field," said Penders, who will step down effective June 30. "And I can honestly say I have absolutely no regrets."

The resignation comes amid a turbulent period for the Colonials program. Four players admitted last week to using the long-distance access code of Penders's son, assistant coach Tommy Penders Jr., to make more than $1,400 worth of phone calls.

Another incident involved transfer-forward Attila Cosby, who was charged with nine misdemeanors for sexual abuse, weapons violations and theft Jan. 26. Cosby showed Penders court papers Feb. 8, but Penders failed to inform Athletic Director Jack Kvancz about Cosby's legal situation. Kvancz said that it was "a problem" that Penders did not tell him.

The resignation makes GW the second-straight school Penders has left under scandalous circumstances. The University of Texas bought out the remainder of Penders's contract in April 1998, after questions surfaced about his involvement in releasing grades of former player Luke Axtell to a local radio station. The contract buyout ended a successful 10-year tenure that included seven NCAA appearances and a 1989-90 trip to the Elite Eight.

Reading from a prepared speech at the Smith Center AD room, Tom Penders said he had been contemplating resigning since the season's end.

"I've experienced many restless, sleepless nights," Penders said. "My head was telling me it was time to get away from coaching for awhile, but my heart was telling me I couldn't let Jack Kvancz and the many wonderful people at GW down."

Kvancz was teary-eyed when he walked to the podium following Penders's remarks. Kvancz said Penders's 33 years of coaching appeared to be taking its toll.

"It was after the Temple game here, when we missed that last foul shot that could have won the game for us, that I really noticed a difference (in Penders)," Kvancz said. "It dawned on me that he had been doing this for over 30 years. And in the weeks after the Atlantic 10 tournament, I sensed that he was tired."

Kvancz looked over to long-time friend Penders, who sat beside Vice President for Student Activities and Support Services Robert Chernak, and praised the coach.

"As I look at him, I say there's a man who exudes class and he can coach the game of basketball," Kvancz said.

Penders said he came to the decision about two weeks ago and said it took a little while to "work some things out." Penders, who has compiled 527 wins in his career, which includes stints at the University of Texas, Tufts, Columbia, Fordham and Rhode Island universities, said there is a possibility that he would return to coaching.

"I may be back doing this again, I'm crazy enough," he said.

Kvancz confirmed Penders's notion, saying he "expects after a brief hiatus that he might be back."

Although the status of Penders's four assistant coaches was not discussed at the press conference, Penders Jr. cleaned out his office and assistant coach Jimmy McGovern said he is looking for work. The assistant coaches all met with Kvancz Saturday morning inside the Smith Center. They will remain employed at GW pending appointment of a new coach, Kvancz said.

Penders said GW will honor Penders's contract, which has three years left on it. He called the agreement with GW "extremely kind," but declined to give details. Kvancz said they have "worked out an understanding." The contract is believed to be somewhere in the $450,000-a-year range, according to a 1998 Dallas Morning News article.

When asked why the University honored Penders's contract, Kvancz said, "It was the class thing to do."

Penders leaves GW with a 49-42 record, including one NCAA tournament appearance. He mentioned the team's last-second victory over Xavier in his first season that clinched the Atlantic 10 West Division as his favorite moment as GW coach. But since the 1998-99 season, the Colonials have spiraled downward, finishing 15-15 in 1999-00 and 14-18 this season – the team's first losing season in 11 years.

"It's time to recharge the batteries, to reflect, refocus, to reevaluate and rejuvenate," Penders said. "I'm in the position to step back and smell the roses, really for the first time in my life as a professional coach."

Fights and recent player scandals plagued the team in recent years. This season in particular was difficult for Penders's team. The Colonials were involved in an off-court melee with the University of Tennessee in Hawaii in December and engaged a scuffle with Duquesne during a game in February.

Campolettano, Mulligan shine bright in spotlight

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Senior goalie Chris Campolettano made a season-high 19 saves in UMass's loss to the Orangemen.

The accepted stereotype of goaltenders around the sports world is that the desire to be a goalie comes hand in hand with the need for psychiatric assistance.

In fact, it is likely lacrosse goalies that keep sports shrinks in business with their nightmarish accounts of solid rubber spheres traveling towards them at speeds upwards of about 120 mph.

And to think that the limit of legal leg padding is an extra thick pair of UMass Athletics sweat pants, it's no wonder many of these talented backstops trade in their uniforms and teammates for straight jackets and big guys in white coats.

You don't have to notify Massachusetts keeper Chris Campolettano of the loneliness of his position. The senior was roped into the crease at an early age, by his father no less, and has developed into one of the nation's best.

The senior keeper faced an opponent on Saturday that he is very familiar with: that opponent was Syracuse goaltender Rob Mulligan. Campolettano and Mulligan have been aware of each other's talent since high school when they were the top-two recruited goalies on the hot bed of Long Island, N.Y.

After graduating, both were recruited by the same upper echelon lacrosse schools such as Duke and Cornell. But when the recruiting dust settled, Mulligan decided to don Orange and Blue, while Campy set up shop in Amherst.

Now as both are preparing to graduate and move on to professional careers, the pair of Long Islanders are recognized as two of the best goalies in the country, and on Saturday they did not disappoint.

It was no easier to find a spot on the hill (attendance exceeded 4,700) than the back of the net as two top net minders went toe to toe.

Both goalies came into the game with top-20 rankings in both save percentage and goals against average, and each player did much to bolster their personal statistics and team performance. Mulligan was steady as always and spectacular when he had to be stopping 11 shots on the day.

"He is a pretty good goalie and he played very well against us," Rich Kunkel said.

Campolettano on the other hand was unconscious for 60 minutes making 19 saves including numerous miracle stops from point blank range.

"[Campolettano] was pulling saves out of nowhere," Mulligan said. "He really was on fire the whole game."

Unfortunately for Campy and the Minutemen his efforts fell by the wayside in a heartbreaking, 9-8, loss to No. 2 Syracuse. The defeat by no means diminishes the outstanding performance of the Maroon and White keeper, a performance that was eerily reminiscent to the play of former Minuteman and arguably the greatest goalie of all time, Sal LoCascio.

Campolettano literally stood on his head to all but shut down one of the most potent offenses in the nation, which is no small feat coming off his struggles against Georgetown.

A week earlier, the senior was not on his game for a big conference showdown against the visiting Hoyas. Campy made only eight saves on the afternoon as G-town escaped with a 13-12 victory.

With the Orangemen in his sights, Campolettano refused to waive the white flag, as personal pride coupled with a tenacious work ethic led to possibly his best game in a Maroon and White uniform.

"Campy is a proud guy," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Last week he felt he didn't play well and this week he worked his butt off."

"You kind of take it as a personal challenge as it came down the stretch," Mulligan said. "Campy was playing huge the whole

Students are educated on violence issues through a display of t-shirts during yesterday's 5-College Clothesline Project.

Clothesline Project sparks memorial flame

By Emily Vacanti
Collegian Staff

Yesterday marked the third annual 5-College Clothesline Project. Started nationally in 1990, the 5-College area brought the Clothesline Project to the Student Union lawn to increase awareness of sexual violence.

There were about 185 t-shirts displayed on clotheslines, representing the pain of survivors of rape, incest, and assault. They came in six categories of colors: white for those who have died due to sexual violence; red, pink, or orange for those who have been sexually assaulted or raped; yellow, beige, tan, or brown for those who have been assaulted or battered; blue or green for those who have survived incest and/or child abuse; purple or lavender for those who have been assaulted due to their sexual orientation; and black for any unspecified type of abuse.

University Health Services (UHS) provided the clothing to participants, who then, using fabric paint, markers, and other materials, designed the shirts on behalf of themselves, friends, or relatives who had been victims of sexual violence.

The shirts all had messages that stood out in some way through their mixture of colors, their words, the form of writing, the statistics and the harsh language on some. One shirt stated a little-known statistic, "40-60% of all calls made to the police are from women being abused in their home." Other statistics were displayed, such as the fact that 20% of college-aged women will become victims of sexual assault during their college career, and that women annually report about 500,000 sexual assaults.

The 5-College project was inspired by the need to increase awareness and break the silence of both men and women. It was also meant to help survivors and their friends and families to heal emotionally, by giving them a way to express themselves and shed their pain.

A handout available at the event stated: "The Clothesline Project is the first international movement of its kind, providing a unique medium for healing and social change in the war against sexual violence." Though it is international, the 5-College Clothesline Project differs from the National Project because the National Project only welcomes t-shirts and blouses for female survivors, whereas the Five College Clothesline welcomes them for both males and females.

The project coordinators were Amanda Collings, a Community Health and Patient Advisor for UHS, and Alyson Fox, a UHS employee and graduate student in Community Health Studies. Fox hopes that the majority of passersby took notice of the different t-shirts and blouses and had some sort of reaction. "The shirts speak for themselves," she stated.

She also hoped for a reaction from the part of the community that inspired the event; silent victims who can be persuaded to speak out. Those people who missed this event and the opportunity to participate may go to the 5-College Clothesline Project table in the Campus Center, or UHS, and make t-shirts representing their pain to be displayed at next year's event.

For this annual event, there were about 12 volunteers, and several hundred students stopped by to observe and read the t-shirts. Joanna Morse, a graduate student in History, stated, "It's really powerful. It must be empowering [to make a t-shirt] and yet it must be so painful."

Those who want to participate in next year's event can contact UHS at 577-5000, or The Everywoman's Center at 545-0883.

Latin Gala Night bridges gaps

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

Yoshi Kogo's Latin Gala Night, a benefit for the International Language Institute's (II.I) Scholarship Fund, provided over 150 locals with live Latin band music and dancing on Friday, April 27th from 8pm to 1am at the Inn at Northampton's Grand Ballroom.

"Yoshi Productions facilitates cross-cultural events to help bridge differences and grow human awareness," read a description of Kogo's company. "Our role is to create a warm, open kitchen environment, sharing food, music and atmosphere to celebrate and honor many cultures."

In addition to generating cross-cultural awareness, Latin Gala Night assisted II.I, a non-profit language school helping students to acquire an inclusive understanding of grammar, vocabulary, and pronunciation in their language of study.

The gala's proceeds were added to II.I's Scholarship Fund, which was set up to give accesses to classes to those who cannot afford them. Furthermore, the event enabled II.I's staff to provide the community with detailed information as to what programs II.I offers and how some people may be able to help them.

For example, a display board was set up at the entrance of the ballroom and provided brochures about and applications for the English for Speakers of Other Languages (ESOL) program, in which a one-on-one tutor assists an individual with his or her English language skills.

The II.I Director of Communications, Karine Roesch, pointed out that people could read information about ESOL, and perhaps doing so would spark their interests in becoming a tutor for the program.

"I think what's most interesting is people can study with us for four weeks and get a certificate in teaching ESOL," she noted, adding that the classes will run in June, August, and October.

Kogo's long-term plan is to produce several celebrations along the lines of Gala Latin Night that will incorporate different cultural themes, ranging from Afro-Caribbean to Mardi Gras. Each of these productions will continue to benefit the II.I Scholarship Fund.

"This was a preliminary event," she said, hoping that people who attended the party will encourage others to attend future ones now that they know what to expect.

For those who arrived early on in the evening, they entered the ballroom to hear soft, recorded Latin sounds, sit at the round tables each intimately lit by one long stem candle and two shorter ones, and chat as they waited for the food to come out and the dance lessons to begin.

"This was one way to connect [with others]. We usually don't have places to go and feel free to interact," remarked Aidza Y. McKenzie. "We are from different parts of the island [Puerto Rico], and as we started talking, we all connected."

By quarter to nine, the buffet style ethnic foods were set out for all to enjoy. Nachos Con Quesa, taco chips with trimmings such as chili, melted cheese, beans and sour cream, Chorizo Espanol, a slightly spicy sausage served on a toothpick with a green olive, Jamon Con Pina, a tender cube of ham served on a toothpick with a chunk of pineapple, and Maracas Criollas, bone chicken in a tangy sweet and sour glaze, were the highlights of the evening.

Bread and Circus Whole Foods Market and Light Lit Foods sponsored both the food and decorations that laced the tables, such as exotic fruits, red peppers and beans, and carrots and green bell peppers shaped to form petit palm trees.

McKenzie's only concern was at the food selection. "We thought that there would be more Spanish dishes, but you can see more Anglos here than Latinos, so that's good that the cultures are coming together," she said.

Soon the evening's host, Luis Melendez, producer of the radio program ¡Ternuila! on WFCR 88.5fm, introduced Teresa Castano, who invited

Engineering showcase to kick off

The University of Massachusetts department of Electrical and Computer Engineering will host a design day to showcase senior projects.

Nine teams of electrical and computer engineering students will be participating in this event.

A wide array of projects will be displayed and demonstrated, including a hearing-impairment simulator, a voice recognition system, a wireless heart rate monitor, and a radio-control system for the Lego Mindstorms Robotics Invention System. Students will be on hand to display and explain their projects.

The engineering students worked in teams of three on their projects. The students began working on their projects last September. The students did not have to complete their projects entirely on their own, each team was allowed to seek guidance from a faculty member.

The Electrical and Computer Engineering Design Day will take place today, May 1, from 10 am until noon. It will take place in the Gunness Student Center in Marcus Hall. All are welcome to attend this event.

State Representative Ellen Story visited UMass courtesy of the University Democrats last Thursday night.

Around the world in 30 days

During the month of April, the Prince/Crampton graduate complex held its annual multicultural program "Around the World in 30 Days." First organized in 1997, this program grew in the subsequent years into a major event, designed to address the cultural diversity of and enhance cultural awareness among the residents of Prince/Crampton. Because of its success, "Around the World in 30 Days" extended beyond the graduate complex and became a program directed toward the whole UMass campus and local community.

"Around the World in 30 Days" is envisaged as a thirty-day journey across the different continents. People from countries all over the world present and share something about their culture or country. Every Thursday in April, one or two continents were featured and presentations and performances were held.

With as many as 10 to 15 presenters, performers and participants per night, the program provided a unique way to get acquainted with other cultures and their customs. Residents as well as people who do not live in the complex made presentations, ranging from talking about their culture, to showing arts and crafts, performing traditional music and dances, wearing traditional clothes and preparing a typical dish.

On Saturday, the program was concluded with an International Dinner for which participants cooked a dish from their country and shared it with others. They submitted a list of ingredients to the Prince/Crampton cluster office and the staff shopped for them.

With over 50 presenters for the entire event and with a large number of people attending, it is safe to say that the multicultural program "Around the World in 30 Days" was a huge success this year.

Argentinian relief windfall among globe's top stories

Compiled By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

AMERICAS

Argentina- After three years in an economic slump, the International Monetary Fund has agreed to give the country $40 billion in aid. The IMF promised a crisis package to the ailing country in December, but so far has not paid any of its installments because the country has failed to meet IMF fiscal conditions.

Argentina has been suffering from recession and lack of investor confidence. The Argentine peso is pegged to the dollar, and even though the dollar has remained strong, the collapse of Brazil's currency has brought the economy down. Brazil is Argentina's largest trading partner.

In an attempt to restore confidence, the Argentine president Fernando De la Rua replaced both his economics minister and the head of the central bank. Domingo Cavallo, the new economics minister, has already released a statement in which he said that they would now be conducting their finances in "an absolutely normal way."

The IMF finally sealed the deal with Argentina after officials from the Latin American country met with IMF representatives and explained how they planned to get their economy back on track. They also unveiled plans to try to get their national debt under control since it has been spinning wildly out of control for years now.

The International Monetary and Financial Committee of the IMF expressed their pleasure with the measures that the Argentine government has planned.

Domingo Cavallo has already announced a list of reforms including lowering taxes, improving tax collection, and eventually pegging their currency to the euro. He also promised that Argentina would not default on loan payments.

The IMF also approved a loan for India's wrecked economy; however, they are also working out the details and no money has been paid yet.

Guatemala- A Human Rights group has discovered a mass grave believed to be full of the bones of 64 victims of a 1982 massacre.

The Mutual Support Group is the organization responsible for the discovery of 19 mass graves in a village north of Guatemala City, the capital.

The group believes that the bodies are murder victims of "civil self-defense patrols" that consisted of the army and local villagers. The groups apparently tortured their victims, as well as attacked them with machetes and guns, and some were raped. They were all burned to death.

Bolivia- The Catholic Church has agreed to step in and play mediator between Bolivian cocoa farmers and government cocoa-eradication proponents.

Union workers, farmers and teachers have began to protest against the government for failing to commit to promises made a year ago to end the cocoa-eradication project, raise wages and take steps to reduce poverty.

The Church has agreed to host a conference where national figures of social groups, government representatives and workers can try and settle their grievances. Meanwhile, the people continue to protest and may possibly strike.

ASIA-PACIFIC

Australia- Wild dingoes followed and attacked two boys during a morning walk on Fraser Island, off the coast of Queensland. A nine year-old boy was killed and his seven year-old brother was injured during the attack.

The boys had been walking near a campsite in a tourist area when they were frightened by the dingoes. They were running back to their parents' campsite when the elder boy tripped and fell prey to the wild dogs.

The younger boy had his legs and arms gnawed on by the dingoes but managed to run to his father and sound the alarm. By the time the father got to his older son, he was dead. Both boys were airlifted to a hospital on the mainland.

Queensland officials report that this is only the second attack by dingoes in modern times. Shortly after the boys were taken to hospital, police marksmen shot the dingoes. A forensic scientist is scheduled to conduct examinations on both of the animals.

About 200 dingoes live on the island, although attacks are very rare. Residents on the island warn tourists to stay away from any and all dingoes and stick together within campsites.

Philippines- Representatives from both the government and communist rebels have announced that they have made progress toward peace. The two sides have been meeting in Oslo, Norway and are planning on holding more peace talks in May.

Among the issues settled were those of political prisoners and human rights. The government has agreed to the release of political prisoners and a monitoring committee will be set up to supervise the implementation of a human rights accord that was originally signed in 1998.

The next round of talks will most likely center on the topics of economic and social reforms and land ownership. Globalization will also be discussed.

The National Democratic Front is a group of rebels that has been fighting for a Marxist state of the Philippines for 32 years.

Indonesia- Impeachment hearings against Indonesian president Abdurrahman Wahid could begin within weeks now that he has been censured by parliament over charges of corruption. This is the second time he has been censured.

Wahid was originally censured in February for financial wrongdoings and scandals. He has been linked to the laundering of $4 million from the national food agency and also has been accused of scandals surrounding $2 million and the Sultan of Brunei.

With an overwhelming 365 votes for censure and 42 against, with 52 abstentions, the parliament voted to take action against the already weakening president. Only the small, Christian group, the National Awakening Party, voted in defense of their leader.

The president has one month to respond to the motion. However, analysts believe that he will not last a month and will most likely resign. Some critics are already calling Wahid a lame duck.

The Parliament could force Wahid out of office with one final majority vote if the legislators decide that a special meeting of the highest legislative body is necessary. That would be an automatic move if the legislators disagree with the president's decision regarding his charge.

Though he has few supporters within parliament, out in the streets there are supposedly thousands of people that would fight to keep him in office. 6,000 of his supporters rallied in the rain in his province and threatened bloodshed if he ends up getting thrown out.

Meanwhile, over 9,000 troops are stationed around Jakarta and other provinces to quell any unwanted behavior from supporters or otherwise. The legislators were fearful of violence.

Wahid has appealed to his followers to refrain from violence.

AFRICA

Ethiopia - The three-week standoff between authorities and students at Addis Ababa University continued when police broke into a student meeting on campus. Students were meeting to discuss a return to class when hundreds of police wearing helmets and carrying guns came in.

Police took custody of 3,000 students a week ago, and though most of them were released within the week, students remaining on campus refuse to return to class while authorities hold their peers.

Students claim that the campus has been complete chaos ever since the police raided the school to try and stop a student movement. The government believes that the students are deliberately trying to disrupt education, but the students hold an opposing viewpoint, advocating for student rights.

Some students were so scared that they hid in their dorm rooms, while others marched on the streets. Some even went to neighboring churches for safety during the riots that occurred a week ago. Police apparently divided the students up by department and year, searching for the movement's ringleader.

15 students are still being detained, however, the supposed ringleader has yet to be found.

Senegal- The votes are not in yet, but supporters of president Abdoulaye Wade are beginning to celebrate his party's victory in parliament. 100 out of 120 seats are set to be taken by the Democratic Party, meaning that the Socialist party, that was in power for over 40 years, is finally defeated.

Mr. Wade won the presidential election last year and has continued to rise in popularity in the country.

Texan switching saddles

By Celina Moreno
Daily Texan

(U-WIRE) - After appointing head positions of five campus media outlets, the Texas Student Publications Board of Operating Trustees voted Friday to table indefinitely a vote on a proposal that would change the current Daily Texan editor-selection process from election to appointment.

The proposal, submitted by TSP Director Kathy Lawrence after a request from several Texan staff members in November, calls for a board-appointed editor at the University of Texas.

The board, with a "majority-rules" decision-making process, is comprised of six elected student members and five professionals and faculty members appointed by University of Texas-Austin President Larry Faulkner.

Texan Editor Cecily Sailer, who supports an appointed-editor system, said she was not surprised with the board's decision to table a vote on the controversial proposal.

"It is so clear to us that you don't want to deal with this issue," Sailer said to the board, expressing her disapproval of a delay. "So instead of pushing it on to the next staff and having them endure this, vote it down."

Sailer added that student leaders on the board had Interest In "killing" the proposal, making her suggestion to vote against the decision an act of expressing grievances with the board.

TSP Board President Natasha Solce, who submitted a proposal requiring the board to vote on the change at its September 2001 meeting, called Sailer's allegation "preposterous."

"I think it's very ironic that she would think that my proposal would be a way to avoid dealing with the issue because it's the only thing that exists that does," said Solce, a Plan II and biochemistry senior. "If the board would have voted for my timeline, we would have ended the meeting with an official way to conduct the process, a mechanism on how to obtain student input and an official date on when a vote would occur. At the end of the meeting, the board still has made no progress on this issue."

Solce stepped down from her position at the meeting because she said she felt uncomfortable submitting the proposal and serving as president simultaneously. She added that though she is grateful for the efforts of the Texan to compile feedback, it was a "source of a conflict of interest" and that it would need to be gathered by an unbiased party.

The Texan ran the proposal for an appointed editor in its April 20 edition "to keep students informed about any possible changes," Sailer said, adding that the newspaper printed firing lines and asked for student response through an e-mail account.

The Texan also ran an alternative proposal the same day, submitted by board member-elect Michael Hoffman, that called for an elected opinion page editor and a board-appointed editor. Though the proposal was not decided upon during the five-hour meeting, Hoffman said he hopes to see other alternatives, including his own, reviewed in the future.

But Craig Daniels, a student TSP board member, said he saw no point in prolonging a vote on the proposal submitted by Lawrence and said he felt "uncomfortable" with outgoing board members making and passing motions in which they would have no role in executing.

"Each side has spoken its voice, and there are no new arguments," Daniels said.

Lawrence said while student commentary is important, she believes the avenues for input have already been allowed.

everyone to encircle the dance floor for a twenty-minute lesson on the popular Puerto Rican dance, the Merengue.

Castano also hosts Noches Latinas, a weekly Friday night dance party at Terena's Latin & International Dance Club in Williamsburg where she and her staff provide lessons in dances such as the Salsa, Merengue, and Bachata.

She began her lesson at Gala Latin Night by giving a few general instructions. "[The Merengue is] walking with rhythm," Castano announced to the eager crowd, as she demonstrated some of the steps.

As smiles shown brightly on the sea of faces on the twirling couples mimicking her moves, she declared, "You're too good, so we're going to have to keep moving," adding finer touches to the basic steps, such as more challenging spins.

The crowd responded well to the lesson, for as Cynthia Cissé Hill said, "It was perfect. The dance lesson gave me the basic [knowledge] of what I needed to know to enjoying myself and have fun."

Mamuela Littlefield from the University of Massachusetts' Bilingual Collegiate Program agreed whole-heartedly, "The teaching of the dance was keen," especially, she said, since she did not know much about the Merengue before hand.

By 9:30, the lights were dimmed and the much-anticipated performance by Ray Gonzalez and his 11-piece band, Orquesta Versatil, began.

Slowly more and more couples made their way out to the dance floor, the crowd consisting of both newcomers to the world of Latin dance who showed off their fresh knowledge of the Merengue and experts of the dance who put a little more pizzazz in their moves.

Junior animal science major Christina Brissette remarked that her reason for attending the Gala Latin Night was for precisely this reason. "We know how to Latin dance, so we look for things like this," she said, adding that her excitement grew "especially because it's a live dance band."

After playing their Latin sounds for approximately an hour, Orquesta Versatil took a break, and Deborah Coben led four professional dance couples from Paradise Dance Studio in Northampton in a energetic show of various Latin dances.

Much of the audience's reaction was positive to these performances, yet some were slightly disappointment at the music not being truly authentic.

"I prefer a certain type of music, but they're mixing it and making it enjoyable to everyone," said Jorge Gouzalez, "I think they put together a great activity, though."

All in attendance could also purchase raffle tickets with prizes ranging from a palm plant to a carving set to a spice rack to a summer Spanish class at ILI and much more. These proceeds too would go to the ILI Scholarship Fund.

"This [Gala Latin Night] is a good cause for the scholarship," said Littlefield mentioning that the UMass Bilingual Collegiate Program receives some help from ILI and their resources. "so this is a way to give back to them, so they can give back to the university and the college work."

The sobering cost of a campus prank

After the fall of Thomas Degnan, a sophomore majoring in Natural Resource Conservation, we can only hope that the feud that apparently fueled his desire to climb atop the Butterfield roof will stop. The Marshfield native remains in critical condition after his 35-foot fall off the top of the Upper Central dormitory.

Degnan is 20 years old. He is in only his second year of school, yet he now lies in critical condition in Baystate Medical Center, fighting for his life after a stupid prank.

All to get a flag.

There is a point at which the friendly desire to smite another dorm goes way too far. Water wars, snowball fights and late-night pranks are one thing, but serious injuries to a student who was foolishly on the roof of a dorm is something else all together.

The serious injuries that Degnan is now attempting to recover from are proof of that.

The game to grab the Butterfield pirate flag is not only silly and unnecessary, it's also extremely dangerous and there is no reason why such a stupid fight must continue. If for no other reason than the flag has been flying for years atop of Butterfield, the number of people who might have injured themselves must be tremendous.

All to get a flag.

If we take nothing away from this, let us take away an end to such a ridiculous feud. No more students on top of dormitory roofs for any reason, but especially at night attempting to grab a pirate flag, a flag that might represent a building but is now equated with a horrible accident.

According to our front page article yesterday, Ben Sandrof told the Daily Hampshire Gazette that the flag isn't a symbol of "rape, pillage and piracy" but instead one of the cooperative spirit of the dormitory and the community. No longer; the flag is now equated with a student who is attempting to recover from very serious injuries. What kind of senseless pain must occur before such a silly feud will end?

This before the possible involvement of alcohol or other drugs is even considered, for the presence of either will only make last Friday's accident all the worse. Not only will a student lie in critical condition, he will be stigmatized for getting injured while intoxicated. While he should be mightily criticized for attempting anything so dangerous in the first place and more so while being high, it will be unfortunate if Degnan is written off but the feud continued, blameless.

Let us witness no more defenses of the importance of "community" in terms of the feud.

Let us witness no more prayer vigils for fallen comrades; it shouldn't take injuries to bring students together.

And most importantly, let us witness no more terrifying injuries to innocent student's that make dumb decisions.

Especially if it's only for a flag.

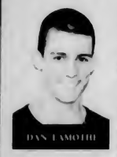
More important than the playoffs?



DAN LAMOTHE

Last Monday, news broke. It barely caused a ripple on the UMass campus, and that surprised me. I, myself, was shocked by the news. Maybe you didn't hear it: Marcus Camby's sister Monica, 21, was raped in her own home, the dream home that Marcus bought the family with some of the money he has earned playing basketball.

That in and of itself is a terrible thing. Not shocking, but terrible. Rapes, as horrifying and disgusting as they are, occur all the time. What made this situation so shocking were the circumstances behind it.

Troy Crooms, 28, cut the phone lines and snuck in through the first floor window of Camby's mother's home in South Windsor, Connecticut. He grabbed a kitchen knife and immediately went after Monica. With Marcus's mother and Mia, another sister, in the house, he violently raped Monica. Mia called from a cell phone and the police arrived at around 3:30 a.m. They entered, but Crooms forced the police out by putting a knife to Monica's neck. A hostage situation developed, and Crooms remained in a standoff for over eight hours.

Marcus, no doubt bleary-eyed from the drive and an early morning phone call from Connecticut, arrived at the driveway of his family at around 8 a.m. to see his house surrounded by authorities. Inside, a man held a knife to his sister's throat. Crooms has been convicted of several crimes before, including sexually based charges and selling narcotics outside of a public school. Knowing all of this did not make things any easier for the Cambys. Crooms's sole demand: I want to talk to Marcus Camby. That makes him sound quite insane, if you ask me.

In the aftermath, Camby has decided to sit out of a couple of playoff games to put his family's life back in order. Grumbling grows louder by the day, as Camby misses practices and, last Sunday, game three of the Knicks-Raptors first round playoff series.

How can anyone complain or second-guess Marcus's decision here? Doesn't anyone realize how traumatizing this must be for the entire family? People question Camby's integrity for deciding to miss as many games as it is necessary to be with his family. How can anyone with a heart do that? I think one would need to question his integrity if he had decided to NOT be with his family in such trying times. Family always will and always has come first, and that is the way it should be.

Marcus Camby, for all practical purposes, is the father figure in the Camby household. He, at 27, is six years older than Monica and is very protective of her. No doubt, he probably even feels some responsibility for what has happened, especially after Crooms started his "I want to talk to Marcus" bit.

> "Basketball is not the first priority in these players' lives – just like any other job, there are things that still come first – like their families, their God, and their own well being."

Camby's comments last Thursday reveal a lot in regards to what is going through his mind: "Don't feel sorry for me, my sister has to go through this for life. I just have to be the backbone of my family." That means being there, every step of the way. With both his mother and other sister as hostages in the situation as well (their mother escaped with the police as they backed out of the building while Crooms held a knife to Monica's neck; Mia snuck out a second floor window later on when police put a ladder against the building), Marcus is the only member of the immediate Camby family that has his head screwed on straight right now. Monica Camby is now going through probably the most difficult time she has ever endured in her life, and Marcus playing the role of big brother/father figure means more than any Knick game every could.

Obviously, Marcus Camby is not on the best of terms with this university anymore. Having a final four appearance negated by his trip to the dark side of sports has that effect on people. UMass forfeiting over $150,000 of revenue in the process also sours many of the staff. I'm sure. Perhaps me writing this article is in fact a complete waste of time, because none of you even follow what Marcus Camby has done since he high-tailed the UMass campus, or even noticed the news I did.

The Camby situation is another example of how people take sports way too seriously. The grumbling, particularly in New York if the Knicks should falter, that is sure to mount as Marcus stays on the sidelines isn't fair, and its nothing new, either.

Time and time again, sports fans, music fans, movie fans and fans in general forget who their favorite idols are. They're people. Marcus Camby got the blessing from his boss and his co-workers to stay home with his traumatized family and help them get their worlds back in order. It sounds like a relatively sad, but normal situation to me. Camby's job not being a nine-to-five desk job should not change things. The Knick players, for one, recognize this.

"It's almost like, is this real? Is this happening?" Latrell Sprewell, of all people, stated. "I can only imagine. I have a sister, and I can only imagine what Marcus is going through."

If Sprewell, himself less than the ideal human being, can understand this, why can't the fat guy with the tub of popcorn and the six-pack of beer on the floor as he watches the game? Basketball is not the first priority in these players' lives – just like any other job, there are things that still come first – like their families, their God, and their own well being. Above all, that needs to be remembered. Cut Marcus some slack, and let him be with his family.

BRYAN LOHNES

You should have been there. It was beautiful.

Early Saturday afternoon I took a walk across campus, heading out of Northeast, across North Pleasant Street and down past the pond. The air was cool, and few people were around to disturb the peace. It was, in a perfect world, what every day in Amherst should be.

Near Bartlett the silence gave way to something larger, though, something stronger, an energy pulsing through the ground that rose and fell in waves. It wasn't long before the first people were visible, the source of the subterranean tremors, hanging like vines on and around Tobin, all straining to focus on Garber Field, which sat at the bottom of the hill, buried under the sea of bodies. I stepped down towards them and turned the corner.

4,725 fans: UMass and Syracuse. Men, women and children clogging the sidelines, all watching the No. 2 and 8 college lacrosse teams in the country declare war on one another. In three years at this school, it was perhaps the most stunning thing I've been witness to.

The game was back and forth, up and down, and appropriately, knotted at five heading into halftime. To that point, you couldn't have scripted a better game had you tried.

As the final buzzer echoed out of Garber, the fans stood to cheer the Minutemen, despite the one goal defeat. I listened to people around me, Syracuse people, talk about the UMass program, the "hell of a program and staff they have here in Amherst." I watched a number of them stay and watch the teams exit the field. I watched with pride knowing that those guys on the field were responsible for every single one of us being there, and I was proud to be a student here.

The men's lacrosse team has given this campus a reason to get outside and come together. They have given us the opportunity to stand and collectively cheer in a way we haven't been able to in quite some time. They have given us the chance to form a sense of community, even if just for an afternoon at a time. They've done it without politics or hollow grandstanding. They've done it because they are damn good and know it.

And now, we know it.

The few times I've felt this way about UMass have almost always been courtesy of the athletic program. Back in the Fall of 1998, when the Maine Black Bears rolled into the Mullins Center for a weekend series with the hockey team, I watched Maine coach Shawn Walsh squirm as we slowly dismantled them. Took them apart. Owned them. I joined in the chants, the jeers, the celebrations. Don't buy into fans acting as the pivotal sixth man? You should have been there.

There was last year, a windy April afternoon at Fenway Park, watching our baseball team massacre the Northeastern Huskies in the annual Beanpot Tournament. Watching them go up 12-0, playing like they owned the place, like it was just any other place. Watching the clear sky blanket the park. I stood with pride as they took the title, far removed the spotlight, sacrificing nothing to accomplish the task at hand. Never been much of a baseball fan? You should have been there.

> "Regardless of what happens [to the men's lacrosse team] from here on out, they've given us something great, and deserve nothing less in return."

There was, of course, the National Championship that our football team delivered two seasons ago. Watching head coach Mark Whipple and his team take that spotlight and run with it, wrestling it away from anyone who dared come close, filled me, all of us who were here, with a sense of pride. They put this school on the map that season, made people rush to watch us, and made teams afraid to play us. Not a sports fan? I don't care. If you were here, you felt something when it happened. Impossible not to.

I've had plenty of arguments with friends about the athletic department here at UMass. Some have been bold enough to suggest that sports simply don't belong at a University, that they take away from the academic environment that we all apply to be a part of. Athletes shouldn't have the privileges, they say, to travel around and compete while the rest of us settle down to do "real" work.

After watching the lacrosse team this season, try and tell me sports don't belong. That they're not important. There's simply no argument there.

Let's not leave this team now. They've gotten us this far, have dragged so many of us down to a field that otherwise would have been spotted with fans. Regardless of what happens from here on out, they've given us something great, and deserve nothing less in return.

Sports naturally unite; they've done it here, and they've certainly done it elsewhere. If you weren't there on Saturday, I'm sorry. You should have been. It was beautiful.

Vampire flicks have new anti-king

By Jake D. Lewis

THE FORSAKEN
Directed by J.S. Cardone
With Kerr Smith and Jonathon Schaech
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

Remember that horror movie about the young vampire hunters who comb the American southwest, seeking out the bloodthirsty monsters, only to get bitten themselves? You do? Funny, since that describes every single vampire movie in cinematic history. It seems. Whether it's Interview with the Vampire, John Carpenter's Vampires or the Jim Carrey comedy Once Bitten, they all follow the same stupid outline that may have been interesting the first time, trendy the second time around, but by the third outing is a complete waste of time and celluloid. So far this year we have been graced with two vampire flicks, Shadow of the Vampire, which had promise to it but got too caught up in the gory moments, and now, the sleep-inducing escapade The Forsaken.

The latter film is plain painful to watch, and I'm not talking about the horror scenes in it. As a matter of fact, there's very little graphic violence to it, and I'm ashamed to say that this is to the film's credit. Writer and director J.S. Cardone is one of the few Hollywood filmmakers whose skull is not completely numb, realizing that the thing that really scares people is the unknown, a la The Blair Witch Project, and not savage murders and scenes of carnage, i.e. any other horror film. No, The Forsaken is excruciating to view for other reasons.

Kerr Smith and Brendan Fehr, their on-screen nemeses and off-screen careers both in a state of un-life.

First among them is the "plot," which dizzily centers on Sean (the inept Kerr Smith of "Dawson's Creek") who is traveling cross-country to his sister's wedding when he picks up a mysterious hitchhiker named Jack (Brendan Fehr). Jack is later uncovered as being the best (and youngest?) vampire hunter that side of the Rio Grande, one of the lowest paid and least respected jobs in the market today. After an unfortunate run in with a fanged one, Sean and Jack need to find the ringleader of the bloodthirsty lot before they turn into children of the night too! (Did I just repeat the first paragraph?) In such a tired plot, these boys aren't just lost; they're missing in action.

Izabella Miko, of Coyote Ugly fame, as Megan.

Where the film tries to be original (and, consequently, where it fails miserably) is when it comes to the vampire lifestyle. They appear more like high school "goth" kids than the spawn of Dracula. Their leader, Kit (defectively played by Jonathon Schaech), looks as though he is the long-lost New Kid on the Block. (or should I say Backstreet Boy?) with his tight-fitting Gap clothes and blonde highlighted hair. For being the leader of the pack, he is the least frightening one on the screen, always speaking in low tones and only killing when people insult him. It seems that nowadays vampires need a reason to kill people, as opposed to the days of old when they killed because they just liked killing. Take for example when Kit crashes a beach party and asks for a beer. He is humiliated by having the can explode in his face, ripping out the guy's heart. Whatever happened to sucking his blood?

And boy, is he lazy! Just so the bloodsuckers can make greater distance between meals, they have a driver who chauffeurs them around during the daytime. They may be immune to silver bullets and garlic, but sunlight is still the oldest trick in the book. Ha, take that, you vampire bastards!

No horror movie is complete without a helpless female character (it's good to see that Hollywood still remains as sexist as ever), and Izabella Miko obnoxiously fills the role, although she has hardly any lines to say. Whoever said that body language tells a lot couldn't be more correct here; it's so easy to dislike this spasmodic woman, even when she does nude scene after nude scene. (Everyone knows that a horror movie isn't complete without a naked lady or two.) When Miko does open her mouth to spew forth the putrid dialogue, you realize she made the most sense when she was mute.

One can't help but laugh at the end, where a prospect for a sequel is clearly set up. Just like these vampires, I hope that The Forsaken 2 will never see the light of day, even if it's one of these direct-to-video franchises that go on and on and on.

My plea to Hollywood is this: Stop making vampire movies like The Forsaken. They all suck.

Stallone drives Driven into ground

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

DRIVEN
Directed by Renny Harlin
with Sylvester Stallone, Kip Pardue, Burt Reynolds, Gina Gershon
Playing at Cinemark, South Hadley

Sometimes it seems utterly amazing how much money and time is spent on movies that have incredibly simplistic plots, and are just, well... just plain awful. The movie Driven is one such instance. In all likelihood, Driven operated with a budget larger than that of many small countries. However, this movie ran out of gas way before it reached the finish line.

It's been 11 years since the world was graced with an original screenplay (Rocky 5) from Sylvester Stallone. Mercifully, the torturous wait is finally over. Yes, not only does Stallone star in Driven, but he wrote it as well. As expected, Stallone's writing ability is about as good as his acting.

It's clear that Stallone enjoys playing the good guy who beats the odds role (Rocky, Rambo), but he is so over the top with the role in this film that it's almost comical. Stallone plays Joe Tanto, a has-been Formula One Driver who rejoins the racing circuit to claim the glory that he never really achieved years earlier. The end result is Tanto becoming a kindly veteran of sorts, handing down his knowledge, and passing the torch to rookie racing sensation Jimmy Bly (Kip Pardue). Stallone serves up such morsels of wisdom as "You don't have to be perfect everytime out there kid," to the young racer. Most likely, Stallone uses the same strategy when it comes to his acting.

The actual story itself is so ridiculously infantile and predictable that most filmgoers will see exactly where it is going a mile (or maybe a few laps in this case) away. While the main vehicle for the plot centers around Bly being an apprentice of sorts to Tanto, there are enough hackneyed subplots to fill several cable TV movies. For one, problems develop between Bly and his money grubbing agent/brother. Bly also becomes involved in a heated feud with fellow racer Beau Brandenburg (Til Schweiger). A love triangle develops with Brandenburg as well, as both end up chasing the same girl. Burt Reynolds plays the role of a crippled ex-race car driver who now bosses the careers of Bly and Tanto. He and Tanto bond, then fight, then bond again by the movie's ultra-cheery ending. The movie simply has too many characters to keep track of, and they all seem one dimensional (Stallone = wise veteran, Bly = young, charming, naive rookie, Brandenburg = evil foreigner), and/or undeveloped.

In between the half dozen underdeveloped plotlines come the actual races themselves. Instead of looking realistic, they look ridiculously overblown, overproduced, and overdigitized. The effects look so unrealistic, it's almost hard to believe that this film was made in 2001, where bad special effects are generally considered a thing of the past. Oh, and by no means are these crashes designed to look like the one's you see on Sunday afternoon NASCAR. In one particular crash scene, a car flies over the side of the track, and into a nearby body of water. While I suppose it's possible to suspend disbelief for these scenes, they are so over the top that they just come across as silly.

Even more annoying is the films camera work. The jumpy Any Given Sunday style of cuts is often is hard to follow. Director Renny Harlin would have been better off simply shooting the film in conventional fashion, rather than trying to dazzle the audience with fancy camerawork.

Overall, the ridiculously overblown effects, combined with the cheesy plot and dialogue, make Driven a just plain lame movie. Stallone, Harlin and company would have been better off slowing down and actually trying to tell a coherent story. Instead, the film spirals out of control and crashes early. Instead of giving the film its obligatory 1 star, or Two Thumbs Down rating, Driven deserves a yellow caution flag for a rating. And that caution flag should be waived at anyone who even entertains the thought of seeing this film.

Crystal brings love of baseball to HBO

By Nicholas Pizzolato
Collegian Staff

61*
Starring Barry Pepper and Thomas Jane.
Directed by Billy Crystal
Airing on HBO

As a Sox fan all my life I am sworn to hate the Yankees. But as a baseball fan I can say with no bias or hatred that there is a legacy that surrounds the Pinstripe Club of New York. There is an ambience about the Bronx Bombers that resembles a golden light shining down on Yankee stadium. And unless either a miracle or travesty occurs (that depends on which team you root for) the New York Yankees will go down in the history of the game as having a higher number of influential ballplayers than any other team. Since the opening of the American League the Yankees have had dominating players in almost every generation in the history of baseball. Babe Ruth began this legacy by hitting 60 homeruns in one season and it wasn't until 1961 that his record would be challenged. Mickey Mantle was the New York favorite, embracing his fans and the New York lifestyle. Roger Maris was the league MVP but was a quieter person, who just wanted to play the game that he loved. Both were on the road to greatness and neither could predict the outcome of the summer of '61.

A lifelong Yankee and baseball fan, Billy Crystal wanted not only to bring the his two childhood heroes to life again, but also give younger generations of baseball fans a chance to watch the annals of history unfold before their eyes, to see a generation when a fee of $38,000 was considered astronomical, when Monument Park was located on the playing field, when fans could reach out and touch an outfielder as he caught a fly ball, and when the city of New York had to decide which Yank to root for – Ruth, Maris, or Mantle. Although Mantle and Ruth shared the same lifestyle of womanizing, drinking, and random acts of misbehavior, it was the unbelievably quiet and sometimes rudely soft-spoken Roger Maris that was playing as hard as he ever would, not necessarily to win any title, but just to play the game. Crystal draws the lines clearly between the two Yanks, sometimes over-emphasizing Mantle's New York lifestyle (like having Mantle driving through a storefront with a girl, only for it to be covered up by Whitey Ford) and making Maris' baseball innocence look like backwater intelligence (he whistles along with the Andy Griffith while Mantle looks on in terror). Crystal, being an avid baseball fan, was able to capture every angle and sight that baseball has to offer, from catches that that steal homeruns from batters to a knuckle ball's perspective of being pitched.

The cast is a great ensemble, not only memorializing Mantle and Maris but Maris' wife, the '61 Yankee team, the sports writers who stirred controversy with every word Maris said, Commissioner Ford Frick, and all the fans of baseball. Barry Pepper is a veteran to critically acclaimed and commercially successful movies. He was an special operative in Enemy of the State, the verse-quoting sniper in Saving Private Ryan, and the youngest of the four guards in The Green Mile. For two hours Pepper could pass for Maris, not so much for his resemblance to the Yankee left fielder, but also his manner. Roger Maris was a very shy individual who just wanted to do right by his family by earning a living by playing the game he loved. He did not want the attention or the criticism that the season gave him. Pepper's performance is spectacular, never overstated or underplayed; his portrayal is much like the performance of Maris himself. Thomas Jane's performance is equally good. Mantle came across as a real cut-loose type of guy after the game, but during the game he was as serious as any of the other players. Loved by all for his adjustment to big city life, Mantle was known for his ability to be out into the early morning hours. Jane is believable in his performance and likeable as the morally questionable outfielder.

The strong foundation for the film is the script written by Hank Steinberg. He may at times exaggerate the anger of the fans at Maris, by having them throw chairs at him on the field, but for the most part the film is not only well written and well planned but also inspirational.

*61 is not only a great baseball movie, but also a good movie in general. Some may argue that is not 100% historically accurate, but it is emotional and inspiring. As a Redsox fan I can say we had Cy Young, Carl Yazstremski, Ted Williams, and Carlton Fisk, but unfortunately we can't deny the dynasty that is The New York Yankees. This film appeals most strongly to Yankee fans, but is meant for all baseball fans. We see the angst that is experienced by every individual chasing a record, intentionally or by accident. 61 is terrific and a shoe-in for Emmy awards in September. It is powerful, historic and emotional and gives the viewer a sense of history, and how fleeting popularity may be.

Active Ingredients charm UMass with Shakespeare

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

THE TOTAL WORKS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE (ABRIDGED)
With Jordan Zolan, Robert Killeen, and Michael Milner
Bowker Auditorium
April 25, 27, 28

University of Massachusetts comedy troupe Active Ingredients took an exceptionally innovative approach to the works of the great William Shakespeare. The comedy team, composed of UMass students Jordan Zolan, Robert Killeen and Michael Milner, adapted the popular British play, The Complete Works of William Shakespeare (Abridged) with enhanced local flavor.

"The crowd responded really well," said Zolan. "It was really different every night."

The performance had a strong sense of intimacy from the very beginning. Cast member Robert Killeen stood at the front door greeting guests and handing out flyers, and then actually began the play posing as an audience member.

Obviously, the most difficult challenge of the play is to portray adequately each piece of Shakespeare in a way that the audience will find entertaining, but at the same time not insulting. The three men did that very well.

With all three actors dressed in neon tights and brightly colored Converse sneakers, the play began with a funny and outrageous version of Romeo and Juliet that had Milner playing Romeo and Killeen portraying Juliet. The performance was fueled by the awkwardness of the two actors and their odd interpretations of both characters.

Though the performance was adapted from a very successful London version, there were some very creative additions. The most prominent example was their interpretation of Titus Andronicus as the "Iron Chef."

All of Shakespeare's comedies were clumped together into one brief moment of the show, where the cast tried to explain that since they were all pretty much the same, they could be summarized with a variety of optional titles.

All but one of Shakespeare's plays were done throughout the first half of the show before intermission. Only Hamlet was left for the end. The final 40 minutes of the play were entirely dedicated to what is proclaimed as Shakespeare's finest tragedy.

Hamlet had simply a wealth of physical comedy and audience participation. To portray the personalities of psychotic character Ophillia's Id, Ego and Superego, the cast brought members of the audience onto the stage, and worked the crowd through screaming and yelling.

Hamlet ended with the troupe proving that they knew the play for-

Mighty Mighty Bosstones rock Boston University

By Nick Cardamone
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

(U-WIRE) BOSTON — About 1,700 students rocked to the tunes of three Boston hometown bands on Friday night at the Boston University Armory in an event culminating the Programming Council's annual Spring Fling.

National recording act the Mighty Mighty Bosstones and local bands Lost City Angels and Kicked In the Head played to an enthusiastic crowd for more than three hours.

The Bosstones, eight members strong, opened the show with "Noise Brigade" from the 1997 release "Let's Face It," the band's most successful record to date.

The Bosstones put on a rousing set that included such fan favorites as their 1997 hit "The Impression That I Get," "Where'd You Go" and "Someday I Suppose" as well as older songs like "They Came To Busted," "Devil's Night Out" and the set closer, a cover of punk legend Stiff Little Fingers' "Tin Soldiers."

Frontman Dicky Barrett kept the crowd occupied between songs, thanked fans for their enthusiasm and introduced the band, joking that he didn't understand "why these guys keep me around."

The Bosstones said they enjoyed playing close to home.

"I just got off my sofa an hour-and-a-half ago," said Tim "Johnny Vegas" Burton, one of the Bosstones' saxophonists, about an hour before the band took the stage. "I got to eat a home-cooked meal, which is nice because it's not something we get to do regularly. It's cool to be playing [Boston University] because it is our hometown."

The Bosstones have an extensive touring schedule that Burton said keeps them on the road for more than 200 shows a year.

"We're so used to [being on tour]," Burton said. "We must be sick in the head, because we like it."

The Bosstones said they never expected to play at BU after a concert incident several years ago.

"We played here five or six years ago," Burton said. "This was before the big explosion in popularity of punk. There were about 1,000 people and they broke down the barricades and trashed the place. Faculty said the Bosstones would never play BU again. I guess we outlasted faculty."

The Bosstones have outlasted more than just BU faculty, spending more than a decade together – despite personnel changes – and remaining a popular live act. Burton said every homecoming show is something special and playing at the Armory was no different.

"It's beyond our dreams," Burton said of the Bosstones' success. "Twelve years later to be still doing it."

It was the Bosstones' second local concert in a week. They played a show at Brandeis University in Waltham on April 22 with the same opening acts.

The band recently wrapped up a national club tour designed after the Bosstones' annual Hometown Throwdown, a series of five shows in five days at a local club in December.

Lost City Angels opened the show with their brand of streetpunk and a group of concert-goers started a mosh pit. The highlight of LCA's set was a segue into the Ramones' classic "I Wanna Be Sedated" and the "Hey Ho, Let's Go" choruses from "Blitzkreig Bop." The band also played a verse and chorus tribute to former Ramones' lead singer Joey Ramone, 49, who died on April 15 of lymphatic cancer.

Kicked In the Head entertained the crowd with their own blend of ska and hardcore and stirred the crowd with a cover of Faith No More's "Epic."

MTV's latest show on college freshmen

By Tim Perzyk
The Chronicle (Duke U.)

(U-WIRE) DURHAM, N.C. – If exploitive college comedy were an art form, Undergrads would be the Mona Lisa.

Meet Nitz, Rocko, Cal and Gimpy, the freshman foursome at the heart of MTV's newest animated offering. These perfect slices of collegiate stereotype are leaving high school behind and attacking the undergrad experience full-frontal.

Nitz is the Eyor of Undergrads. Hopelessly uninspired and sadly shuffling through the motions, he's the victim of the freshman 15 and a paraphernalia-obsessed decorator.

Buff guy Rocko is the group's fratboy-wannabe. Obsessed with Greek life, he hazes himself after learning pledge tasks are no longer permissible. Dumb as a rock-o, he's the Animal House remnant of the contemporary college scene.

Roommate to Nitz and lover to many, Cal is the ladies' man who never will be. The handsome blonde Valley boy is so light in the loafers he nearly floats off the screen, but his ubiquitous harem of hotties is paradoxically appropriate.

Computer addict Gimpy is the strangest of the foursome. A student at prestigious Techerson Tech (Think Massachusetts Institute of Technology minus sunlight), Gimpy enjoys a nerdy following devoted to his wacky schemes. He's also the most hideously rendered of the show's animated heroes.

Undergrads rides high on concept, coasting through a host of typical freshman experiences. With its student activities fairs, bevy of ultimate frisbee teams, naked running and overzealous RAs, the show maneuvers humorously through familiar situations. Only Cal and Nitz are enrolled at the same school, but Undergrads keeps its characters intimate, communicating quite fittingly through AOL Instant Messenger.

Cal's infrequent dialogue is perhaps the show's most uproarious. Dripping with deadpan stupidity, he's more than amused with his dorm's opening social event. "There'll be free cheese ... and Boggle!" boasts Doug "the Dougher," the laughable everyman RA. Cal gasps and cries, "I love both those things!"

Despite MTV's promotional push for Gimpy, who appears to be the show's star, Undergrads does best when the remote and maniacal tech-nerd is MIA. While Cal, Nitz and Rocko are drawn with clearly human aesthetics, Gimpy is misshapen and misplaced, like Beavis or Butthead in a Disnes movie.

The colorful characters are unlikely bedfellows, but diversity ensures a broad smattering of college humor. Undergrads may grow tired as university pastimes are sequentially exploited – and like any school-based serial, the show may do best to call it quits at graduation. Despite some potty humor and overly obvious "inside" jokes, Undergrads glimmers with the biting wit of Daria and offers a smart, if familiar, taste of college living.

wards and backwards, literally. They spel through the entire play twice in less than a minute, and a third time in about thirty seconds backwards. Everything settled nicely, and the audience obviously enjoyed the farcical energy.

Preparations for the play were intense, as Zolan said full-blown rehearsals began last January. Active Ingredients was able to earn $2000 to put on the show, for free, by gaining grants from the Arts council as well as the Alumni Association and S.A.C.E.S. The work certainly paid off, because the play was enjoyable, extravagantly funny and a tremendous new way to enjoy Shakespeare on a more personal, wacky, and down to earth level.

NHL's strange names

Playoff heroes are unfamiliar

The playoffs are in full swing and like every year around this time a bunch of guys with unfamiliar surnames are scoring big goals and making huge plays around the league.

It seems that every time the playoffs roll around, hockey's heroes continue to be more obscure – and this year is no exception.

Eight teams are left in this year's playoffs and there is certainly no shortage of surprises from any team.

So lets go through series by series and weed out some of the strange names that any hockey fan will have to know as the road to the Stanley Cup continues.

We all know how good Mario Lemieux and Jaromir Jagr are, and we have all become accustomed to the resurgence of Alexei Kovalev.

But Kevin Stevens?

Stevens has all of a sudden decided to play with the reckless abandon that earned him a fifty-goal season in the early '90s. Yes, it's the same Kevin Stevens who was arrested less than two years ago; the same Kevin Stevens who was one of the highest paid but least effective forwards on the New York Rangers.

That same Kevin Stevens is playing with a chip on his shoulder and causing havoc in front of Dominik Hasek. Another surprise for the Pens in this year's playoffs has been the play of unknown goaltender Johan Hedberg. For those of you who are unaware of the world-class talent of Hedberg...don't ask me because I sure as heck don't know.

Hedberg has been more dominating than The Dominator thus far in the series. He is 6-2 and first in the playoffs with a 1.33 goals against average. Not even Hasek can compete with the play of the Swedish goaltender and so far that has been the difference in the series.

There may not be very many unknowns in the Toronto-N.J. series, except for the entire Maple Leafs team. The Leafs came into the playoffs as the seven seed riding one of the worst streaks of bad play in franchise history.

The clean slate of the postseason has somehow re-energized the entire squad, as the Devils have surrendered the home ice advantage.

Curtis Joseph has been the catalyst for the Leafs so far this postseason. Following a very mediocre regular season by his standards, Cujo has put up some gaudy playoff stats.

In six games, the Toronto goaltender is 5-1 with a spectacular .950 save percentage and three shutouts. Joseph has been the one single reason for the Leafs' success and if he continues his dominant play there's no telling how far the Leafs can go.

The Blues-Stars series has yielded very similar unknown stars. Dallas Drake has been the hidden hero for the Blue notes thus far. D-day has six points in eight games but even more important than his scoring is his toughness.

No team has ever hoisted the cup without toughness and Drake is simply the epitome of the word. He has more goals (4) than teeth (who knows) and yet he still plays hockey the way it is meant to be played. He hits in the neutral zone, he takes punishment in front and in the corners and he draws and kills penalties.

Of all the talented players on the St. Louis roster Drake may be the most indispensable of any player up front. Without Drake, the Blues may be teeing off with the thoughts of a second straight first round exit on their mind.

The final series features the Kings – yes, those Kings – and the Avalanche. Similar to the Leafs, nobody expected the Kings to be in the second round and similar to Johan Hedberg nobody expected Felix Potvin to be good, let alone stellar.

Potvin is the reason that L.A. is in the second round. He must be taking some major painkillers for his neck because for eight games straight now, the Cat has been standing on his head.

He entered last night's game in L.A. with a .905 save percentage and a 2.66 GAA. The save percentage may not look too impressive but skeptics might be convinced when they realize that the Kings play exactly no defense.

Another plus for the Kings in the 2001 postseason has been the French Connection line of Ken Belanger, Ian Laperrierre and Luc Robitaille. The three French-Canadians have been the spark plug that L.A. has craved to make a playoff run. With the ability to score, the stellar goaltending, the big hitting and the lack of solid defense – the Kings are a fun team to watch...for everyone but Avalanche fans that is.

Hold your breath Colorado; this series is far from being decided.

have plagued the Minutemen all year, the main concern for Stone and his troops is the team defense. Over the past four games, the defense has committed 12 errors, 11 of which have come at the hands of the infield.

"We haven't played well enough defensively," Stone said. "That needs to improve if we want a chance to win the Beanpot and to go to the tournament."

On the other hand, the Minutemen offense has continued its torrid pace. As a team, UMass is hitting .313 for the season and is led by its third and fourth hitters, senior captain Nick Gorneault and sophomore Jeff Altieri. Gorneault is hitting at a .378 clip to go along with his seven homeruns, while Altieri is smoking in the cleanup spot, hitting .351 with a team-leading 35 RBI.

Both hitters have had success in the Beanpot in the past. Gorneault has a .471 career average and six RBI in his four games in the tournament. Altieri was the hero of last year's championship game against Northeastern, as he delivered three hits, two of which were home runs that cleared the Green Monster. One of those was a mammoth shot that went over the net and made it on to Lansdowne Street.

"You never can really count on offense every day, but we've been taking quality swings at the plate," Stone said. "That's usually how I choose my lineup – based on who's swinging the bat really well."

As for UMass' history with those awaiting them in the second round, the team has not played Boston College since the first round of last year's Beanpot, when the Minutemen downed the Eagles 4-1 at Pawtucket.

Northeastern came to Amherst two weeks ago, and the home squad downed the Huskies 6-5 by way of a ninth inning single off the bat of freshman shortstop Adam Stolpunowski to score senior Gavin Clark.

Today's game kicks off at 2 p.m., while tomorrow's game will be at 11 a.m. if UMass loses, or 2 p.m. if it wins.

the Tar Heels ran off another 7-1 run to officially put the opposition away.

Angela McMahon was the only player wearing maroon and white to hit the back of the UNC net over the last 20 minutes, blasting a shot by backup North Carolina goalie, Margaret Garafolo, with 7:33 remaining in the game.

For UNC, player-of-the-year candidate Kellie Thompson continued her stellar play, tallying five scores against UMass. She was far from the only offensive threat, however, as Lindsay Stone (four goals), Erin McInnes (three goals), Amy Havrilla (two goals), Brooke Young (two goals) and Christin McPike (two goals) all contributed to the Tar Heel cause.

In net, Minutewomen senior Jen Nardi had moderate success attempting to stop the 39-shot bombardment that confronted her, making 12 saves in 42 minutes of play before yielding to backup goaltender, Cyndi Doyle.

In comparison, UNC netminder Melissa Coyne was only called upon to make four saves before giving way to her backup, Garafolo.

Now that the regular season has ended for UMass, it will look forward to matching wits with Duquesne in the first round of the Atlantic 10 tournament, and will attempt to gain revenge for a 12-9 loss on April 13.

"We want to focus on Duquesne and take it one game at a time," Barnes said. "We are looking forward to playing them again."

Emily [Robustelli] hadn't kept the rally going before me."

Hadley went the full seven innings. The right-hander gave up six hits and struck out six. The win improved Hadley's record to 13-5.

After last week's heartbreaker in Storrs, the Minutewomen victory was imperative.

"We definitely needed [the win]," Rooney said.

UMass 2, Fordham 0

The Maroon and White scored single runs in the third and fourth innings, which turned out to be more than hurler Carrie Jelfries would need.

Rooney knocked in what would amount to the game-winning RBI in the top of the third when she singled Aisha Franke home.

Jeffries tossed a complete game shutout. The right-hander scattered five hits while striking out two en route to improving her record to 10-4.

UMass 9, Fordham 0

Rooney capped off her monster weekend and clinched the Player of the Week award on Sunday, when she banged out a 4-for-5 performance including a double, triple and 2 RBI.

Robustelli added a 3-for-4 performance. The shortstop knocked in two RBI while scoring 3 runs.

In a rematch of the game one pitchers, the advantage of familiarity went to the Minutewomen on both offense and defense.

Fordham's starter, Renee Little, who baffled the Minutewomen on Saturday, giving up just three hits, had no tricks left up her sleeve for Sunday. The senior lasted just 1 2/3 innings while giving up five runs.

"We knew what she was coming with, so we adjusted quicker," Rooney said.

UMass jumped out to an early lead in the first when a Rooney triple knocked in Robustelli from that second batter of the game until the end, the Maroon and White never relinquished the lead.

Jen Hadley faced the minimum 21 batters en route to the UMass staff's first no-hitter of the year. Hadley struck out two and walked two while improving her record to 14-5.

UMass heads to Chestnut Hill this afternoon for a single contest against Boston College. It will be the second meeting of the season for the two squads.

The Minutewomen downed the Eagles in the teams' first match-up on April 5 in come-from-behind fashion after spotting BC a 4-1 lead. Junior Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler went yard for the Maroon and White while sophomore Kaila Holtz earned the win on the mound.

Following another successful weekend, UMass is back on track and ready for its up-coming opponents.

"After Sunday, we felt great as a team and really played confident," Rooney said. "We are in a great place for what is in store for us."

Officer, how do you intend to keep the peace at campus parties?
BY HITTING THE KIDS WITH NIGHTSTICKS.
But in this day and age, there must be a better way to handle these situations!
YOU MEAN LIKE BIGGER NIGHT-STICKS?!

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You may be feeling as though something is hanging over you today. There's a reason for this that will be made clear later.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You may find yourself going back and forth all day long today. There's a reason for this that will be made clear later.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may have to make nice with someone today merely to open a window of opportunity for yourself in the nick of time.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Your surroundings may change quite suddenly today, and you're going to have to get used to a new way of doing things as a result.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Focus on your own long-term plans today. Seek out the answers to some difficult questions. Focus on cooperative efforts at home.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Tact is required today, and you can benefit greatly by engaging in polite negotiations revolving around a sensitive issue. Don't be too guarded

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – What you do and what you say must be in sync today, or you're not likely to gain the confidence of others. You must be credible at all times.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You may learn something quite surprising about a friend or loved one today which actually reflects on you in a highly unexpected way

CAPRIORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You may misinterpret the information given you during the first part of the day, and, as a result, you must spend time reorganizing and catching up.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You must be sure that you supply others with all the information they need in order to help you as much as possible today and in the future

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You must be sure that you supply others with all the information they need in order to help you as much as possible today and in the future.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Concentrate on focusing on your chosen goal in a manner that allows you to avoid distraction and to keep yourself pure in thought and action.

Minutewomen jolted in double OT

But season ends on positive note

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's water polo team saw its season come to an end this weekend in Providence with one win and a pair of losses at the Collegiate Water Polo Association Eastern Championship.

UMass sneaked by Indiana 8-6 in its first game but Princeton proved too much of a tenacious foe for the team in the semi-finals of the tournament, as did Hartwick College in the third place game. Princeton squeaked by UMass with a goal in double overtime for the 8-7 win, and Hartiwck caught the Minutewomen 14-7 in the season finale.

The tournament was not without high points for the Minutewomen. Sophomore Kelly Chassy played her way to the all-tournament first team roster, and sophomore Mattie Newell and Junior Dana Sinkwich both landed on the second team.

"[Being named all-tournament] was great," Chassy said. "But the best part of the weekend was playing together as a team. We had some struggles this year coming together, and this weekend really proved that we can do it."

Chassy dominated for the Maroon and White, not just throughout the tournament, but the season as well. She commented on the season in general.

"We won some big games," Chassy said. "We did a lot better than a lot of people expected us to."

Newell and Sinkwich were also a pair of players who were enforcing threats to opponents all season. Their contributions as all-tournament players did not go unacknowledged.

Mattie Newell explained that the team really tried hard to find sincere success. "I think it's very impressive that so many of us got all-conference nominations," she said. "Ever since this program began, we have never got that close to Princeton. So that was a really big deal."

Sinkwich, an All-American goalie reflected on the game as well as the entire season. "I think the whole team has been through a lot and we've overcome a bunch of difficulties, especially with the new coaching, new freshman," she said. "Everything was new to us this year."

Sinkwich said she hopes to use both the good and bad aspects of the entire season to improve upon her personal play and that of the team for next year.

The Minutwomen finished the season with a record of 17-10 - ranked No. 20 in the nation. The end of the year brings the departure of two very dedicated seniors in Erin Hillier and tri-captain Sarah Newell.

"I'm really proud of them and how far they came this season," Chassy said. "I'll miss them dearly."

Mattie Newell remarked on her sister's contributions to the team. "She is the type of person who every game is a solid player," she said. "She's consistent, and produces so many wonderful things in every game. I just think that's the strength we'll miss."

Of course with the departure of seniors comes the onslaught of a new recruiting class. The team is not denying that it needs to fill voids that are present now or will be present in the future.

"With those new people, I look forward to being better than we were this year," Sinkwich explained.

To a team that spent an entire year swimming towards the outer limits, it is evident a ray of hope glazes over the pool in Boyden Gymnasium for not simply improvement, but an even more vicious tenacity than the defining amount it has conjured up through hard work all year long.

To Fenway with a vengeance

'01 Beanpot Classic starts with rematch

By Matt Brady

This one's for all the beans.

The Massachusetts baseball team (16-15, 8-5 Atlantic 10) will travel to Boston today to compete in the 2001 Beanpot Classic at Fenway Park. The opening game will pit the defending champion Minutemen against Harvard, with the winner playing the victor of the Boston College/Northeastern game tomorrow.

"We're excited to have the opportunity to play [at Fenway]," coach Mike Stone said. "It's nice to play somewhere when you've had success there in the past. It's kind of like a golf course that you've played well on."

The tournament is full of subplots, the foremost being the rematch showcased in the first game. Last week, Harvard crushed UMass in Cambridge, 21-11. The Crimson batsmen struck early and often, getting off to a 12-1 lead after two innings of play.

"We were embarrassed last week by them, and that should hopefully be a motivating factor for us," Stone said. "I really think it's going to be different story."

In that game, senior David Loonie was tagged for nine hits and nine runs in just over one inning of work, while freshmen Anthony Gullo and Kevin Joyce fared no better in relief, combining to allow 11 more runs in their four innings of work.

The two teams have been going in different directions since the contest, though, with the Maroon and White being victorious in its last two and Harvard dropping three of its last four. UMass got strong starting pitching from junior Jesse Santos and senior Craig Szado to lead it to back-to-back victories over Vermont and Holy Cross.

"[Today] it will be [Nick] Skirkanich, but we'll play it by ear after that," Stone said. "It really depends on who pitches in relief and how many innings they go."

Skirkanich pitched three shutout innings in relief of Szado on Thursday, allowing three hits and striking out five. His last start was made on the losing end of a 13-5 drubbing at the hands of conference opponent Rhode Island, who last Sunday tagged the senior for 10 runs on 12 hits in his three and two-thirds innings of work.

Despite the occasional pitching lapses that

Nick Skirkanich will get the nod today for the Massachusetts men's baseball team in the first round of this year's Beanpot Classic. Congratulatory gestures will be in order if he can halt Harvard at Fenway Park, a rematch from last week's 21-11 Crimson victory.

Women's lax falls to No. 7 UNC

By Jesse Greenspan

As the emergency broadcast system would say, this was only a test.

Before heading down to North Carolina for Sunday's clash with the Tar Heels, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team had been riding an impressive four-game winning streak that had resurrected a season.

However, none of those four games was against a squad as powerful as No. 7 UNC, and the Minutewomen ended up falling to the Tar Heels over the weekend, 20-5. With the loss, the winning streak came to a close, and the Maroon and White ended its regular season with a 6-9 (3-2 Atlantic 10) record.

Because UMass had already qualified for the A-10 tournament, though, the contest against North Carolina was nothing more than a chance for the Minutewomen to see where they stood in comparison to the nation's elite. And although it did not put in its best performance, coach Phil Barnes still likes were his team stands at this point in the year.

"Our winning streak was great and we have had success in the conference and in the region," the second year coach said. "We hope to carry that success into the A-10 tourney."

The game did not start off bad at all for Barnes' squad, as UMass was only down 3-2 midway through the first half behind goals from Iada Emery and co-captian, Fay Naber. However, the Tar Heels responded, running off an 8-1 run to extend their lead to 11-3 at the intermission.

"Overall, we thought the game was going to look different than it turned out to be," Barnes said. "We needed to continue playing good defense and to keep pushing the ball. Against North Carolina, we did that at the beginning of the game and had success, but didn't continue to do that."

In the second frame, UNC picked up where it had last left off, pushing the lead into double digits before Emery was able to answer with her second tally of the contest at the 22:35 mark. This failed to spark the Minutewomen at all, though, as

Softball sweeps Fordham

Junior Hadley tosses no-hitter

With just 10 more games before the Atlantic 10 Tournament in Dayton, Ohio, the No. 22 Massachusetts softball team (34-10, 18-0 A-10) headed to Bronx, N.Y. this weekend for three match-ups with conference rival Fordham.

The Minutewomen were in an unusual situation going into Saturday's doubleheader after Wednesday's loss at UConn – trying to prevent a losing streak.

Junior Jen Hadley and senior Carrie Jeffries dominated the Rams the entire weekend and gave up an average of just over three hits a game, including a no-hit performance by Hadley.

The Maroon and White offense struggled in game one, but managed to keep the score close until the final inning. In the seventh, the tough 1-2-3 combination of sophomore Emily Robustelli, junior Teri Rooney, and sophomore Brandi Cross each reached base, with Cross delivering the game-winning RBI single.

Robustelli reached on an error. Rooney doubled her home to tie the score at two. Cross followed by smacking an RBI single that plated Rooney for the go-ahead run.

Bush warns of FAFSA drug question

By Kavan Peterson
Collegian Staff

President George W. Bush's administration is warning students who skip a drug conviction question on their financial aid application this year that they will lose their federal aid.

The administration says 300,000 applicants left the question blank on the Federal Application for Financial Aid (FAFSA) last year. The government requires students to disclose drug convictions under a provision of the Higher Education Act (HEA) which denies federal aid to students with drug convictions. Students for a Sensible Drug Policy (SSDP), a nonprofit organization based in Washington DC, report that over 8,000 students who answered 'yes' to the drug question lost some or all of their aid last year.

According to University of Massachusetts Financial Aid Director Ken Burnham, three UMass students lost financial aid because of the drug provision. One of those students completed a drug treatment program and had his aid reinstated; the other two dropped out.

Under pressure from university financial aid administrators, the Department of Education approved aid for the 300,000 students who refused to answer the drug question.

According to Greg Woods, Chief Operating Officer of Student Financial Assistance for the US Department, 20 percent, or 1.5 million applicants skipped the drug question when they first filled out the FAFSA for 2000-01 because it was unclear and poorly worded.

Woods said that the Department of Education estimates 99.6 percent of applicants will answer the drug question this year because it is written more explicitly. The SSDP estimates that 50,000-90,000 students could be denied aid because of this, and Burnham said he didn't yet know how many UMass students could lose aid this year.

The financial aid penalty is a one-year suspension for a drug misdemeanor or felony, two-year suspension for a second conviction, and an indefinite suspension for the third. A conviction for dealing drugs doubles these penalties. Students may regain their eligibility only after completing a federally-approved drug rehab program that includes two random drug tests.

Burnham said that students won't get away with leaving the drug question blank this year because of the increased pressure from the Bush Administration to strictly enforce the policy.

"Not answering the question is the same as a declaration 'yes' this year," Burnham said.

Because there is no national database for drug convictions, Burnham said enforcement of the drug provision relies on students honestly disclosing their drug convictions on the FAFSA. But, Burnham warned that the penalty for lying on the FAFSA can be a $10,000 fine and imprisonment.

The HEA provides over $40 billion per year in student aid through funds like the Pell Grant, Perkins Loan and Work-Study programs. Congress reviews the HEA annually and amended it in 1998 with a provision that restricts financial aid from students who voluntarily reveal any drug convictions imposed while they were on the financial aid.

US Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind., has said the provision is intended to deter students from using and selling drugs on college campuses. Souder said that opposition to the drug provision is indicative of the widespread acceptance of drug use among college students.

In a statement to USA Today last June, Souder said, "American culture treats drug use as an accepted part of the college experience.

"By temporarily suspending federal financial aid for students convicted of drug crimes, the law sends a clear message: Actions have consequences, and using or selling drugs will ruin your future."

Burnham said that he was very concerned when the drug question was added to the FAFSA last year because he believes that financial aid administrators should not be enlisted as agents in the drug war. He said that his colleagues in financial aid agree that the drug provision of the HEA contradicts their mission to provide access to education.

"I find it troubling," Burnham said, because only students who honestly disclose their drug convictions are punished. 'Someone who has been through the justice system has already received their justice."

Burnham said that he raised his concern about the drug provision to the administration last year, but has received no response from the Chancellor or the President's office. Chancellor David K. Scott did not respond to inquiries for this story and UMass President Bulger could not be reached.

The SSPD organized chapters on 75 university campuses to oppose the drug provision of the HEA. Seventy student government associations, including

Survey says: Lazy students pee in shower

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

It was pop superstar Madonna who told David Letterman, "Everyone does two things. Everyone picks their nose, and everyone pees in the shower." Though it may be, no doubt, an insightful way to look at the world, it was never really proven, until now.

According to a press release entitled, "Survey reveals that students are so lazy that most pee in the shower," from Lazystudents.com, 75 percent of the 840 college students polled answered "yes" to an online question asking, "Do you pee in the shower?"

Andrew S. Hazen, founder and CEO of Lazystudents.com told the Collegian that the poll results came quite a surprise. The poll stayed online for more than six months, gaining a lot of response.

"It was kind of like that [report] from years ago about not taking mints in a restaurant because people weren't washing their hands," Hazen said.

He also pointed out that it was an obvious example of how college students can be lazy, citing that if most are admitting to not even have the physical desire to leave the shower if they feel the need to urinate, then that is a sure sign of indolence.

Studies of UMass students actually proved that a lot of people do go to the bathroom in the shower, possibly coming closer to proving the survey's results as accurate.

Asif Sayani, a Senior Neuroscience major said he understands a person's frame of mind when urinating in the shower.

"It just makes more sense," Sayani said. "Why not conserve water while you're at it? Plus with all the water flowing from the shower, it makes you want to pee anyway. As long as you aim for the drain, I'm your friend. Just don't play around with it on the floor."

Sophomore English Major Andrew Caouette wholeheartedly admitted that he is guilty of urinating while taking a shower. "I do, but not all the time," he said.

However, Caouette's initial response to the survey was one of disgust. The amount of people that the poll actually found was what got to him. He said that it was, "pretty nasty" that 75 percent of students studied answered in the affirmative. He, however, was not surprised.

"It's time efficient, and you see it all the time," he said.

"You're washing your hair and you see a stream of yellow wash by, so you know the guy next to you is doing it."

Caouette even laughed about it, and told how urinating in the shower is a regular joke between he and his roommate.

"My roommate calls it 'peeing in the shower day,'" Caouette said. "He'll come back from taking a shower and say, 'hey, guess what day it is!'"

Some students did not find the results funny, but were actually repulsed by them.

Lonna Steinberg, a senior Legal Studies major showed disgust and said, "It's a good thing I wear flip-flops."

Chris Henry, a sophomore English major said he does not urinate in the shower for a variety of reasons. "I have a schedule," he said. "I get up in the morning, I go to the bathroom, and then I take a shower. It's not that tough."

Henry also explained that living in Orchard Hill makes it more difficult for anyone to physically be able to do it anyway. The showers in Orchard Hill are only two side-by-side stalls with a central drain in the middle. Because of this, Henry explained that it would be much easier to actually urinate on someone else, and people seem to have the common courtesy to refrain from doing so.

"I actually don't think I've ever experienced anyone else peeing in the shower," he said.

According to medical reports published online, urinating in the Safe Passage aims at helping women

By Emily Vacanti
Collegian Staff

Safe Passage, formerly Necessities/Necesidades, located in Northampton, is an organization committed to ending violence against women and aiding its survivors.

One of the first things that Safe Passage acknowledges is the definition of domestic violence. Domestic Violence is not referred to as that alone: it has many different names, some of which are spouse abuse, battering, partner abuse and wife beating. In their brochure, Safe Passage defines domestic violence as "intentional violent or controlling behavior by a person who is currently, or was previously, in an intimate relationship with the survivor. Methods of coercion and control include humiliation, intimidation, fear, and often intentional physical, emotional or sexual injury."

Safe Passage helps provide support to women who wish to change their situations, and they also develop programs for community education that are meant to address the problem of abuse of women.

"Staff and volunteers at Safe Passage work incredibly hard, with tremendous dedication and skills, to provide a full range of integrated services to battered women and their children," stated Director of Programs Betsy Shally-Jensen. Those who work at Safe Passage come from different life situations and present a variety of skills and interests to the organizations and the women that use it. This distinct group of women makes Safe Passage a reliable place for women and children of all backgrounds and life situations to take refuge. "My experience with Safe Passage has been a very eye opening one and a very life changing one," said Lori-Beth, a Safe Passage volunteer.

The Safe Passage Philosophies and Principles, as listed in their literature, express this mission statement: "Our structure, based on principles of inclusiveness of all women and consensus decision-making, is conducive to skill-sharing among members and women who use our services, each of whom provides a unique contribution to the group."

One of the characteristics that defines Safe Passage is that they are committed to breaking down the traditional education and service provisions. This is characterized by an oppressive professional/client relationship.

Safe Passage empowers women to take control of their lives. It accomplishes this through supporting women and informing them of the many different options that are available. According to the Safe Passage Philosophies and Principles, "This entails acknowledgement of and respect for the capacity of every woman to take control of her own life."

Women need to respect all aspects of each other in order for this to be effective. This includes tolerance and appreciation of individual sexual orientations, cultural backgrounds, races, and social classes.

A few of the ten most common questions about domestic violence which volunteers and workers at Safe Passage are often asked are: Why wouldn't a woman just leave if she's being beaten? Are all batterers alcoholics? Were all batterers beaten as children themselves? Doesn't the woman provoke the violence in some way? Safe Passage answers these questions, as well as seven others, in a list titled "Ten Common Questions About Domestic Violence."

Safe Passage offers nine different programs for victims. These 10 program and projects offer a variety of assistance to anyone who is in need.

They are the Counseling/Advocacy Program (CAP), Shelter Program, Safeplan, Legal Referral Program, AmeriCorps Domestic Violence Project, Disability Services Program, Women's Economic Development Project, Multilingual Volunteer Interpreters Project, Domestic Violence Intervention Project (DVIP), and Volunteer and Outreach Program. In addition, Safe Passage offers a 24-hour hotline. Kelly, An AmeriCorps Volunteer said about the hotline, "Often the first time a woman calls the hotline is the first time she's found the courage to reach out." To the staff, hotline calls can be amaz-

Story honored with award by Women's Bar Association

By Karen Madsen
Collegian Staff

Representative Ellen Story (D-Amherst) recently received the 2001 Massachusetts Women's Bar Association Legislator of the Year award at the groups annual meeting at the Copely Marriott hotel in Boston.

Created in the mid 1970's, the Women's Bar Association is a statewide professional organization focusing on a number of legal fronts including: legislative and social policy making; access to justice for indigent women; professional development and gender equity in judicial nominations and appointments.

The Association stated that Story was chosen "because of her advocacy on women's and children's issues," and in recognition "of her important contributions to public policy by both toiling behind the scenes and taking political risks for the sake of important issues."

"I am honored to be chosen by the women's Bar Association as their legislator of the Year," said Story. "The W.B.A. is known for its high standards and willingness to take the lead on women's issues that are not always popular with the powers that be on Beacon Hill."

Story also believes that the Association was expressing a political stance against Speaker of the House, Thomas Finneran, by selecting her.

"I have been critical of Tom Finneran," Story said. "There are other women [representatives] who are closer to the speaker. By their choosing me, they were making a political statement.

"I have been out spoken on a number of issues," said Story. These include bills to mandate contraceptives coverage, gender equity in insurance and the protection of children from abusive parents in child custody disputes.

During this Legislature session, Story is heading an effort to pass a bill, which will create a commission to investigate the current system of health care for juveniles with mental illnesses in Massachusetts.

"This system doesn't have enough funding, and is poorly organized," said Story. "These 'stuck kids' currently suffer from a backlog for hospital beds, residential placements and community services." She is supported by Children's Hospital, the Boston bar Association, the Massachusetts Academy of Pediatricians and the Human Services Coalition.

Representative Story describes herself as "one of the harshest [advocates] for welfare reform. I have been working to get people off welfare, but also helping them to be self-sufficient."

She has also worked to protect the privacy of personal information on handicapped placards by initiating a discussion between the Registry of Motor Vehicles and Massachusetts Office on Disability, and has filed for legislation to create better oversight of summer camps, resulting in changes to the Department of Public Health safety requirement governing camps. These include basic references on camp counselors, CORI checks and lower counselor-camper ratios.

Story believes the state government has important and direct influence on the lives of students, and encourages them to become more aware.

SGAs at Amherst College, Hampshire College and Mt. Holyoke have passed resolutions urging Congress to repeal the drug provision.

Alex Kreit, a senior at Hampshire College, helped form a chapter of SSDP after the drug provision went into effect July 1, 2000. He helped persuade the SGA of the Hampshire College to set aside $10,000 for students affected by the drug provision, and the administration pledged to match the fund.

According to Kreit, Hampshire College President Greg Prince Jr. was the first university head to sign a resolution calling for a repeal of the drug provision.

Kreit said, "The best thing to do is to encourage schools to set up provisions that would allow them to help students affected by this stay in school. Anyone [here] who loses aid as a result of the Higher Education Act will get a loan from Hampshire College."

Kreit is organizing a conference with the SSDP at Hampshire College Friday, May 4, to address concerns that University financial aid administrators have with the HEA drug provision. Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts 4th District sponsored a bill to repeal the drug provision and will speak at the conference. Kreit hopes that 70-100 financial aid administrators from around the country will attend the conference to discuss the impact of the drug provision and alternative ways to fund students affected by it.

The UMass financial aid office is cosponsoring the Hampshire conference and Burnham said that students at UMass who lose federal aid because of a drug conviction still can receive institutional aid originally awarded, but cannot receive additional aid. He said that he would provide the institutional aid as long as the administration allowed him to.

"We want to be in the business of facilitating higher education, and sometimes over-regulation makes our task more difficult," Burnham said. "This provision can position the financial aid office as the bad guy when it is something that is beyond our ability to change."

Frank is one of Congress's most outspoken critics of US drug policy and sponsored H.R 786 as a part of a coalition opposing the drug provision. The bill has 30 co-sponsors, including Re. John Oliver, and is supported by 34 national organizations, including the NAACP, United States Student Association, Association of Big Ten Schools, National Council for Higher Education, American Civil Liberties Union, and Massachusetts Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators.

Regardless of this support, Frank said the bill will most likely dies in committee.

"The question is whether or not the Republican leadership will take up the issue," Frank said. He said that current drug policies are ineffective at stopping drug use and need to be overhauled, but under the Republican majority, the reforms he has proposed often get stuck in committee. Frank said that not enough legislatures are willing to publicly oppose the drug war.

"I'd rather have people think I was soft on drugs than soft in the head," Frank said about colleagues who are afraid to support his bill because they have to look tough on the drug problem.

Frank said the drug provision disproportionately affects the poor and is the only such provision affecting federal aid.

"No other crimes, including murder and rape, result in suspension of federal aid.

"If Bush or [former Democratic presidential candidate Al] Gore got caught taking drugs in college, they'd be okay," Frank said, because their families were wealthy enough to pay for their educations.

Kreit added. "It singles people out who are in the greatest need of an education. Rich people are not affected by this, just middle and lower income families."

Kreit said that politicians like Bush, former President Bill Clinton and Gore have all admitted to experimenting with drugs, yet supported or failed to veto the drug provision of the HEA.

"Everyone knows that college is a place for experimentation," Kreit said, "but just because you smoke marijuana once or twice doesn't mean that you should be kicked out of school."

Senior Andrew Epstein opened a new chapter of SSDP at Amherst College and helped persuade its SGA and College President Tom GERETY to sign the resolution to repeal the drug provision of the HEA. Epstein said that he was concerned that denying financial aid only hurts students from middle and lower class working families and would disproportionately affect minorities because of racial bias in drug enforcement.

"People who are already marginalized in our society – minorities and the poor are disproportionately affected by this," said Epstein.

UMass does not have a campus chapter of the SSDP and the SGA and the Cannabis Reform Coalition have not yet joined the campaign to repeal the drug provision. SGA President John Sheehan said he plans to investigate the impact on UMass students because the policy seems to contradict the correction process for drug abuse while undermining the University's missions to provide access to education.

"If our drug correction system is intended to reform drug use, then education is the best way to achieve reform," Sheehan said. "By limiting people's access to education, how do you expect them to reform?"

Burnham also pointed out the discrimination of singling out drug use above all other crimes for suspension of financial aid.

"I ask this question," said Burnham, "if you were severely inebriated and you mowed down four people at a bus stop with your car, is there a provision that restricts your financial aid?

"But if you get convicted of a drug charge there is a financial liability," Burnham said. "This provision only affects people who are on the lower end of the economic table.

"For people who can afford to pay their own way, there is no impact," Burnham said.

shower can have its helpful effects, but is not encouraged. It can aid in the treatment of Athlete's Foot and genital Herpes. Also, the sound of a shower has been found in some people to actually trigger a psychological response to physically relieve oneself. University Health Services said it was unable to find actual evidence supporting any benefits to urinating in the shower.

Andrew S. Hazen said the poll comes as one of many on the company's site, marketed to college students in an attempt to use interesting polls of questions that he said people would not normally ask, to grasp interest. Some of the other polls the site has displayed were questions like, "Do you have a tattoo," or "Were you a high school bully?" Hazen said the bully question was remarkably interesting because most people refuse to acknowledge if they were the aggressor in violent or demeaning behavior towards others. "They just won't come out and say it, or admit to it," he said.

Hazen said that even though the site seems to have more absurd topics, it is something that a lot of work is primed into.

"Here in the office, we have weekly meetings to discuss what polls we are going to use," he said. "That idea [urinating in the shower] just happened to come up."

He said that the poll about urination partly came about because it could possibly lead to positive benefits.

"It's disgusting, and if it gets to the right person, who actually wants to make a difference, they could do something with it," he said. He compared it to the committee that sparked awareness about regularly checking your body for cancer years ago, which he claimed has shown remarkable success. He did say that no one has officially commented to him yet about the results aside from the online voting.

Hazen said that he ultimately reaches to educate and entertain at the same time. "The ultimate goal of this site is to make student's lives easier," he said."

ing, as well as very challenging.

In addition to violence against women, Safe Passage also deals with family violence. Family violence is a much broader and more inclusive topic that encompasses everything from child abuse to elder abuse. It also includes abuse of the disabled. In one of the handouts available at Safe Passage, both family violence and elder violence are defined, as well as domestic violence. Safe Passage also adds numerous examples of abusive behavior, including physical, sexual, and emotional.

"Survivors need and deserve the full support of all members of our community, doing whatever they can, wherever they are to end violence against women," Shally-Jensen said.

"I love to come and speak to classes. The more that students learn about state government, the better," she said. "Students who go to UMass should already have an issue with state government and state funding. I've visited with members of the Legislatures of Michigan and Texas; they would never cut funding for the Universities of Michigan and Texas. In Massachusetts, a lot of people in the Legislature went to private institutions, and have never visited Amherst, so they don't know what a jewel UMass is."

Water hazard:
Jet skis are problematic

A proposed ban on personal watercraft or Jet-Skis as they are commonly known, is a drastic action that, despite the inconvenience it may give to the enthusiasts of the sport, should be imposed in the state of Massachusetts.

Strict limits are already in place for Jet-Skis. They cannot operate after dark, drivers must wear a safety vest, they cannot proceed within a certain limit of areas where people may be swimming, and no one under the age of sixteen is allowed to operate a craft within the state. Still, these laws do not affect the real problem that Jet-Ski opponents have with the machinery.

These limits do much to protect the drivers of Jet-Skis and those who could conceivably be injured by them. Mandated life-preservers protect the driver, and the ban on underage, on certain areas, and on a minimum age protect those innocent people enjoying the water who could be injured. By themselves these rules (if strictly enforced) would be more than sufficient, if personal safety were the issue involved.

The two main issues at hand are environmental and community. The environmental issue is due to the fact that, despite recent efforts from the Jet-Ski industry to make headway against it, most Jet-Skis on the water today are heinous polluters. They dump gallons of gas and oil per tank into the water upon which they move.

There is no excuse for this. Many of the bodies of water that are Jet-Ski friendly in this state are also secondary or backup sources of drinking water for town in the state. Many of these locations have aquatic life that does not react well to gasoline and oil intruding on their habitat. It doesn't matter how fun the sport may be – this sort of pollution in Massachusetts is unacceptable.

The community issue had two prongs. One is that the people in the communities that are dominated by this sport intensely dislike it. They find it to be obnoxiously loud; despite the laws, they consider it to dangerous to them, their children, and even the drivers. They consider it an unnecessary nuisance. To be honest, they hate everything about it – but they do live there, and it is their lives and community, and their voices should carry great weight.

The other argument that, if a partial ban is instituted, then the areas where there is still legal Jet-Skiing would come under attack even more as enthusiasts from other, banned areas travel to where it is allowed. These people would then have even more reason to dislike the sport. To avoid this, a total ban would be necessary.

A ban on Jet-Skis is the right thing for Massachusetts. A sport which pollutes and angers those exposed to it should not be allowed to continue. Those who enjoy it may bitch and moan, but the common good must speak over their noise and the noise of their motors.

Prevent a tragedy

SAM WILKINSON

What with the recent fall of Thomas Degnan, who fell from Butterfield attempting to retrieve the building's pirate flag, it is expected that the security at the upcoming Butterfield Banquet will be tighter than usual. With such a stupid and avoidable tragedy fresh in the minds of everyone, security had better be tight enough to prevent something similar at this year's event.

That said, the proposal that's currently on the table to make sure that nobody makes it to the roof by making sure nobody gets in the door is ridiculous. Instead of sending a battalion of prepared University of Massachusetts police officers, it will be students who are asked to police the event to prevent any more of the tragedies that the dorm has already witnessed. A party that annually gets out of hand by all accounts anyway, the Butterfield Banquet isn't going to be showed by student security, a group that's woefully unprepared for their jobs and rarely successful.

But what is the proposal?

Apparently, students will be offered a buck more per hour to make sure that nobody gets signed into the festivities. A buck. Students will be posted at all doors and instructed not to let anyone in. That's a buck not to listen to their peers into the building.

If anyone thinks that offering student security an extra dollar per hour to be the victim of the attendees' wrath will actually slow the party, they're living to themselves. Ignoring the popular rumor that Butterfield graduate have already planned to pay off student security (a couple bucks per head to let people in the door), current students to act as riot control is more.

I hope that the UMass administration does have a hand in this, but only that's because I like the Chief of Police Jack Luippold, so I'm holding out hope that this wasn't his idea. However, regardless of whoever scheduled that the best way to prevent a tragedy parts is to use students against other students, it's just poor judgment that's going to fail for a number of reasons.

A lot stands UMass Student Senate is not the most liked group on the campus RA's seem to have a growing disdain for security, especially in Southwest where individuals are continually kicked out of buildings only to reappear because student security simply couldn't stop them from reentering the building. And why can't student security prevent the re-entry? Because what kind of power do they really have?

Every Friday night when I go into a dorm, I simply have to show an ID and in I go. In Wheeler two weekends ago, I didn't feel like waiting, so walked right by and on to my destination. Was I afraid that the guy behind the desk was going to get me? Of course not, because honestly, what can he do? Follow me and leave his post? Of course he can't, he has to man the front desk. If he calls for backup, he has no idea where in the building I went. The fact is that student security makes people feel safe while not really increasing individual safety. This is nothing against student security; it's a good job with bad hours and decent paychecks that a lot of students are very diligent about doing. But the fact is they don't have the ability to actually do much of anything if someone doesn't want to show the ID and wait to be signed in.

Which brings us back to the Butterfield Banquet.

Students aren't going to try to prevent a rabid group of party-goers from doing their proverbial thing. It just isn't realistic to expect students to prevent other students from doing something that almost all students enjoy. Not only will the Butterfield Banquet happen in a week and a half, it'll happen whether students are there or not.

And therein lies the problem. If students are spending their time trying to avoid student security, need we witness another stupid accident, some other Thomas Degnan who gets injured? He's in critical condition; is making the University administration feel safer at night by having students trying to prevent other students from getting to a party going to be worth another Thomas Degnan?

The Butterfield Banquet must go on; trying to stop it might lead to another unnecessary accident. But Student Security isn't the answer either; if the UMass administration or the UMPD seriously want to slow or contain this party, it's going to take their presence. Only we don't know if UMass is willing to do that.

It's downright shady that there seems to be more a willingness to risk another Thomas Degnan than actually secure the area so that those involved can have a good safe time. It might not give the University a friendly face, but a consistent flow of students injured in totally preventable ways certainly won't either.

Interview with disaster

ADAM MARTIGNETTI

There are about a thousand different ways I could start this column. Believe me, I've thought of most of them. I could write an angry rant about one of my more disheartening experiences in recent memory. I could tell an anecdotal story about my current (and presumably continuing) job search. I could do a combination of the two and project my interview experience last Friday as an omen for the rest of my job search.

However, let me just start by saying that the best thing to come out of my first job interview was that I got to see a picture of Al Kaprielian fresh out of college. And the funny thing about that is it means absolutely nothing to most of you – unless you live in New England and, then, only if you get WNDS.

That TV station, nestled in the heart of Derry, NH, was the site of what could go down as the worst job interview experience ever. I was somewhat surprised when Alicia (the WNDS New Director) called me regarding a position that had just opened up. Sure I had blanketed about every local media outlet (TV, radio and newspaper) in a 50-mile radius with my resume, but when you're an English/Communications major, you don't really expect people to "pay" you. Anyway, they were interested in me so we set up an interview for last Friday at 11:00 a.m.

Derry is about a two-hour drive from here and I allowed myself plenty of time to arrive. (A side note here: drinking the night before an interview makes it infinitely harder to get up the next morning. That said, if you do drink, avoid anything called the "Blind Mexican.") I arrived in Derry about 20 minutes early and found the station with relative ease. I walk in and the secretary (I'll get to her soon) tells me that Alicia isn't in, but I can wait in the lobby. Thinking nothing was out of the ordinary, I casually took a seat and began waiting. 11:00 rolls around and Alicia does not show up. "That's cool," I'm thinking. "She's probably just running a little bit late or something." 11:30 – still no Alicia. 11:45 – the secretary walks out and tells me nobody knows where Alicia is, when she's coming back or if she is even coming back.

And thank God for this woman too. She was a tremendous source of entertainment. The entire time I was there she was on the phone with her boyfriend "Ricky," who I envisioned as one of those greasy-haired biker guys, because someone had been "talking about her." She kept saying that she wanted to find something to do tonight because she "had to get out of this fucking town."

Since I had driven about two hours to get there, I politely tell her that I'll wait a little longer. Anyway, at about a quarter to one, a guy comes out (who I later discovered was the sports anchor) and says we tried Alicia here, she's not there and blah, blah, blah. He suggests that I go have lunch and come back in an hour – then, maybe Alicia will have arrived. Begrudgingly, I agree.

So, I'm off into the heart of downtown Derry – whew, the excitement. Let me tell you, I stop at a local sub shop that has apparently sold over 100,000 steak bomb subs. I order tuna fish. Then, I kill some more time in a nearby Strawberries – a store that pretty much embodies everything wrong with America. An hour later, I'm back at WNDS.

A new secretary – apparently Ricky was ancy – tells me that Alicia can't make it, but the General Manager will interview me. Reassured, I reply, "Oh, okay, that's great." Then, the new secretary says, "So, can you come back in a hour?" Mind you, this is already two hours after the appointment was supposed to happen. I ask, knowing full well, "What time is it now?" "Quarter to one." "What time do you want me to come back?" "Quarter to two."

Dejected, I return to the parking lot

An hour later – now, three hours after the appointment was made – I finally meet the General Manager. She has no idea who I am. She doesn't have, or has misplaced my resume. The interview lasts 15 minutes at the very most – the first question of which was, "Tell me a little bit about yourself." I had the urge to say that I was Ricky, but used my better judgment and decided against it. The kicker? The General Manger tells me that Alicia said she couldn't do the interview yesterday, but apparently nobody had told the secretary. Maybe, they did tell her and she just forgot after a wild Thursday night.

At this point, I was middling somewhere between laughter and crying. I did get the WNDS tour after the interview though, and got to see the abovementioned picture of Al Kaprielian. Fifteen minutes later, I'm back on the road to Amherst.

My first reaction was to get upset, or depressed, or angry over the incident. However, I decided to take a step back and analyze it rationally. So, here it is: my first interview experience by the numbers.

240 – time spent driving to Derry, in minutes. 180 – time spent waiting in Derry, in minutes. 15 – minutes actually spent interviewing. 18 – inches of enormous tuna sub eaten by me. 20 – approximate amount, in dollars, I added to the booming Derry economy during my stay (I needed CD-R jewel cases). 50 – estimated pounds lost by Al Kaprielian since coming to WNDS "fresh out of Lyndon State" in 1983. 110,000 – estimated amount of beef, in pounds, used by "The Great Sub Shop" to make steak bomb subs. 2 – Kaprielian children seen by me while waiting in the lobby. 8 – times I heard Dido's "Thank You" on the radio. 4 – times I listened to it (lobby and car combined). 1 – times I heard The Sunday's "Summertime" on the radio (for my roommate Dave). 97 – percent chance that Incubus's "Drive" will be all over the radio in three weeks, not just rock-oriented stations. Chances of me actually getting the job – no comment.

Letters to the Editor
Collegian editorial out of line

To the editor:

Tuesday's editorial, "The Sobering Cost of a Campus Prank" was written in poor taste. Before you start printing self-righteous sermons in your paper, I suggest that you take into account your readership. For those of you at the Collegian who have not been lucky enough to have had your lives touched by Tom Degnan, his name may conjure up nothing more than images of a silly flag. But for countless others at UMass, his name conjures images of friendship, laughter, and love. There are students on this campus who care about Tom and who are anxiously awaiting any word on his improvement. To open the Collegian and see a sanctimonious column condemning his actions and suggesting that he got what he deserved is not helpful to those of us who are left waiting in the dark. In fact, it's extremely hurtful. Tom is not just a flashy headline, or juicy gossip, or an entertaining topic of conversation in the Collegian newsroom. He is a human being and deserves to be treated as such. This is not about a flag, people, this about a life. Please show Tom and those of us who love him the respect that we all deserve.

Kerry Brennan

To the editor,

I want to correct a misquote in "SGA discusses the budget" (April 26) and expand upon some of the writer's comments about the motion passed last meeting to reopen the University dental clinic. I do not support any plans to "bring in a private management corporation to oversee health services." In fact, I strongly oppose it. It would require a wholesale philosophical and material change away from its mission of public service. Due to the profit-motive inherent in privatization, the cost to the patient would increase, staffing would likely be decreased, and it would open the possibility that essential services would be eliminated. We should focus on reversing things like understaffing, not exacerbating or locking it in, as most ailing and wait-weary students can attest to. In fact, why not return to the infirmary; or the kitchen that was used for injuries like broken jaws?

Still, privatization has been classified as an "alternative funding option." (See "Funding Alternatives and Service Plan Development," for UHS. Permanent library reserve, University studies and reports.) The justification used to close the university dental clinic came from this consultant report.

Most of the closing reasons were specious. It was reported that the dental facility "lost $260,000." Not reported was that over $200,000 was merely rent the dental clinic was charged to operate within UHS. Repeated proposals over several years to improve financial arrangements with dental insurance plans, increase staffing and streamline services had been either ignored or rebuffed. The campus union plan of SEIU 509 to continue clinic operation was unsubstantially rejected. The area dentists don't even have the capacity for the approximately 7500 former clinic patients. The fees are also higher than the clinic's. Also, insurance payments to UHS began to lag behind costs so student fees were used to make up what was not paid by insurance carriers. And this is how we're rewarded.

In effect, this was a narrow unilateral administrative action – the kind we have become used to. The administration ignored constructive campus input, including from student government. The students and the larger campus community should decide.

Boy amazes Avalon

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

BADLY DRAWN BOY
Avalon Ballroom
April 30

At first I thought it was appropriate that Badly Drawn Boy, the post-modernist moniker for singer/songwriter Damon Gough, opened Monday's night's performance with "Falling in a River." In fact, I was going to use that for my lead to this story.

The song, off his critically acclaimed first full-length album, The Hour of Bewilderbeast, offers the best example of some of the odd production that can be found on that album and Badly Drawn Boy's general quirkiness. About half a minute or so into the melodic pop song and earnest vocals, the music disappears, a splash is heard and the song literally falls into a river.

However, after Badly Drawn Boy's two and a half hour plus performance, I realized that he is not about quirkiness. Any image of the jaded, disaffected Englishman melted away on the Avalon stage. I realized that Badly Drawn Boy is just that: a boy – overflowing with an incredible earnestness, and an incredible wealth of emotion.

Donned in his signature wool cap, cigarette hanging from his bearded jaw, Badly Drawn Boy took the stage for a performance that I can only describe as transcendent. He and his band mates performed their full canon; hitting every song from Bewilderbeast, reaching into their five EPs, doing B-sides, covering Robert Pill, covering Robert Pill B-sides and even doing a Bruce Springsteen cover along the way.

It's not so much what Badly Drawn Boy played though, but how he played it: that is, with a sincerity and affection for his audience. After an absolutely great ten-minute version of "Falling into the River," that did eventually end with the water, the group followed with "Camping next to Water" and "Stone on Water" – a song dedicated by Badly Drawn Boy to "all the pretty girls in the house."

This wasn't the only time that Gough reached out to the females of the Avalon crowd. Later – actually very much later – in the night, Badly Drawn Boy serenaded dedicated fans with roses and an improvised version of "Tell Me Your Name."

The highlights kept on flowing, as the band was obviously reluctant to leave the adoring Boston crowd. In perhaps the most touching moment I have ever witnessed during a concert, the singer took out of picture of his newly born daughter halfway through the performance of "Shining." After an intimate conversation about her, he actually passed the picture to the audience requesting only "make sure she comes back." He then finished "The Shining" and the Avalon dance floor made sure his daughter's picture returned to the stage.

I didn't think that Badly Drawn Boy could top that. Later, though, he did. After quieting the Avalon crowd to absolute silence, Gough unplugged the microphone. And despite the best (or worst) efforts of one stupid heckler, Gough did an amazing a cappela.

"You gave me something. You may think it's nothing, but it's more than something," his voiced crooned eerily across the ballroom without the aid of music or electronic magnification. The moment left the entire crowd absolutely stunned – with "wows" and "amazings" being whispered.

Before leaving the Boston stage, Badly Drawn Boy said that despite three previous shows, he felt that Monday night's show was the real beginning of the tour. I'd say that – in Casablanca style – it was the beginning of a beautiful friendship.

Adoring fans remained even after the show had ended to applaud.

For anyone not familiar with Badly Drawn Boy, I cannot encourage you to check him out enough. And after the Avalon show, I cannot reiterate that recommendation more.

Badly Drawn Boy, in signature wool cap, wowed Boston audiences this week.

Hartford treated to The Roots

By Esteban Arguello
Collegian Staff

THE ROOTS
University of Hartford
April 20

The Roots are an African-American hip-hop band from the streets of North Philadelphia that play (with their own instruments) jazz-influenced hip-hop.

Their last studio CD, Things Fall Apart, won them a Grammy for Best Rap Single ("You Got Me" featuring Erykah Badu). They encourage education, as well as rising above ignorance and gangbanging. The subjects of their songs are often smart, college educated African-Americans. Their party songs are filled with battle ready lyrics with plenty of room for freestyle verses and they are renowned for their live shows and funny antics.

This concert was at the University of Hartford Spring Concert and plenty of tickets were made available. Mori Stylez opened up with a fantastic show. They're a four piece jam band with no lyrics, a rhythm guitar player who only plays miniature guitars, a lead guitarist who doubles on oboe, and an eccentric drummer; it was quite the show. A lot of the solos seemed to get long-winded and sometimes they repeated the same scales too often but everyone seemed to enjoy it. Did I mention that it was April 20 (a.k.a. 4-20)? There was little reason not to feel the good vibe that was hanging in the air. Mori Stylez played a good nine-song set, thanked the Roots for inviting them, and exited stage left.

The stage was cleared and after a half-hour wait, The Roots finally took the stage. On a personal note, let me say that I've waited a good several years to see them, having missed previous concerts due to surgery, a car accident, and underage drinking: there is nothing more awesome than seeing the legendary Roots take the stage. It's all you could ever imagine; Black Thought with his glasses, ?uestlove with his hair pick, Hub with his cigar and hood, Kamal with his dreads, and Scratch with his turban. The only members missing were Rahzel due to recording, and Malik B who doesn't tour due to personal reasons. Dice Raw, who has been touring with The Roots since age fifteen, took over Malik B's responsibilities and did an awesome job, as it was his birthday.

They claimed to have a big cake, but the crowd never got to see it.

As they got on stage and grabbed their instruments, Black Thought already had the mic in his hand and was starting off with the words to "The Ultimate." The song was the first step in The Roots' initiative to get the audience up and involved. Black Thought got everyone to yell out the chorus in unison. He might have said, "We are the ultimate." and the crowd would have responded with "rock-rocking it!" Unfortunately, for the life of me I can't remember what we yelled out or to what words because I was caught up in the experience. It wasn't till five or six songs into the set that I remembered that I was supposed to review the show. When at The Roots concert, the level of involvement is so high that the music plays off the crowd and vice versa, and it consumes all possible attention. People were dancing, everyone was grinding, fists were raised in the air with every beat, and everyone was enjoying it. There was not one person still. Even the people in the wheel chairs were rocking back and forth. One of them even had a girl on his lap and they were dancing.

Audience participation is key to The Roots concert; this isn't a time to sit back and just listen, you have to be active.

They played a melee of hits such as "Double Trouble," "100% Dundee," "The Next Movement" and "Adrenaline." There's no reason to get into the specifics of these songs because too much went on. Each song was changed in a billion ways.

Freestyle verses were thrown in, the speakers blew out for a bit, Hub was forced to sit out for a sec. Dice Raw danced in the background, and Scratch added in whatever cool scratches that he wanted. The funniest change was playing bits of "Love of My Life" and "You Got Me" in a dub format. They had a reggae beat, changed it to rock, then to an offbeat rhythm, and finally to a big how down. In between songs Black Thought would give an opportunity for kids to just yell and get rid of all the frustrations and stress acquired throughout the school year. He congratulated graduating seniors and applauded kids with a good GPA. Then they kicked it again with another song.

In addition to just hearing their own music, The Roots brought in a guest vocalist. The Roots are often featured on fellow hip-hop artists' CDs such as Common, D'Angelo and Erykah Badu, and hence they complete the cycle by helping other lesser-known artists get exposure.

The first guest, Mrs. Jaguar, got to sing two of her songs and did her part on the Roots' "What You Want" from The Best Man Soundtrack. She sang a song entitled "What If," getting all the girls in the arena to yell out the troubles that their boyfriends were giving them. She flaunted her sexuality but just teased, saying she preferred an educated man to players. The other guest was a young man, who my friends and I had witnessed freestyle in audience to the Mori Stylez songs. He was now on stage and got to freestyle to ?uestlove's beats. He would sway from side to side after every line, with all three Roots vocalists mimicking him in the background.

Everyone got a kick out of that sight. He received a big applause as he finished his rap and got to stay up on stage for the rest of the show.

The Roots ended the show with a long encore in which they call Hop Hop 101. It was basically a long extended solo in which all the members of the Roots got to show case their talents. ?uestlove had a big drum solo, where he used everything in his reach to make a sound including stands and amps. Kamal had his own solo, which also became covers at times. They covered a couple of current hits like Jay-Z's "I Just Wanna Love U" to oldies like Salt and Pepper's "Push It." Scratch did his human turntable bit and Hub got to show his bass skills, ripping two bass strings apart in the process. He was so upset he started thrashing the last two strings, bending and contorting them producing a nasty solo. The encore was the pinnacle of the Roots talent, proving they can all rock a party.

UMass ought to get the Roots for one of the future spring concerts and I guarantee a good time.

They're coming back in July so go see them at the Tweeter Center when they come with Moby's Area: One Tour.

Wild and crazy frames

THIS WEEK'S TAKE THREE: FRAME YOUR FRIENDS

Most of the apartments I visit here at UMass have at least one thing in common – everyone does pictures.

They are on the walls, they are on the fridge, they are on the doors, they are on the shelves – they're everywhere! There's something about showing off your friends and your last Spring Break trip that is irresistible to kids in college. And we all know that pics are the best conversation pieces known to twenty-year-olds. Whether you have twenty pictures of your high school sweetheart, or a hundred of you taking a shot with your buddies – you know you can't live without them.

But enough about snap shots. I don't work for Kodak…I'm here to give a hint on how to display these beloved prints in a most stylish (and cheap) way. You don't have to run out to the store to buy a twenty-dollar frame every time you have a keeper.

You can make your own! Below are three different ways to decorate a four-dollar wooden frame that you can find in any size at any craft store.

Now boys, you may be beginning to cease reading this column – and dubbing it as "too girly" – but I will have you know that I am an experienced tomboy. You can do this too. Just don't let any of your boys catch you.

Although I try not to fuel gender ideologies…I want you boys to do these projects too. So, for the satisfaction of you guys out there who would like to make a frame too – I will add a suggestion that is frill-proof for you try.

Take One: The Trusty Decoupage: My favorite! The best part of decoupage is that it has endless possibilities. When in doubt – decoupage! For those of you who have been wondering how to master this technique – here comes the breakdown. You will need a foam brush, a decoupage medium (both sold in the U Store) and your frame. Now for the fun part – tear pages out of a magazine, photocopy pictures or postcards, tear pieces of colorful tissue or cut out comics from your favorite comic books (good for the boys!). Basically, anything that is as flexible as a piece of paper can be used in decoupage.

Now what you will do is paint the medium onto the back of your image – be sure to completely cover the piece and be generous with the medium. When you lay your picture or cutout down, smooth out the air bubbles. If your piece is fragile – put a piece of thick paper over the image and smooth over with your finger so it doesn't tear. When you have covered the frame – paint a coat of the medium over the entire piece. Decoupage medium dries clear and acts as a glossy coat over your finished piece. As always – be creative! Try picking a motif – like Cat Woman, fiesta, words, things that are blue, etc.

When you are done you will be impressed with the frame you have made and how quickly you did it!

Take Two: Frog Frog Frame I'm sure many of you have seen the trendy fuzzy frames sold in tiny-hopper boutiques. If you peruse the craft stores, you will find lycra, fuzzy cords and fake flowers. Any of those can be either worn to party or made into a frame.

This one is may facile (very easy for those of you who haven't taken Spanish 1 in high school). All you will need is a hot glue gun and enough of the desired material to cover your frame. A four-foot boa should suffice, as well as ten large flowers or fifteen smaller ones.

Simply hot glue your boa or cord right onto the frame for a fuzzy friend – or snip the tops of your faux flowers off and hot glue them on. If you want to be extra sparkly – try gluing a funky, gaudy piece of jewelry to cover your frame. Shop the second hand stores for cheap bits! Make sure you cover the entire frame so that none of the plain wood can be seen. Presto change-o! – A five minute frame worthy of a timeless snapshot. Boss – if you are interested in hot glue and frames – try gluing small trinkets or (okay) beer tops if you would like.

Take Three: Me and You. Also found at your local craft store: tiny mirrors in all different shapes! Buy a few packs, take them home, and hot glue them all over your frame. If you want to be super crafty, buy or cut out a piece of colorful fabric for a background and randomly glue the little mirrors around. To take it a step further – glue gold cording around each mirror. You can use tacky glue or hot glue for this project, but be sure to use a small amount so that the glue won't spill over the edges. A great gift for a friend or for your sweet old mommy!

Note to Self: Next Sunday is Mother's Day! Don't forget about her! A frame is a wonderful was to save memories…and you know moms love those! One year for my mom I bought three frames (one for each of her three daughters) and decorated each one differently. I used pennies for one, big pearls from an old necklace for another and soda tabs for the third. At the top of my frame I glued anagrams- solid school scrabble tiles) at the top reading "one" "two" and "three".

Then I put a black and white baby picture of each of us in our corresponding birth order. Did I jerk a tear? You bet! She even put them in her book titled Mothers and Daughters at Home: 55 Projects to do Together, (author Charlotte Evans) a great book to pick up for mom this week!

Grisham's style new in Painted House

By Ryan Blay
Michigan Daily (U. Michigan)

(U-WIRE) ANN ARBOR, Mich. – As I was reading John Grisham's latest novel, A Painted House, a friend of mine asked me what the book was about.

I had just started it, so I vaguely told him it was about a young boy growing up on a southern farm during the 1930s.

My friend then asked the obvious question: "Does the boy grow up to be a struggling lawyer fighting against an evil corporation?"

Thankfully, the answer is "no."

Narrator Luke Chandler spins the story much like Huckleberry Finn. The 7-year-old lives on his family's cotton farm in Arkansas during an eventful 1952.

Caught between childish innocence and the troubles of adolescence, Luke must pick his share of cotton to maintain the struggling farm, keep some very high-stakes secrets and practice catching fly balls so he can eventually become a St. Louis Cardinal.

September means picking season, and the Chandlers – Luke, his parents and his grandparents – recruit Mexican laborers and "hill people" from the Ozarks to assist in the picking.

A bad crop could ruin the Chandlers, but a good crop could provide them with enough money to pay outstanding loans on the farm.

Grisham's best trick may be in the way he addresses racial and class tensions during that period of time. For example, Luke's grandmother is one rare individual who actually treats the Mexican farmhands with respect.

The share-cropping hill people, the Spruills, are poorer than most of the land renters, but even they still have prejudices against the Chandlers. "Why don't you sodbusters paint your houses?" big Hank asks Luke.

Paint isn't the only status symbol in the book.

Television, telephones and cars also serve as reminders that the 1950s are ushering in a new era for America, even in the most rural portions of the South.

Hank's mother wants to move north and ensure Luke's escape from the frustrating life of a farmer. As long as Luke gets to join Stan Musial and his Cardinals, he'll be content.

But concerns of all sorts pose a threat to Luke's happy dreams. Hank Spruill has the unfortunate habit of killing people. If arrested, all of the Spruills would leave and the cotton can't be picked.

The Chandlers' neighbors also have issues. Among the worst of them, Luke's best friend and 19-year-old uncle Ricky is fighting in Korea, with letters few and far between.

This isn't to say Luke has it all bad. He still gets to go to the movies every weekend.

And Hank's sister 17-year-old Tally, takes a shine to him and lets him watch her bathe. But with the Cardinals falling behind in the National League pennant chase, hushed whispers of money troubles, and secrets swirling, Hank's life is turbulent.

It's hard not to love a boy who makes remarks such as "He [Puppy, Hank's grandfather] didn't like the Jordans because they were Methodists – and Cubs fans."

Another gem: "... Satan was waiting with the likes of Hitler and Judas Iscariot and General Grant," reminds this Yankee reader where and when this story is set.

As a Baptist, Luke makes very incisive yet innocent remarks about his church and the rival Methodists. He also reveals his crush on Tally through his innocence.

Trying to keep pace with all of the scandals and action, while the Chandlers try and beat both nature and the river to secure their crop, is a rewarding challenge.

Grisham should be applauded not just for trying a new style, but also for succeeding where many would fall flat.

Making a town come to life during a church service or a town baseball game, Grisham, through Luke, relates a charming story.

Don Little and the UMass offense will look to get back on track after being held under 10 goals for the first time this season aginst No. 2 Syracuse tenacious defender we have."

Add to the mix Paul "The Flash" Hutchen who has been the Minutemen's best clearing aid and Campolettano who is coming off a career game and UMass should have little trouble with the shallow Rutgers attack.

Switching to the other side of the ball, UMass will field one of the deepest and most dangerous attacks in college lacrosse.

Syracuse did something on Saturday that no other team has been able to accomplish all season – it held the Minutemen under 10 goals. That defensive gem by the Orangemen may end up being a nightmare for the Scarlet Knight defense as the Maroon and White will likely have a renewed hunger for twine.

Senior Rich Kunkel, who notched a hat trick on Saturday, leads the attack with 40 points. Second in scoring is sophomore Kevin Leveille with 19 goals and 34 points. The Delmar, N.Y. native is looking to rebound off his worst game of the season in which he was held to zero points by Cuse.

It would help the Minutemen if Leveille returned to his scoring ways but it may not make a difference. Teams such as Penn State, who UMass has beaten, have crushed Rutgers. Leveille's return to form would simply bode well for the team's immediate future.

This game holds more importance in terms of UMass' 2001 postseason aspirations. Many of the so-called 'experts' around college lacrosse are predicting the Maroon and White to be left out of tournament play as they were "blown out" 13-12 and 9-8 by G-Town and 'Cuse respectively.

Supposedly, Virginia (6-6) and Hofstra (UMass 17, Pride 13) deserve a bid more than the eighth-ranked Minutemen. UMass has a chance however, to prove all those critics right by losing to No. 19 Rutgers.

So to summarize the Maroon and White need to thrash the Knights and take care of business against Brown on Saturday. If it accomplishes that the Minutemen would finish 12-2 and even the most bias of critics would have trouble saying UMass is a not a proven college lacrosse team.

Rickey's view skilled untapped talent

COURTESY BASEBALL HALL OF FAME

BRANCH RICKEY

This is part five of a five-part series entitled "Magnates of the Game." Special thanks to the Baseball Hall of Fame for providing information and photographs that made this series possible.

Rube Foster's Negro League set the foundations for the integration of baseball. With so much talent left untapped, someone sooner or later was bound to bring it to the major leagues. It turned out that that man would be Branch Rickey, but his story started well before then.

Rickey was born in 1881, raised by his parents as a devout Ohio Methodist. In order to pay his way through college, at Ohio Wesleyan University, he would play baseball and football at the semipro level. As a young man, he made a promise to his mother that he would obey the Sabbath, and for the rest of his career he stayed away from the ballpark on Sundays.

In his time with Ohio Wesleyan, he was also the coach of the baseball team. On a trip to play Notre Dame, his star first baseman, Charles Thomas, was refused service in a South Bend hotel because he was black. After much cajoling, Rickey convinced the management to allow the young player to stay in Rickey's room. Later that night, he found the young man crying to his coach, "It's my skin, Mr. Rickey. If only I could make it white." The image stayed with the coach throughout his years.

After a brief playing career and earning a law degree, Rickey became an executive assistant with the St. Louis Browns in 1913. Soon after, he ascended the ranks to become general manager. By the end of the season, he was the manager on the field as well, a position he held until 1915, when he moved to the Browns' cross-town rivals, the Cardinals, where he served as club president and field manager.

When the World War I enveloped the country, Rickey, despite being in his mid-30s, he served as a major that included Hall of Famers Ty Cobb, Christy Mathewson, and George Sisler. At that time, the Cardinals could not compete with the other major teams in paying for superstars. So Rickey decided to breed his own stars. Before his time, the minor leagues would sell all their talent to the big leagues. Now, under Rickey's plan, the Major League teams would own the minor circuits. Rather than buying talent after players were fully developed, he could teach the essentials to players who he saw fit. By the time he was done, the Cardinals farm system had 33 teams.

But just as the Cards were on the cusp of greatness in 1925, the owner appointed Rogers Hornsby to take the reins as manager. Hornsby would lead the club to five National League pennants from 1926-34.

Rickey remained with St. Louis until 1942, when his contract came to an end. Without a thought, he moved quickly to Brooklyn, where he took over the reins as president and general manager. In addition, he purchased 25 percent of the team's stock.

In 1944, Kenesaw Mountain Landis died, and Rickey finally saw an avenue to integrate the National Pastime. In his tenure, Landis did not allow any owners to stack their teams with Negro Leaguers. When Bill Veeck attempted to buy the Phillies during World War II with the intension of stocking the team's roster with African Americans, Landis crushed the bid.

But after World War II, a war that was fought because of racial atrocities in other lands, it seemed tremendously hypocritical for a nation to discriminate on its own. Rickey sought to integrate the game.

On Oct. 23, 1945 Rickey began the Civil Rights movement by signing Jack Roosevelt Robinson, a second baseman for the Kansas City Monarchs. After Robinson led Montreal to a Minor League title, he was up with the Dodgers for the 1947 season. On April 15, 1947 baseball finally became "the National Pastime" as Jackie Robinson took second base at Ebbets Field wearing the number 42.

Rickey stayed in the front office until 1950, when he was pushed out of the job by owner Walter O'Malley. He moved on to Pittsburgh, where he helped lay the foundation for the Pirates 1960 World Series team. He also was the main proponent of the Pirates drafting Roberto Clemente.

In 1965, just short of his 84th birthday, the man who integrated baseball died. Two years later, he was elected to the Hall of Fame, where he is now joined by fellow magnates Alexander Joy Cartwright, Harry Wright, Ban Johnson and Rube Foster. In 100 years, baseball had developed from a game played exclusively by amateurs into a sport that in many ways dictated social change.

Had it not been for these five men, baseball would not be what it is today; possibly the most beautiful and perfect thing that was created by American culture.

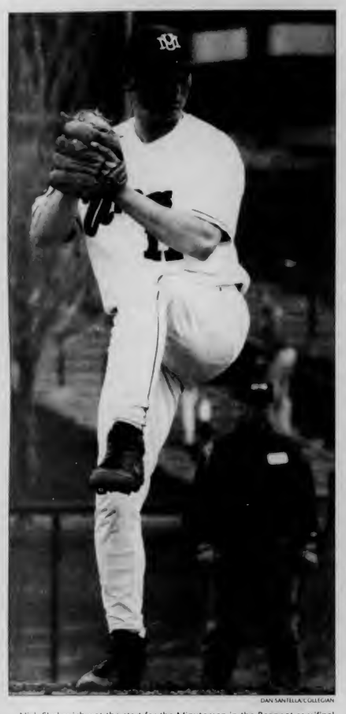
All beans in pot at Fenway final



Nick Skirkanich got the start for the Minutemen in the Beanpot semifinal but was victimized by poor defense...

BOSTON – One down, one to go.

The Massachusetts baseball team narrowly escaped the first round of the Beanpot Tournament yesterday afternoon, defeating Harvard University 9-8 at Fenway Park to advance to today's championship game against Boston College.

The Minutemen (17-15, 8-5 Atlantic 10) overcame a two-run deficit in the bottom of the ninth to cement the victory, having blown a three-run edge in the top of the frame. Sophomore catcher Tom Ellerbrook knocked in the winning run, dropping a one-out bunt with the bases loaded to drive home third baseman Aaron Senez for the win.

"It just feels great to win this game and get to the championship," Ellerbrook said. "To beat Harvard, especially after they beat us (21-11 on April 24) just feels great."

Both teams got off to a sluggish start, as UMass notched a single run in the bottom of the second to open the scoring. Senior Gavin Clark ripped a one-out triple off the Green Monster, and was handed a ticket home two batters later, as freshman shortstop Cullan Maumus sent a sacrifice fly to deep left, giving the Minutemen an early 1-0 edge.

The Crimson would knot things up two innings later, pouncing on the second of four Maroon and White errors to send home their first run.

Third baseman Nick Carter began the top of the fourth with a single to short off starter Nick Skirkanich. Catcher Brian Lentz took first on a costly error by the UMass infield, which brought Carter all the way around to tie things at one.

"It was sloppy, with what, four errors?" coach Mike Stone said. "It was just sloppy. We're making things too exciting."

Skirkanich did his best to settle the defense, but was stirred by a Crimson offense that, while not dominant on this afternoon, simply refused to go away.

"We wanted to have him give us some good innings because we need to save him for the weekend," Stone said. "He pitched well, and got us to the point where we could use [Eric] Chown for a few, and then [Jesse] Santos. It worked out well."

The Crimson dug the Minutemen into a deeper hole in the top of the fifth. After Skirkanich began the inning with six consecutive strikes, the righty yielded two singles to Mark Mager and Joe Llanes, ultimately sending the pair home on back-to-back wild pitches to give Harvard the 3-1 advantage.

The Minutemen finally found a rhythm in the sixth, however, scoring three to grab hold of a lead that would last into the ninth.

Senez sent a 'Lorden homerun' deep into center, doubling off the monster to spark the rally. Clark followed suit with a two-bagger of his own, scoring Senez to pull the Minutemen to within a run. After Clark came home off the bat of designated hitter Mike Kulak, the Maroon and White saw itself on the other side of the mirror as Maumus took his base on an error by the right fielder that scored Kulak. Maumus would account for the go-ahead run, as Ellerbrook wrapped a single down the left field line to put UMass up 4-3.

The Minutemen tacked on additional runs in both the seventh and eighth innings to climb out to the comfortable 6-3 lead; however, following a questionable pitching change by Stone, the Crimson would explode for five unanswered runs in the top of the ninth, suddenly turning what should have been an easy 1-2-3 inning into a game.

Carter sent a two-run single into left, scoring Mager and Llanes to tie things at six. Faced with a two-out, man on situation, Lentz ripped a homer into the net over the left field wall to put Harvard up 8-6 and force the Minutemen to exercise their last three outs.

"I guess maybe i should have left Chown in there a little longer," said Stone of the decision to remove the freshman. "I felt good about going to Santos, because he had been pitching well; he'd been coming with a little more juice. We got down, but then won in an exciting way. It was good."

Senior Nick Gorneault led off the crucial frame with a single to left, and was followed onto the base paths by first baseman Jeff Altieri, who took a pitch to the body. Senez reached on a fielder's choice to load the bases. Carter, who moved to the mound for Harvard in the ninth, intentionally walked Kulak, and then sent Maumus to first on four pitches, forcing in pinch runner Colin Barden to tie the game at eight. With the bases again loaded, Ellerbrook dropped a bunt to squeeze in Senez and hand the Minutemen the victory.

Santos earned the victory in relief for the Maroon and White, improving to 5-3 on the season.

The Minutemen face Boston College in this afternoon's championship game, scheduled for a 2 p.m. start.

"It's a championship game against a good ball club," Stone said. "This is where we want to be. If we play a solid game, we'll have our opportunities to win."

... but Aaron Senez scored the winning run in the bottom of the ninth and the Minutemen moved on to the Beanpot final.

Minutemen set to joust with Knights

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team is in the tub. The Minutemen are not the most content residents of the NCAA tournament bubble bath but with national powers Georgetown and Syracuse in its review mirror, UMass will gladly accept its No. 8 ranking and move on to New Jersey.

As they travel down route 95 the Minutemen will have only one person on their mind – no not "The Boss," Bruce Springsteen, they will be thinking about Keith Cromwell.

UMass has faced some of the nation's best scorers so far this season – Michael Powell (Syracuse), Kevin Pall (Stony Brook), Brian Hunt (Yale) Tom Kessler (Hobart), Will Driscoll (Penn State), Steve Dusseau (G-Town) and Adam Bonz (Navy) – but few even approach the offensive talent help by Rutgers' Cromwell.

The senior All-American has been absolutely unstoppable through 11 games this year. With 25 goals and 26 assists Cromwell is not only one of the country's best attackmen, he is the consummate complete player.

Ask Maryland-Baltimore County how balanced his game is – Cromwell lit up the Retrievers with six assists in a 10-7 Scarlet Knight victory. Also a member of the witness protection is Delaware. Cromwell had the UD defenders running around like Hens with no heads, as he dropped a hat trick and seven points on the visitors from the "First State."

Cromwell is the well-deserved frontrunner for the coveted Tewaaraton Award (Lacrosse's Heisman) presented yearly to the top college player in the country. His ascending status among college lacrosse's elite is certainly merited with his 51 points and second ranked 4.64 points per game average.

So how will the Maroon and White defense stop the talented senior from taking over today's matinee? Simple, don't get caught looking. You can't stop Keith Cromwell, but you can butcher the rest of his teammates. UMBC made the mistake of keying on Cromwell and forgetting about his teammates. The All-American then proceeded to dish out six assists as the Retrievers fell to the Scarlet Knights.

What the Minutemen need to do is shut down the other five players on offense, and with their balanced back line UMass should have no problem doing that.

The Maroon and White boast a very strong and very fast defense that held the ultra powerful Syracuse attack to nine goals just four days ago. All-America candidate Matt McFarland and Tom Fallon represent the strength of the UMass 'D,' as each stand at 6-3 plus and both tip the scales at over 210 pounds.

Senior captain Chris Gabrielli is easily the most talented thorn on the squad. He may not look the part at a diminutive 5-10, 170 pounds but ask any attackman that has faced him and they will probably echo the statements of goaltender Chris Campolettano: "He is the most

Degnan remains critical

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Thomas Degnan, the 20-year-old Baker resident who received life-threatening injuries following his 35-foot fall from the roof of Butterfield Dormitory is still listed in critical condition.

In an attempt to retrieve a pirate flag from the roof of the building on April 27, Degnan slipped as he made his way back into the building and fell onto a concrete patio on the first floor of the building. Police arrived on the scene at approximately 2:15 a.m. along with the Amherst Fire Department ambulance personnel. He was transported by helicopter to Baystate

"We are obviously very concerned about the incident,"
-Jim Lyons, spokesman

Medical Center when he remains in the intensive care unit. He recently underwent exploratory surgery to access the extent of the injuries he suffered in the fall.

"We are obviously very concerned about the incident," Jim Lyons spokesman for the University of Massachusetts Police Department said. "Falls [from UMass buildings] are fairly rare."

Lyons explained that although there have been reports of students walking on buildings this semester, that the last major incident that involved a fall that resulted in a critical injury or death was the death of Adam G. Prentice in 1997.

In the early morning hours of September 27, 1997 21-year-old Prentice was found dead after falling through the glass roof of Morill Science Center Greenhouse and losing massive amounts of blood. Toxicology reports confirmed that Prentice was intoxicated at the time of his death and that he had a blood alcohol level of 0.12.

Toxicology reports have yet to confirm whether or not Degnan was intoxicated at the time of the incident, the reports may not be in for an additional two to three weeks.

In a strikingly similar incident, 20-year-old Boston University sophomore Benjamin Johnson plummeted to his death while trying to climb onto to roof on the School of Communication Building. Johnson fell from the third floor fire escape on the rear of the building and died on impact with the metal grating.

Johnson and three of his friends decided to scale the building with a grappling hook in order to display a flag with a swastika on it from the roof. Johnson lost his grip of the hook attached to a parapet and fell 30 feet to his death.

Following the fall, Johnson's friends called the Boston University Police Department and two officers arrived and tried to revive him. He was pronounced dead at the scene at 3:55 a.m.

His friends are currently being questioned about the incident by the police; however, no charges have been brought up against any of the parties as of yet.

In an incident that is being heralded as a miracle, infant Sean Beattie fell out of a window on Monday and survived unharmed. The child, who turns two next month, fell out of a third story window in Dorchester onto an unpaved driveway 35 feet below at approximately 9:45 a.m. He received only minor bruises and scrapes and did not break anything in the fall.

UMass at night

TISHRA GURZYNSKI-BLOM AND SCOTT ELDRIDGE/COLLEGIAN

Soothing the soul on Orchard Hill, Basketball under the moonlight at the Horseshoe, Practice or performance on the grass, Showcase of snacks in Southwest, The iridescent glow of campus at night, Preparing Midnight Munchies.

"Have you ever danced with the devil in the pale moonlight?" The Joker, Batman.

Neither have most of the people interviewed for this story. Rather than find the kind of pale wraiths who live only for the night, we attempted to find those who enjoy the University of Massachusetts at night. Be it sitting on Orchard Hill and looking at the stars, or bending the rim closest to Coolidge dorm in Southwest.

At night, UMass takes on an otherworldly quality, experiencing a total redefinition of what a university really truly is. Not just the place of book-learning, UMass is where the youth of today become the adults of tomorrow and at least some of that learning happens during the nights spent on the UMass campus. Getting high on Orchard Hill, making sandwiches for an entire housing area, playing basketball, avoiding studies. Maybe avoiding studies is one the most important aspects of this story.

Because no university is entirely what the students study, but rather, it is the proving ground for a life, a chance to try the things that haven't been tried before and talk about the things that haven't been talked about before.

This feature is perhaps our most stark contrast to date; in an attempt to look at the lives of students, this story looks as far from the classroom as we could get while confining ourselves to the UMass campus. This story looks at only five of the different aspects of UMass at night: basketball in Southwest, students in Central and Orchard Hill, students, fraternity parties, student workers and Club Sidewalk uptown.

There is far more to cover, but that is for a different article at some undetermined later date. But bathed in orange shadows, we present UMass at night.

-Sam Wilkinson

Nighttime in the living areas

As the sun slowly sinks down behind the tall trees lining the lawn of the Chancellor's House, Orchard Hill students immerge from their dorm rooms and venture for a stroll in the cool spring air or begin to play baseball in the central, grassy Bowl.

Some indulge in a hot fudge sundae from Sweets, a reward for the day's crunches. Students waiting for the line to die down linger in the shop's colorfully decorated seating area or watch television or play pool in the adjacent lounge.

Some students follow a more traditional evening route, draining shots in a game of moonlit basketball. Some engage in a drunken flailing of arms in the middle of the Bowl, yelling obscenities.

However they pass the time, the students up on the hills around Orchard Hill and Central know that nightfall doesn't mean the end of the day. They unglue their eyes from their computers and television screens, hastily put their laundry into a washing machine to allow technology to do its work, and engage in some good old recreation.

The sun sets at around 8 p.m. on this Tuesday, and Wiffleball games are still occurring sporadically in the Bowl. People are outside on the balconies, smoking, studying or just relaxing, yelling down to the people in the Bowl or across to the balconies of the other three buildings. Remnants of toilet paper still dangle from the trees surrounding the bowl. The pipe construction in the area still leaves mounds of dirt and rubble, caged in by unattractive chain link fences. On the hill alongside and in back of the Grayson/Field building, anywhere from two to five sets of students can be seen tossing a Frisbee back and forth underneath the bright, orange lights that illuminate the area.

By now, the big groups are all back from the DC, so it's just evening-walkers and the occasional biker that enters the bowl area. The jockeying for parking spots in the lots closest to the buildings takes place throughout the night; few vehicles lucky enough to sport a Lot 49 sticker resign to the upper lot without a fight.

If the clouds choose to open up during the night, expect to see inhibitions thrown to the wayside. A noisy, boisterous, and beautiful circus of mudslinging, mudsliding and puddle jumping commences in the Bowl, the predestined result of which is the locking of all floor lounges by sometimes-reluctant RAs. The cops have visited these gatherings a few times in the past, but the real show-stoppers are the inevitable streakers (always and lamentably male) who run blaze through or circle the Bowl with their buck nakedness.

On this night, however, soccer and Frisbee continues on the hill behind the buildings. Smokers on the balconies overlook the visitors on the Hill, ranging from a couple stargazing to a group of more than twenty enjoying the cool night air. The sounds of Bob Marley pour out from dorm windows as a football is passed back and forth on the basketball court.

"It's an inspirational atmosphere," said one such stargazer, sophomore STPEA major Katie Tident. She's sitting on the cool grass with two friends, the smell of a barbecue and the sound of drums tugging at their senses. "People are out here all night, the bongos especially," Tident said.

Indoors is usually the place to go on the hill for solitude, for reading and studying, meetings or snacks. "It's really quiet (usually so) I can get my stuff done," sophomore Computer Science major Dan Tehranian said. When not studying, however, Dan is partial to harassing kickboxing groups in Dickinson Hall with his own martial arts demonstrations.

Indoors actives keep students busy who do not wish to take advantage of the pleasant weather outside. Resident Advisers (RA) sometimes set up workshops for people to attend, such as the most recent Swing Into Spring program, held on Tuesday, May 2nd at 7 p.m. in the Field classroom.

This workshop, set up as a prelude to the Spring Fling Dance held last night in Student Union Ballroom, taught the Swing and Cha-cha dance steps and lingo to all willing to learn.

Freshmen political science major April Flowers explained how her RA asked Chris Dreschler-Martell and Monique Beaudoin of the University of Massachussettes Ballroom Team to provide these lessons for the hour-long program. "It was a small thing with anywhere between 10 and 15 people showing up, but it was fun," noted Flowers.

Sociology major and security receptionist Alex Olee is much inside working on this night, but passes the time with The Te of Piglet. If she were outside, she may visit the woods between Orchard Hill and Sylvan, where she likes to look at the sky.

Also an employee of student security, Flowers mentioned that shifts last from until midnight during most of the week to as late as 3:00 a.m. on Friday and Saturday nights.

As these students are responsible as to who can and cannot enter the dorm buildings, they can engage in only minimal activity.

"Sometimes I listen to music or do homework, just as long as it's not too distracting," Flowers commented. "At least [the job] let's me do what I need to do."

Students outside the Greenough sub shop talk and study, while inside Comparative Literature major Lori Latimer and BDIC major Alexandra Burton work in the kitchen. They are friendly people, and willing to take on even the most meticulously requested grilled cheese order.

The night creates a laid-back informal community on the hill, undisturbed by heat or an oppressive sun. Live music, gatherings around a grill, smells emanating from the legal and illegal, light swatting at bugs; the feeling is that one can stroll through the area and be welcomed into any group, without hesitation.

"People always smile and they treat you well," junior Computer Science major Dave Miller said. "I know everyone's name out here."

Miller regrets that there aren't more people outside, but praises the attitude of nightlife on the hill, and comments on the sounds.

"We always have people making music," Miller said, "with an instrument or not."

The jovial atmosphere of the hill at night pushes up the darkness a little, and fosters a vibrant but muted community of playfulness and welcoming, a place where Van Morrison noticed that "the night's magic seems to whisper and hush."

-Michael Delano and Jennifer Eastwood

Night moves: running "The Shoe"

Wherever you find serious basketball players, you'll inevitably find "the court."

It's where a jury of your peers judges you on your b-ball skills, and where the verdict is always hoops of the highest common denominator.

It's places like the Rucker Courts in Harlem, where legends tell of Earl "The Goat" Manigault plucking dollar bills off the top of the backboard from a standing jump. Places like "The Cage" on Sixth Ave. in Greenwich Village, immortalized in countless shoe commercials as NYC's premiere fight school.

At UMass, it's the Horseshoe Court in Southwest.

Hallowed roundball ground like this doesn't go quiet when the sun goes down, either. Lights high above crackle to life, sweeping away the long shadows of dusk and washing The Shoe's dual courts in a pale artificial glow. The hardcore hoop heads who have been shooting all afternoon welcome the coolness that night brings, even if it makes the ball a little harder to see.

"I'm out here damned near every night," said William Shivers, a sophomore communications major who lives in nearby John Quincy Adams. "I come out at night 'cuz I don't want to get burnt up anymore."

Refuge from the big ball in the sky has its price in Southwest, however. The courts there aren't in the best of shape to begin with, and the spotty lighting makes the bent rims and cracked asphalt even tougher to negotiate. A simple bounce pass can go careening off course when it hits a bad spot on the court; one entire basket is shrouded in shadow just beyond the reach of the lights.

Nate Johnson doesn't understand the sorry state that Southwest's courts are in. The sophomore points to a dilapidated chain net barely hanging onto one rim and marvels at the fact that it was brand new only three days earlier.

"You'd figure that a school this big would have money to fix up these courts," Johnson said. "These are sorry. They should renovate the whole thing – put up new rims, pave it and everything."

But the less-than-ideal playing conditions don't keep Johnson from hitting the courts whenever the urge strikes. From his room on the 18th floor of JQA, the sport management major has a good enough view of the courts to size up the competition before he even laces up his sneakers.

"I just look out my window," Johnson said. "If I see good players out here, I'll come out."

Just how good are the players who typically run the racks in Southwest? It's the general consensus that The Shoe is the only game around at UMass, at least when it comes to night ball. It is not at all uncommon for groups of players to hit the courts in the dead of night, running half-court games or just shooting around out under the stars.

"Me and my friends come out around one or two in the morning, just to play, horse and stuff," said Michael Meagher, a freshman pre-journalism major who moved from Sylvan to John Adams in search of a more exciting living area. "There are usually some pretty good games, especially if the basketball players are out here."

Meagher is referring to the actual UMass men's hoop team, several members of which are known to make appearances on the Southwest courts. Often the Minutemen are only looking for a quiet place to get in some casual practice, but instead find themselves locking horns with street-ballers eager to prove their abilities against the best possible competition.

"Me and a few other guys on the team used to go out there and try to just play low key," said junior forward Eric Williams, whose 6-foot-8, 240-pound frame makes him an awfully big target for wannabe hoop stars. "Guys get all serious when we're out there, jumping all over me and trying really hard to get the ball. I don't really go out there much anymore, just because I'm afraid I'm going to get hurt."

Those overeager competitors tell a different story of their experiences against the Minutemen, however.

"We be runnin' the basketball players out here," said senior Gary Fisher, a Coolidge resident. "Make sure you print that."

But even if he can't keep the b-ball upstarts away, Williams still finds time to shoot around undisturbed at The Shoe – at night, during the summer, when most of the students are long gone.

It is then that the big man has the cracked courts all to himself, and can bury his everyday frustrations under the rattle of a bent rim and the jingle of a chain net.

"During the summer it's a nice place for me to relax," said Williams, who thinks the courts should be covered with a dome to protect against the elements. "When I stress, I go outside at night and just shoot."

– Adam White

A night at the fraternities

Fraternity parties. The majority of freshmen find fraternity parties to be their typical weekend evening activities because of the fact that they offer a within-walking-distance alternative to the typical off-campus parties.

Going into a fraternity party, the first thing that you notice is the excessively loud music. Many people notice this on the street, as the fraternity house of their choice seems to be vibrating from the music. As you walk through the door and hand over $2-3, you are moved into a very dark, generally smoky atmosphere. At the beginning of a fraternity party, around 10 p.m. or 11 p.m., the different rooms are generally not overly crowded. As time passes, the crowd slowly, and then quickly thickens, to the point where there are less than six inches between you and the people around you.

As the night wears on, many beers are handed out and the majority of them are not watched over very carefully. Many of the partiers that don't make it home successfully find themselves stoned or drunk and passed out on the couches, in individual rooms, and even on the grass outside.

Justin Kennedy, president of Alpha Tau Gamma, explained that there are many reasons why fraternities decide to throw parties and different styles of throwing them. Some parties are open, allowing all interested students to attend while others are invitation only. "Other fraternities throw parties for different reasons, including making money," Kennedy said. "We don't have open parties for multiple reasons, rohypnol being one of them."

According to Kennedy, the infamous date rape drug rohypnol (or "roofies") poses a high risk at open parties. "A woman can put down her beer, light a cigarette, and pick up her beer with enough time for something to happen to [her beer]." The members of most fraternities try to keep a close eye on everything during open parties, but it is impossible to monitor the whole event constantly.

To try to limit the amount of negative activity within the fraternity house, the upstairs is kept blocked. The upstairs is only open to the actual fraternity brothers and to the ladies who need to use the bathroom. Other than that, it is off limits.

Kennedy felt that in general, fraternities are a safe place for a single female to go to on a Friday or Saturday night. "You don't go to a party alone," he said. "You always go with a group of friends, so that just in case something does happen, there will be somebody there for you."

No Rest for the Willie

Yes, the lobby of the Campus Center Hotel is about as quiet as a tomb at midnight on a weekday. But there's no rest for the weary, or in this case the Willie.

Despite the lack of traffic shuffling through the carpeted lobby, desk clerk Willie Pope is busy answering the phone, tending to the needs of guests and shuffling through piles of paperwork. The junior sport management major has manned the hotel's front desk for two years, and knows that the silence around him in anything but a signal to relax and doze off.

"There's always plenty to keep me busy, even at times like this," Pope said. A mere four days earlier he battled a tide of guests in town for the Haigis Hoopla tournament, a group that provided plenty of lobby activity right up until five in the morning. When campus RSOs put on concerts or conferences in the building, or when a popular artist is rocking the Skybox upstairs, the hotel becomes a buzzing hive of activity.

"It all depends on what's happening in this building or around campus," Pope said. "The building closes at one, but a lot of the guests are still out on the town at that time."

In the meantime, Pope busies himself with the various tasks that keep the hotel running smoothly. Five times a week he conducts a nightly audit, balancing all the establishment's financial transactions. It is not as if Pope is all alone, either; he has the building's security and maintenance personnel stopping by occasionally to keep him company.

"Surprisingly, there's not a lot of down time," Pope said. "This place may seem like nothing's going on, but I stay busy pretty much all night."

Club Sidewalk

Fact: The bars and clubs in Amherst close at 1 a.m.

Well, that's not exactly a fact.

"Club Sidewalk," as it's called is actually the exception to many rules. It doesn't close at 1a.m. It does not serve alcohol. It's not inside in a packed room with a tiny roof. It is the only all-ages club around. Club Sidewalk is able to pull this off because it is actually not a club at all. It doesn't even exist.

If you don't know what club sidewalk is, or have never been there, It's the strip of area in that spans outside from Antonio's Pizza to Bart's Ice Cream Shop in uptown Amherst. The walkway gets exceedingly crowded every Thursday, Friday and Saturday evening after the bars have emptied out.

The area seems to serve several purposes. Since friends tend to wander and groups split apart, it is a rendezvous point for people who have gone to various bars throughout the night. Seeing as the bars in Amherst tend to attract different crowds, club sidewalk is inclined to be a place where you will see everyone. If you missed something (or someone) at the bars, it will probably pop up on the curb.

Perhaps the main reason that club sidewalk is so popular is because Antonio's Pizza serves food until 1:45 a.m. At any given time between 12:30 a.m. and 2:00 a.m. a line protrudes out of the front door of the pizza place, and "hot cheese up front," will be emanating from the front.

Walter Pacheco, a manager at Antonio's said that club sidewalk is the only reason that the pizza business stays open at night on the weekends. "If it weren't for the bars, we wouldn't be open that late," he explained. "It's really nice to see so many people out there having a good time."

One major benefit that club sidewalk has, that other places in Amherst do not, is that anyone can go to it. If you are not old enough to attend the bars, and have no reason to be uptown late at night, it is open to everyone. Even if you have spent a night at the movie theater, or just hanging out in the residence halls, It is still a place you can go afterwards to get food from Antonio's or the sausage vendor outside as a way to round up the evening.

If there is one downside to club sidewalk, it is certainly the amount of people it attracts. With a lot of people, there could also be a lot of aggravated situations. According to Sergeant Jennifer Gundersen of the Amherst Police Department, fights and arrests are not uncommon at club sidewalk. The huge steel barriers put up by the Amherst police department preventing people from staggering into the streets are an indication of the extra security that is always on tap.

"Concerns are overcrowding, pedestrians running into traffic, fighting, public intoxication," Gundersen said. "During bar closing we'll have anywhere between two to four officers assigned to the center. It does require extra attention to keep the safety of the town, people and property."

Club Sidewalk may be the one of the only alcohol-free parties in town, but it's certainly one of the most intensely inebriating places as well.//Though it may be a fact that the bars close at 1 a.m. the fun never stops.

Arms sales anger China

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The People's Republic of China has released a statement chastising the United States's government for approving the sale of several ships, planes, and weapons systems to Taiwan.

The statement, which summarizes comments by Vice Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing, was released last week after the U.S. decided to sell advanced weapons and equipment to Taiwan, including four Kidd-class destroyers, eight diesel-powered submarines, and 12 P-3C Orion submarine-hunting aircraft.

"This wrong decision made by the U.S. side marked an escalation in Its arms sales to Taiwan, which constitutes a flagrant violation of the three Sino-U.S. joint communiqués, especially the one signed on August 17, 1982, and an open provocation to China's sovereignty and territorial integrity," the statement reads. "The U.S. act can only further the arrogance of pro-Taiwan independence forces to split China, intensify the tension across the Taiwan Straits, and harm peace and stability in the Asia-Pacific region."

The agreement mentioned is the United States-China Joint Communiqué on Arms Sales to Taiwan, which laid out the basis for modern Sino-U.S relations. The part China is referring to concerns the quality of arms sold to Taiwan.

"The United States Government states that it does not seek to carry out a long-term policy of arms sales to Taiwan, that its arms sales to Taiwan will not exceed, either in qualitative or in quantitative terms, the level of those supplied in recent years since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and China," the agreement reads. "It [the United States] intends to reduce gradually its sales of arms to Taiwan, leading over a period of time to a final resolution. In so stating, the United States acknowledges China's consistent position regarding the thorough settlement of this issue."

China asserts that the recent sale violates this agreement.

The central problem of Taiwan, which the People's Republic views as a rebellious province, is also a factor in the Bush administration's push for a national missile defense.

"The question of Taiwan has always been the most important and sensitive issue at the core of the China-US relations. The Chinese Government and people are resolute in their determination to safeguard its sovereignty and territorial integrity and no one should miscalculate," a spokesman for the PRC's Foreign Ministry said. "It is a blunt provocation of China's sovereignty and territorial integrity, further gives rise to the 'Taiwan's independence' force and undermines peace and stability across the Taiwan straits. The Chinese Government and people express their strong indignation and opposition towards it." Other developments point toward further breakdowns in Sino-U.S. affairs.

In a move that signals a deterioration of relations, the United States is reviewing military ties with the People's Republic of China. Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz ordered that all black berets, ordered to celebrate the Army's birthday on June 14, be "disposed of."

"The Army Chief of Staff has determined that U.S. troops shall not wear berets made in China or berets made with Chinese content," Wolfowitz said in a Defense memo. "Therefore, I direct the Army and the Defense Logistics Agency to take appropriate action to recall previously distributed berets and dispose of the stock."

SGA passes budget

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The S-1 Student Activities Trust Fund Budget Act, the most important motion of the year, was passed last night by the Student Government Association Senate.

The motion to ratify next years SATF budget, however, caused much controversy as well as questions throughout the Senate. The meeting began with an announcement by Senator René Gonzalez arguing the constitutionality of the budget. Gonzalez accused the Ways and Means committee of giving more funding to groups of their particular interests. He continued to claim that the budget distribution was unfair and robbing Registered Student Organizations of accurate funding.

"The whole thing is corrupt, plain and simple," Gonzalez. "It's an insult to the students and I think that an investigation into UPC [University Productions and Concerts] Is in order."

Issues surrounding the budgets allocation of funding to UPC sparked many questions among Senators. However, Mike Taugher, the chair of the Ways and Means Committee, responded by explaining that UPC took a budget cut, not an increase in funding.

"I'm somewhat disheartened that you're all coming up with concerns and questions tonight," Taugher explained. "Our meetings have been totally open, no one showed up, no one asked me any questions, so when you bitch about the budget keep that in mind."

After numerous questions directed towards Taugher, members of the Senate, and constituents. Speaker Mike McCarthy called for the need for debate. However, Senators failed to raise their hands, thus the decision went to vote. This caused much concern and outrage amongst Senators who claimed that McCarthy did not acknowledge their need for debate.

"When McCarthy asked for a need to debate people said yes," Gonzalez said. "I had no idea you had to raise your hand, and I think it was undemocratic that we did not get to voice our opinions. We had a lot of evidence that we wanted to debate, and how could we do this when we were silenced."

McCarthy disagreed with Gonzalez stating that he asked for debate and no one raised their hands.

"I asked for the need to debate twice and no one raised their hands," McCarthy said. "I was surprised because they should know that this is standard procedure. I did everything by the book and If they disagree with me they can take It up with the Student Judiciary."

Aside from the commotion and a proposed motion to overrule McCarthy the budget went to a vote and was passed by a majority of the Senate.

"This has been a year long process and to have a committee put so much work into It and to see It pass gives me a lot of satisfaction," Taugher said. "I think it's unfortunate that certain people didn't like the budget, but they didn't take the time to contribute to it."

The meeting ended shortly after leaving next week's meeting to be the last Senate meeting of the semester. Next week's meeting will hold elections for Speaker and Associate Speaker of the Senate and will be at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center.

Dangerous Haigas Hoopla
Student arrested for role in altercation

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Hagis Hoopla, last weekend's three-on-three basketball tournament, kept the University of Massachusetts Police Department busy with a bevy of injuries and crime.

On Sunday during the tournament there was the report of a possible assault in lot 32 at approximately 12:00 p.m. during a game at the tournament.

Jim Lyons, the spokesman for the UMPD, explained that the simple assault and battery did not occur in the presence of a police officer.

The individual would have to attend a right to show cause hearing in order to press charges. The alleged victim had visible injuries to his face as a result of the incident.

A similar incident occurred on Saturday afternoon at approximately 4:45 p.m. when a fight occurred in lot 34 on one of the basketball courts. An individual reported a fight on the court, when the officer arrived on the scene the fight had already ended. No one involved wanted to press charges and the officer cleared the scene and the basketball games continued. There was no need for further action.

Several injuries during the course of the weekend also required the attention of both the police and required other medical assistance. On Saturday at approximately 3:45 p.m. there was a reported shoulder injury in lot 34 during a basketball game.

The dislocated shoulder was taken care of by EMTs that were at the scene at the time and an ambulance was called for the individual. A trainer on the scene also treated the individual and transported him to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton by car.

A second incident occurred later that day when an individual injured his leg while playing basketball in lot 34. The player reportedly fractured leg and was transported by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

Officers were dispatched to lot 32 following the report of a serious wrist injury that occurred mid-play during one of the games.

"The individual went up for a rebound, flipped and came back down on his hand," Lyons said. "It seems like a fairly serious injury with a compound fracture to the wrist."

The individual was transported by ambulance to the hospital where he was treated for his injuries.

The New Balance Hagis Hoopla, the largest three-on-three basketball tournament began in 1991 as an event put on by the UMass Sport Management Department. The event, which originally drew 1,000 spectators and 100 teams to the competition, had by 1999 expanded to include 476 teams and 14,000 spectators. The event is both student organized and student run. The event itself featured six divisions over 1,800 participants and was entirely non-profit.

On hand at the two day event was both officers from the UMPD and an athletic trainer to deal with any problems requiring police intervention and to handle any injuries.

Racist action?

Army's regrettable decision

For several months, especially since George W. Bush has taken office, relations between China and the U.S. have taken a decided turn for the worse. There is, however, no excuse for a recent U.S. Army action that crosses the line from hostile to simply xenophobic.

The shooting down of the U.S. surveillance plane. The blowing up of Chinese embassy. Missiles over Taiwan, missiles for Taiwan. A missile defense system.

These have all been events that have added to the tension. Some have been violent, some claimed as accidental, some acts of outright aggression. They have, however, all been fairly above the board, fairly standard acts of high-stakes international diplomacy.

This changed this past Tuesday night when the Army announced that it was recalling any and all berets distributed to the Army that had been made in China.

Evidently, in a push to make the Army uniform with black berets for all but the most elite troops by a certain deadline, the Army was forced to go to foreign producers to meet the demand. China was among those foreign nations, but not the only one.

"The Army Chief of Staff has determined that U.S. troops shall not wear berets made in China or berets made with Chinese content. Therefore, I direct the Army and the Defense Logistics Agency to take appropriate action to recall previously distributed berets and dispose of the stock," read the statement issued to the press.

This is wrong on so many levels.

We are not arguing that the U.S. Army should not buy American. We are not arguing that, if the Army deems it necessary, that it should not recall its goods. What we are saying, however, is that this current recall is nothing less than racist.

We may have a state of tension with the People's Republic of China, but that does not make every Chinese on this planet an evil person. It does not make Chinese goods tainted.

By recalling these berets and not those of other countries, we are sending a direct signal to China and the Chinese people that we are not going to treat them equally no matter what they do. Does the Army really believe that these items of clothing are equipped with spy cameras or designed to not correctly block the sun? And anything with Chinese 'content'? Does that mean that nothing that comes out of China is acceptable?

This bigoted and racist action can only fuel that flames that are already threatening the world. It is too late to take back the damage that this has done to our relations with China, or the message of worthlessness it may be sending to Chinese-Americans. All we can do is deplore this sort of xenophobia and hope that our leaders in government will all wake up and come to their senses soon.

I learn?

ROB SCHULZE

Things that I have learned in this, my junior year:

Southwest is better than anywhere else on campus, but off-campus is better than Southwest.

Cold weather makes people bitchy. Nice weather makes people stupid. I prefer nice weather.

I still prefer rock music. So there.

Breaking a heart doesn't suck nearly as much as having your own heart broken, but it still sucks. I don't recommend it.

There are two types of great classes. The first kind is the one that is extremely challenging and interesting. They're harder than hell and you don't always get quite what's going on, but you want to show up every day, and you kind of like studying for those killer exams. You get a lot out of these classes. A great example of this is Professor Gordon's European Enlightenment class (History 307), which I highly recommend to anyone who wants to get his ass kicked twice a week while thoroughly enjoying it. The other kind is the class where there is no attendance taken at the huge lectures, there is only a final and a midterm (both take-home), and you can coast by on attending about a third of the classes and cramming the readings in the night before you do the take-home test. Everything in the middle lacks the simple charm of these extremes.

When she leaves you, get over it. After a while it just gets old, and when you finally do come back to human reality you'll realize just how silly you were. She probably wasn't as good as you thought anyways.

There's no way in hell I'm ever going to support a war against China. Suck on that, Mr. President. P.S. You're a racist.

Drink two good beers, then switch to Coors Light or whatever cheap crap happens to be on hand.

Professors like students who fit their preconceived notion of how a student should look. The majority of them, however, will see below the surface, if you give them a reason to.

Being an RA would be a hell of a lot easier if they just gave you a taser and blanket permission to use it against 1) the drunk and 2) the stupid.

Being an RA would also be a hell of a lot easier if the UMPD didn't act like it was some huge waste of time when you call them because of marijuana in the dorms. About, oh, nine out of ten times they will act like it's the biggest load of crap in the world that you would dare make them come all the way to Southwest for something as trivial as, oh, illegal drug use in the dorms. It's like a surgeon getting pissy and yelling at the patient every time they have appendicitis.

The right girl makes everything all right. And just when you think it couldn't possibly get any better, it does. Strange.

If we took a poll of the UMass student body and asked them to name the Amherst Regional High School team name, not nearly enough would be able to. Students act too much like tourists and not enough like people who actually live here.

It's the Hurricanes.

This may, in fact, be the best place in the world to go out for breakfast. Stables, Dove's Nest, Nancy Jane's, Sugar Shack... the list is endless. I never liked eggs until this year. Now my cholesterol is through the roof, and I get Bagel Risers from the Coffee Shop for lunch with alarming regularity.

Can't hold back. When you feel it's your time, you gotta go for it, because even if you don't get it it's better than being old and wondering 'what if.'

I painted my toenails just because it bothers you. And that's reason enough for me.

Some English majors are very, very intelligent, and the rest think that they are.

As your friends grow up, leave college, and become adults, you realize that it doesn't change anything. They're still your friends. They just have to dress nice and avoid drinking on the job.

Cars suck.

It's better not to wake up alone. And that's simply the truth.

If you live in Massachusetts right now and have not gone to a club rock show, you are cheating yourself. No joke.

My final piece of education, and I'm not making it up: If you suffer through a week of new-sandal foot pain now, the rest of your summer will be comfortable and odor-free. It's like an investment in the future.

The worst list ever

BRIAN LOHNES

Everyone has certain things they hate. It's a simple fact of life that we don't like certain colors, or types of clothing, or even certain celebrities, as in my girlfriend Kerri's case. What I have decided to do is to take on the awesome responsibility of making a list of the worst stuff ever. I am sure you will disagree with some of my picks, but as Abraham Lincoln said, "You can make all of the people happy some of the time, some of the people happy all of the time, and if Brian Lohnes is involved people will hate you."

Worst Hat - The Beret is by far the worst hat ever. Strike one is that the French seem to enjoy wearing it. Unless you are wielding a brush, named Pierre, or a mime, stay clear of the berets. Thankfully, we are pretty much out of beret season and by next year I hope my letter-writing campaign to major beret makers will help to stop production.

Worst form of performance art - Mimes. Sweet sassy molassy, what in the name of hell would drive anyone to become a mime? Even for the most devastating traumas you could endure, there is professional help. This is another thing the French seem to embrace, and they wonder why no one likes them.

Worst clothing concept - Three-quarter length things. Ok, back before the dawn of man, God created two styles of shirts, those with stubby, short sleeves and those with full-length sleeves, which covered one's whole arm. Then man interfered and developed shirts and pants that cover three quarters of the length of the limb which they are supposed to conceal. What is the reasoning for this? Is it possible to become chilled just enough to only warrant covering three fourths of your arms or legs? I'm waiting for an answer.

Worst career move ever - Hands down this goes to Robert Downey Jr. He went from successful actor to a junkie of epic proportions. Then again, he was acting on Ally McBeal so I can kind of see why he would have developed a drug habit. Just when it looked like he was pulling himself up by his boot straps, his boot straps broke and he plunged head long into addiction... again.

Worst movie ever - This pains me to say, but I saw Freddy Got Fingered. Good lord, I really like Tom Green and I thought that all the reviews I read were just down on the movie because it was not their kind of humor, but it was by far the most disturbing thing I have ever seen in a theatre. Whatever you do, stay far, far away from this movie. I'd rather you go out and buy some three-quarter length clothes than see it.

Worst marketing concept ever - Crystal Pepsi. Yeah, admit it to yourself, you enjoyed Crystal Pepsi for about thirty seconds. The folks at Pepsi decided to take a successful product that everyone knows is, well, cola-colored and make it clear. Much to their astating traumas you could endure, there is professional help. This is another thing the French seem to embrace, and they wonder why no one likes them.

Worst clothing concept - Three-quarter length things. Ok, back before the dawn of man, God created two styles of shirts, those with stubby, short sleeves and those with full-length sleeves, which covered one's whole arm. Then man interfered and developed shirts and pants that cover three quarters of the length of the limb which they are supposed to conceal. What is the reasoning for this? Is it possible to become chilled just enough to only warrant covering three fourths of your arms or legs? I'm waiting for an answer.

Worst smell ever - I actually discovered this one today while cleaning out the refrigerator. Rotting lettuce is by far the worst smelling thing ever. This lettuce was actually reduced to a murky Jello-like substance. It looked like a botched government experiment and with a little help from the rag I tied around my head sprayed with Febreeze I disposed of it.

Worst color ever - The only tie on the list. Taupe or cyan tie for the worst ever color. Why do I hate these colors? Actually it's more out of ignorance than anything else, I have no idea what they even look like.

Worst hairstyle ever - Everyone thinks I am going to say mullet, but you are completely wrong. The worst hairstyle ever was a product of the early 1990s when young boys (and maybe some girls too) decided to have "lines" put in their hair. This was an intricate procedure where the barber would place the clippers near the child's head and then touch it to his (or her) head thereby making a line in the hair. The whole procedure took about 12 seconds give or take, but added money to the cost of the hair cut. A close runner-up was the high shave over the ear, making look as though you were wearing your hair as some type of helmet.

Well, there you have it, a complete list of the "worst things ever." If you don't like it, don't voice your displeasure too loudly, because I am brewing up a list of the worst people ever and I'll stick you right next to Casey Kasem.

Mumba brings authenticity to pop

SAMANTHA MUMBA
Gotta Tell You
Interscope

Most teen stars dominating the music scene today are preconceived talentless warblers more concerned about their image than their actual music. And while the sass and looks that Samantha Mumba puts forth can mistakenly clump the chanteuse with these countless teen manufactured singers, it's important to note that Mumba has many attributes that set her apart from these standard offerings.

For starters, Mumba is from Ireland. And she's also black. Say what? Her mixed heritage – her mother is Irish and father is Zambian – is one of the differences that separate her from the Britneys and Christinas. But Mumba also (gasp!) writes her own songs. Couple that with a sultry mix of schmillating tunes and Mumba has become Ireland's hottest pop export since U2. And in a market infested with all-American, blonde-haired and blue-eyed petties, that's a good thing.

The Dubliner has already experienced mild success here in the States with the pop confections "Gotta Tell You" and "Baby, Come Over (This is Our Night)." The songs are sugary sweet like many others pumped out from the various teen stars. "Gotta Tell You" helped introduce Mumba to the American audience with a run-of-the-mill dance-pop number – albeit a Billboard top five hit. Her current release, "Baby Come Over (This is Our Night)," an aggressive, bass-heavy, inviting dance hit, is sure to draw the same success.

Mumba doesn't have a knockout voice, but her sultry and soulful delivery of each song makes up for the lacking vocal power. Her poignant performance permeates the gospel-like "Lately" with genuine emotion. The same type of formula works on "Body II Body," which samples David Bowie's "Ashes to Ashes," helping it come off as appealingly sassy. It must be admitted that Mumba's songs pack less punch than many other teen pop dance hits, but nevertheless imbue a similar listening pleasure.

It's difficult to listen to Gotta Tell You without bobbing or singing along to the catchy bubblegum anthems abundant on the album. Take for instance the lilting "Isn't It Strange," a song about perplexities of love and emotions (a notion that has been explored far too many times, but at least here it works.)

Most songs on the album are bubbly and beat-heavy – perhaps a choreographed move, as "Never Meant to Be," a ballad, doesn't work as well as the dance songs. It's also apparent that Mumba has guys, guys, guys on her mind; it's the subject of nearly every song on the album.

Mumba's material is infectious and crafty. She will undoubtedly become a role model to many young girls, as have many others of her age chanting about boys and other tribulations about growing up. "Don't Need You to Tell Me I'm Pretty" is a soft, melodic tune that does just as the title suggests: affirms that the beauty of one is on the inside. The message, however, comes off as hypocritical in nature considering Mumba seems to be concerned with her confidence just as much as her image.

The Irish crooner relies on production over personality on Gotta Tell You and attains success with that very formula, a blueprint other teen acts should follow. There are enough pop tunes drenched with an undeniable R&B flavor for enough stylistic variety to keep things from ever getting statically persistent and bland. Mumba doesn't undertake a new sound that we are unfamiliar with, but her diversity, sass and sexy voice is a welcome addition to a market infested by innocent, manufactured pop acts.

VH1 wins again with "Bands on the Run"

I know it was just two weeks ago that I gushed over VH1 and "Diva's presents Aretha Franklin," but now I come back to you to rave about another fairly new show on the Video Hits One network. "Bands on the Run". It combines VH1's Save the Music platform with the competition and format of a reality show. It's one part battle of the bands, one part "Survivor" and all entertainment.

VH1 recruited four bands: Flickerstick, Josh Dodes Band, Harlow and Soulcracker. All of the bands were considered local touring bands, trying their hardest to pay their dues and become discovered. Here is what VH1 offered them: Not only would they be the stars of a new music based reality show but also they would get a chance to win fifty thousand dollars, new equipment, and a showcase with music executives. But to make it more competitive, the online audience takes weekly polls and the overall winner of the polls gets an extra twenty-five grand. The winner is the band that collects the most money from ticket and merchandise sales. The last incentive to motivate the bands to the prizes and possible record contract is that after a certain number of weeks the band with the least amount of money earned gets booted off the road trip.

In one hour the audience experiences each band's two-day experience in the city that they visited. Cameramen follow them from hotel rooms to clubs and all the bands have four cameras in their van so the audience can see their strategy (if they have one) and see the mechanics of the band either break apart, or run like a well-oiled rock and roll machine.

And the music they play is good music. It's not like that factory-produced music that we hear on MTV all day long. Don't get me wrong, I listen and enjoy over half the music that is played on MTV, but the honesty that comes with these working bands is evident in their stories, lyrics, and sound. And unlike other VH1 music, which pretty much focuses on adult contemporary (you'll never see Eminem, Limp Bizkit, or Jay-Z on "VH1's Top Ten") they found some pretty rocking bands.

Tape Notes with Nick Pizzolato

Harlow is an all female rock/goth group from Los Angeles. They resemble the sound of Hole, before Courtney Love became clean and somewhat respectable. Their sound is hard, fast, and angry. Flickerstick is the token party band, which decided that the best way for them to promote themselves is to go out, get drunk and meet chicks. They hail from Dallas, Texas and were formed on the campus of University of North Texas. Like Harlow they are a rock group whose sound pulls no punches. The Josh Dodes Band is probably the band most likely to be played on VH1 (and probably who the producers are rooting for) because their sound mixes funk-rock with meaningful lyrics. They join the tour with already a large following in New York City. Finally, Soulcracker, the San Diego band with five indie records under their belt, produce some of the best live music utilizing their secret weapon, the stage presence of lead singer Justin.

The show is fast paced and full of rock and roll clichés, and some of the bands may not be the best, but it's still fun to watch.

The Harp – now open for business

By Khara Nicholson
Collegian Staff

Have you been looking for a new place to hang out, a place that is laid back, spacious, casual, and has a variety of live entertainment and great beers on tap? Well, if you are then The Harp is definitely a place for you to check out. It's located at the corner of Cowles Lane and Sunderland Rd. right where the old Mike's Westview used to be.

The atmosphere of The Harp is that of a traditional Irish Pub. On tap there are fourteen beers including some unusual ales that are not sold in most bars in the Amherst area. Featured on tap are Old Peculier, a Scottish ale, Guinness, an Irish stout, Guinness Draft, and Boddington's Pub Ale. There is also a couple of local beers on tap including Berkshire Brewing Company and Paper City Brewing from Holyoke, Diamonds, beer runs for $2.5 a pint while imported and microbrews go for $4.25.

As soon as you walk in the door you will see an Irish flag hanging on the wall along with various Boston Famous Park and Celtics sports wood, which Terry O'Neill, from The Harp, said he hoped the Boston fans would enjoy. There are also three televisions that will be airing international soccer games and Red Sox games on a regular basis. Lining the walls as soon as you walk in are comfortable booths, painted green, of course, and the strap around bar with approximately 20 seats. Terry explained that one decision The Harp came to when they were in the process of making their changes was to keep the same bar that was in Mike's Westview because it is one of the oldest bars in the area. In the back room there are two seater tables, a pool table, and a jukebox with a great selection of music. Dress in Harp is very informal girls, you can put away the black pants and tank tops and put on a pair of comfortable jeans for the night.

The Harp is strictly 21 and over. The employees of The Harp are extremely adamant about the use of fake I.D.'s and lack of toleration for them. In fact, I witnessed a customer who was turned away for using various forms of expired identification.

They hope to attract a large crowd and will be hosting various "sessions" where local bands will come and perform for people to enjoy. No cover charge will be required on these nights. These sessions will include Friday nights when a group of Irish musicians will be playing, and Electric Carnival, a local group, who will also be coming to The Harp who play classic to new age music.

The Harp will eventually have a full menu of lunch and dinner specials hopefully by August and are working on serving appetizers in the next few weeks. The menu will have a variety of reasonably priced dishes including Irish nachos, stuffed quahogs, shrimp dishes, fried fish, and prime rib.

Service, at The Harp, is very professional. At the door, there were three employees checking I.D.'s and behind the bar there were four bartenders, which made ordering a drink, hassle-free and very quick.

Terry O'neill and Eileen Tierney, both from The Harp, stated that since their opening last Tuesday, that they have had a crowd of faculty, students, and local residents. Terry said that they have gotten tremendous feedback from both the students and local residents of Amherst and that they keep seeing familiar faces who keep coming back. He also said that Mike's Westview had created a town history, and that he looks forward to students beginning a new history for The Harp. He also mentioned how grateful they were for all of the support they have received from other establishments in town including Rafter's, The Pub, Diano's, and The Spoke who donated a Harp mirror for their wall (that you will see to the left of the door where you enter) that was given as a gesture of good luck. Terry said that he hopes, as a new pub in town, that students will come and check them out.

the table. Tina wins a Visa card and the extreme close-up of the card is followed with Jeff Probst saying, "Visa, the world's best way to pay." The ultimate example is when Colby won a Pontiac Aztec and it was parked just like it would be on the show room floor or in the commercials that we see on television. The back popped up and the tent fully made. It's disgusting how a show about survival becomes a commercial for advertisers. "You can't survive without Dr. Scholl, just ask Jerri."

But "Survivor" proved to be more popular this past season than last summer, with more people watching it and giving "Friends" and NBC a scare. To make it more competitive with other shows in the timeslot, CBS first had to make it longer to be a full season, mostly so it could drum up ratings and cash for the almighty sweeps week (something it did not do the first time around because there is no summer sweeps). So they extended the survivors' stay fifteen days longer and gave the two teams an extra person, increasing the number from fourteen to sixteen outbackers. CBS knows that their blatant product placement has paid off by the number of people that watch and live for the show. Just how popular is the show? Well, it has breathed new life into reality TV, making it more popular than ever before. The proof is in the sudden explosion of shows like "Boot Camp," "Temptation Island," "Big Brother," "The Mole," and MTV's "Spring Break Survivors." In today's society, where the average Joe wants to make a quick buck, these shows are not only getting ratings by people who want to watch "human drama," but also these shows are be deluged by tapes of people who want to be on the show and get a chance to win. Cold, hard cash is the object that everyone is after when it comes to "Survivor." The contestants are after the million dollars, but all of the losers are given a small stipend. CBS is after the advertisers so that they can claim that these explosive ratings signify a comeback from being trapped in television mediocrity. And the advertisers are after all the viewers to buy their products because they can get ex-survivors to plug their products. So tune in, America, but beware of the looming commercialization that follows popularity. And if you didn't notice it this season, I guarantee you that you will be overcome with product placement in "Survivor 3."

Who will win?

I wanted to see Elisabeth win, but since she was eliminated (like everyone else I picked in every other reality show) I would have to go with the favorite, Colby. But it all comes down to the final immunity challenge. Should Colby win (again), he would vote for Tina, as would Keith, and in the end the jury would vote for Colby, since he does appear to be one of the most liked survivors remaining.

It's also interesting to mention that early in the season Tina stepped down for Keith, because if he did not win it was obvious that he would be the next to leave. You have to wonder if that is coming back to haunt her. If Tina wins the immunity, then you will see Keith voted off, and then the battle between Colby and Tina will be fierce. Both seem to have an equal number of acquaintances. If it comes down to Colby and Tina, you will see Jerri, Amber, Rodger, and Alicea vote for Colby because of his strong ties to the women of Ogakor and Alicea's respect for him as a person. Rodger, Elisabeth, and Keith will vote for Tina because of the friendship she harnessed with the Kucha members, while she'll get Keith's vote because of his not-so-great relationship with Colby. Nick would be a toss-up; since he was one of the earlier dismissed survivors, he may go with Alicea because of their friendship, or go with the father figure in Rodger. It would be close but I would give the upper hand to Tina.

Finally, if Keith wins Immunity, Colby will be kicked off and it will be pretty much a unanimous decision for Tina to get the million dollars. But I think the most probable scenario is the first one; so I pick that Colby will be this season's survivor. He's strong enough to win the immunity challenge, and he was well-liked and respected by his peers to win the money.

emotional Elisabeth (who I could have sworn would win), and finally Amber, who was...well...who was Amber again? This handful of the voluptuous young ladies introduced themselves with seductive glances and sultry voices. Call it unethical, call it sexist, call it what you will, it was damn good advertising, and could be part of the reason that "Survivor II" was able to capture its male following. Similarly, the show's female audience could be watching for the good-looking guys or to show support (however distantly) for the aforementioned ladies. While "Survivor II" doesn't seem to cover as wide an array of humanity as did the first one, the fact of the matter is that the contestants were selected with the utmost care. It's because of the carefully handled selection process that the show still appeals to all audiences, the young, the old, men and women. The folks over at "Survivor II" definitely know a good thing when they see it.

But all good things must come to an end, and tonight so will "Survivor II." If I were a betting man, I'd say my money is on Tina to take the one million dollars. Many will argue that Colby is the frontrunner and has the greatest chances, but the cynic in me says otherwise. Remember, last season, Kelly Wigglesworth was considered to be in the lead, but Richard Hatch gave her a run for the money. This time, the "jury," who ultimately decides between the final two combatants, may be so bitter at Colby for his endless victories that he'll at last get his comeuppance. As much as I want Keith to win, he has only made it this far due to pure luck; he is a poor competitor, and has made enemies because of his hefty self-image. Tina, on the other hand, really has no nemeses, and is a worthy competitor. If she isn't voted off in the first round tomorrow night, she'll walk away the winner, to be sure. However, if she is given the old heave-ho, and it's left to Keith and Colby, I expect Keith to win. There's something in me that doesn't think Colby has enough friends on the panel to take the cake. (Or maybe I just don't want him to.)

No matter what the verdict, it was a game well played once again. "Survivor" fans need not worry, since this summer, Jeff Probst will return with 16 new contestants for "Survivor III." (The location is still being decided; so far it's a tie between the African Serengeti and the jungles of South America.) Again, there is the all-inquiring question: Will "Survivor III" do as well as "Survivor II"? Yes, it will. Just take my word for it this time.

Maddux's mastery still a work of art in MLB

Hit and Run with Matt Brady

A few weeks ago, some colleagues of mine were discussing whether Pedro Martinez was the best pitcher of the last decade or not. Some argued that Greg Maddux still held that claim because of prior dominance. I scoffed at them, calling Pedro a modern-day Walter Johnson. (If you don't know who Johnson is, look it up – he's important.)

But now, it is hard to talk about Maddux's past dominance, when his present dominance is none too shabby.

After a two hit shutout of the formerly smoking Milwaukee Brewers, the former Cy Young winner lowered his ERA to 1.84. But Maddux, a guy who relies primarily on soft grounders to get guys out, struck out 14 of the Brew Crew while allowing only one man – shortstop Ron Belliard – to walk.

But Maddux's performance this season has been better than his extremely low ERA indicates. His season stats include a WHIP (walks plus hits per innings pitched) that stands at just under one, which ranks among the best in the league. Also, his strikeout-to-walk ratio is over 2.7, a status reached by only the best strikeout and control men in the league.

Let us look back to April 26. In a game at Arizona, Maddux was abused by the Diamondback batsmen, as they tagged him for seven earned runs and nine hits in his five and two-thirds innings of work.

Bank One Ballpark is regarded by many fans of the game as one of the best hitters parks in the league, and the D-backs higher ups orchestrated a team that accommodates the park well with their powerful lineup. Take away that game, and Maddux's numbers get exponentially better.

His innings per start raises to over seven per outing. His WHIP drops even lower to a god-like .861. Oh yeah and his ERA? It falls to 3. That's right, one-half of an earned run per nine innings pitched.

What this all adds up to is that Maddux is still a dominating pitcher. With hitting becoming more and more a part of the game and Martinez, Kevin Brown and Randy Johnson stealing much of the pitching spotlight, Maddux has faded to the background of the pitching elites. But he's still among the best of the best.

Last year, he went 19-9 for the year, posting an ERA of 3.00. Those numbers would be amazing for any other pitcher, but for Maddux, it was signs of getting old. Still, he was among the NL Cy Young award finalists last year.

What really eliminated Maddux from the elites of baseball hurlers was his 1999 campaign. His 3.57 ERA was the worst of his career, and most people wrote him off for dead.

But he's back, and with a vengeance. In a league where power pitchers dominate, Maddux still throws the finesse game, painting the outside corners to frustrate hitters. With MLB officials cracking down on outside strikes being called, instead of whining, Maddux has quietly adjusted to the zone that exists today.

But Maddux goes beyond the numbers.

A few years ago, someone once told me that if he could teach his son to do one thing, it would be to pitch like Greg Maddux.

That's the thing about Maddux that is absolutely astounding, the fact that he is more like a guy you would see on the street than any pitcher in the Major Leagues.

Johnson is gigantic, and can hurl the ball at phenomenal speeds. Brown too relies on a fireball to go along with his pinpoint control. Martinez uses his bizarrely-misshapen fingers in order to make the ball dip and dart at sharp angles, leaving hitters in utter dismay.

But Maddux is purely accuracy. Many people equate him to the "nerd of baseball." If you saw Maddux, you would most likely picture him sitting in the non-fiction section of the library, brushing up on particle physics or something of the like. He seems like he is far more fit for reading Tolstoy that baffling Major League hitters.

While other hurlers work on their pitches, Maddux studies the batter's he'll face in his upcoming contest. Much like Walter Johnson's rival Christy Mathewson did, he studies tendencies of opposing hitters, often remembering how they beat him before.

Plain and simple, he is a rarity, an example of near perfection – one that we should enjoy watching while we still can.

GAME TIME!

JARET BARR/COLLEGIAN

The women's lacrosse team is hoping to extend its season as it plays in the Atlantic 10 conference tournament this weekend at St. Joseph's. The Minutewomen were A-10 champions last year.

Brown men's lax wins third straight

By Jonathan Bloom & Jonathan Meachin
Brown Daily Herald (Brown U.)

(U-WIRE) PROVIDENCE, R.I. – Coming off two solid wins against Providence College and Cornell University, the Brown men's lacrosse team (6-7 overall, 2-4 Ivy) once again showed why early in the season it was ranked as high as 12th in the nation, as the team extended its winning streak to three games by handily beating the Fairfield Stags 14-9.

Co-captain goalie Beret Dickson, recently named Ivy League player of the week for his 18-save effort against Cornell, played yet another impressive game in net as he recorded 16 saves. Chas Gessner and Ivy League Rookie of the Week Brian Miller each netted three goals and an assist to lead the way for the offense. The Bears also got solid play from attackman Jonathon Thompson, who had one goal and three assists, and from midfielders Chris Mucciolo and Mike Albarelli, who added three and two goals, respectively.

"We've been getting great leadership from our seniors and the team is responding," Thompson said. "Everyone is really stepping it up."

"It was a big win for us," said head coach Scott Nelson. "The team is really starting to come along. A big thing for us is that we've been able to solidify who's on the field."

Brown got off to a quick start in the first quarter, scoring four goals and holding the Stags to only one goal. Only two minutes into the game, Miller made a spin move off a double-team and ripped one by the goalie to get the Bears on the scoreboard first. Just three minutes later, Albarelli scored the first of his two goals from the outside, as he slipped a shot by the keeper to give Brown an early 2-0 lead.

Fairfield finally got on the board at 6:00 in the first quarter to make the score 2-1. But the Bears would end the quarter with a run. Matt Kelley scored an unassisted goal with just over a minute and a half remaining, and with eight seconds left on the clock Mucciolo emerged from the pile in front of the Stags' net and slammed the ball in to give Brown a 4-1 advantage.

The Bears started slow at the outset of the second quarter, but were able to finish strong, as they established a comfortable five-goal lead (7-2) at the break.

Even with a five-goal lead, Brown kept the pressure on in the second half, as midfielder Richard Whelan beat the entire Fairfield defense and lit up the scoreboard with a blast to make the score 8-2. Gessner took a feed from Thompson less than a minute later to increase Brown's lead to seven.

One of the Fairfield longsticks picked off a Bruno pass and took advantage of an open net with 11:24 left on the clock to reduce the lead to six, but two minutes later Miller took advantage of a Richard Tuohey assist to bring the score to 10-3. The Stags responded with two goals in less than a minute, and while Fairfield scored once more in the quarter, goals by Thompson and Mucciolo gave the Bears a 12-6 lead going into the final quarter.

"The offense played great today and really carried us," Dickson said. "We needed them to step up and play well and they did."

Gessner continued the attack in the opening minutes of the fourth quarter, as he increased the lead to seven with his third goal of the game. Although the Stags would score three times in the final quarter, the effort would not be enough, as the Bears walked away with a convincing 14-9 victory.

"It's a big win for us," said co-captain defenseman Daniel Newman. "We started the season over with the Providence game, and we've won three straight. It's a real confidence builder. We're feeling really good about ourselves going into the last game of the year."

The Bears season will come to a close this Saturday when Brown faces off against UMass on Stevenson Field at 1 p.m. UMass' hopes of making the National Tournament will be at stake with the Bears hoping to play the role of spoilers.

"We wanted to win out, and as a senior it means a lot to me to finish strong," Dickson said. "Saturday's game is huge for us. They think they need to beat us to make the playoffs, and we think we can take them."

Star swimmer perishes, represented Michigan State with 'pride and class'

By Tony Paul
The State News (Michigan State U.)

(U-WIRE) EAST LANSING, Mich. – John Munley, a four-year star for the Michigan State men's swimming team, died Monday shortly after collapsing during a morning jog near campus. He was 22.

"This is a tragedy for the entire Spartan family," MSU athletics director Clarence Underwood said in a written statement. "As we grieve, we remember a student-athlete who did more than set MSU records. He represented his alma mater with pride and class."

Police say Munley was jogging at 11:30 a.m. near the intersection of Harrison Avenue and Oak Street when he collapsed. Paramedics attempted to resuscitate Munley, who was transported to Sparrow Hospital. He was pronounced dead at 12:10 p.m.

An autopsy showed Munley suffered from an enlarged heart – a condition which family and coaches were never previously aware of.

His teammates were informed of his passing during a team meeting Monday evening.

"Some of the players just had blank stares of disbelief," swimming and diving coach Jim Lutz said.

"Some...had extreme outbursts of pain. And for a couple, it will be a while before they'll talk about this."

He said because the swim teams – men's and women's – practice together and are so close-knit, Munley's death feels like a family loss.

Lutz said it's ironic that a man in such great physical shape as Munley would suffer from heart problems: "It defies all logic," he said.

He said it was believed Munley was running to the IM-Sports West pool when he collapsed. Flowers already line the site where Munley fell.

Munley, a senior who had completed his swimming career and was slated to begin an internship this summer, was a standout athlete. He was a four-year letter-winner, was named his team's MVP in 1999 and 2000 and qualified for the NCAA Championships in the 200-, 400- and 1650-yard freestyle in 2001.

The Kalamazoo native qualified for the 2000 U.S. Olympic Trials in the 200-yard freestyle, and finished 10th at the U.S. Summer Nationals. He also holds the university's 200-yard freestyle record and posted four top-five finishes at the Big Ten Championships during his four-year career.

Munley's career began to take shape before college, though. While at Portage Central High School, he finished fifth in the 200-yard freestyle and 13th in the 100-yard freestyle at the Junior Nationals.

The packaging major came to MSU in fall 1997, following in the footsteps of his brother, Tom, who was an All-American swimmer at MSU from 1992-96.

The Munley family has set up a scholarship in the swimmer's honor. The family has asked in lieu of flowers, donations be made to the Ralph Young Fund care of the John Munley Memorial.

Lutz said Munley's dedication showed in his results.

"He was the epitome of what a competitor was supposed to be," he said. "John was the one you went to – green and white through and through."

Walsh sets for more treatment

U-Maine coach still ailing from battle with cancer

By Jim Leonard
The Maine Campus (U. Maine)

(U-WIRE) ORONO, Maine – Maine hockey coach Shawn Walsh remains positive and anxious as he prepares for the next phase of treatment in a year-long battle with cancer.

"I'm ready to go," said Walsh about the preparation for a stem cell transplant slated for this week at the National Institute of Health in Bethesda, Md. "Let's get on to the next step."

Walsh, 45, was diagnosed with renal carcinoma in July of last year and underwent surgery to remove his cancerous left kidney on July 7. Following that surgery, he underwent two immunotherapy cycles at UCLA's Johnson Cancer Center in August and October. In January of this year, new tumors were detected in Walsh's left lung and under his breastplate which prompted the decision to attempt the stem cell transplantation.

In preparation for the procedure Walsh was forced to undergo a debulking procedure on March 29 at NIH. During this surgery, Walsh had his left lung and several cancerous tumors removed to allow the stem cell procedure a better chance of success.

"The hope is that once the stem cells grow they will be able to attack the remaining tumors," said Walsh. "The debulking procedure increases the chance of success."

Stem cells are immature cells that develop into blood cells. If the transplant is successful, the new cells will grow, multiply and attack the remaining cancer cells. The procedure requires a donor that is both cancer-free and a close genetic match. Walsh's brother, Kevin, will be the donor.

Walsh said he's feeling better than he thought he would after the debulking procedure.

"I've been able to take two-mile walks and I did a little yard work this week, which was probably too much," said Walsh. "I'm trying to limit it as best I can."

Despite battling to save his life, Walsh has rarely slowed down. Between the immunotherapy sessions he returned to campus to direct the team's practices and was on the bench as the Black Bears faced Ohio State just 10 days after the second session.

As he faces a turning point in his fight, Walsh acknowledged the sources of his strength.

"My family and hockey have gotten me through this," said Walsh. "They're the two things I love most in life."

His attitude these days is a blend of focus, humor and acceptance that's best exemplified by the moment prior to this interview.

In obvious pain as he struggled to get comfortable in his office chair, he looked up and acknowledged the toll of the latest surgery with his usual candor.

"If they tell you they're going to take your kidney or your lung," said Walsh, "give 'em the kidney."

the weekend than to give us different looks," Stone said. "But it does keep you off balance, there's no question about it. You can't settle in like you can with one definite pitcher and make hitting adjustments."

The Eagles upped their lead to 4-1 in the bottom of the fourth, when designated hitter Chris Rosado roped a double to the left-center gap, scoring two runs.

In the fifth, the Minutemen got back-to-back singles from Mike Kulak and Cullan Maumus with one out. Next up was Tom Ellerbrook, who scored Kulak by grounding out to first, trimming the lead to 4-2.

The top of the sixth saw UMass regain the lead. Connell Clark led off the inning by walking, and he was followed on to the bases when Nick Gurneault singled. Gavin Clark then came up with two out and hit a hard line drive off the top of the Monster to score both runners and put the Maroon and White up 5-4.

But BC once again tied the game up in the bottom of the frame when Brian Durkin slammed the first pitch he saw into the home team's bullpen, a mere 400 feet from home plate.

With the score tied at five, Loonie came in for the bottom of the seventh. He walked leadoff hitter Ryan Leahy, and then hit Lederhos with a pitch. After striking out Joe Kealty, Stone ordered the intentional pass to Macchi. But Loonie's next pitch hit Brian Durkin in the arm to score a run.

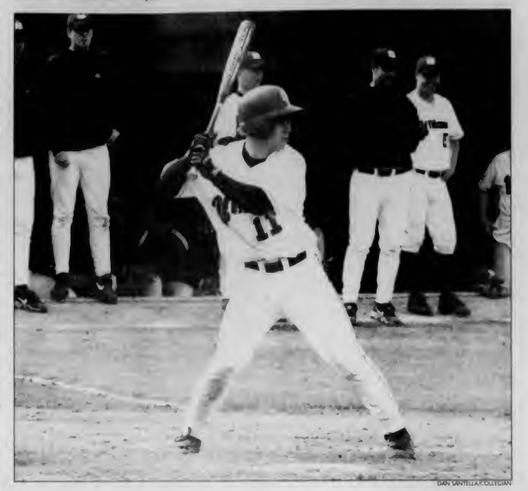
"Loonie's a guy who has thrown hard in the past, and has had some movement," Stone said.

Stone then called for freshman Kevin Inglis, who struck out Jarrett Mendoza on four pitches. But then came Mackor, who cleared the bags. BC tagged on another run when Rosado singled in Mackor to make the score 10-5.

"BC's a good program, [BC coach Peter Hughes] has done a nice job building that program," Stone said.

"When they can run three or four guys that can throw 90 out there and still be fresh for the weekend, you know they've got good pitching."

UMass is in action again today when they play host to Hartford at Lorden Field. Game time is 3 p.m.



DAN SANTILLAN/COLLEGIAN

Sean Sarno had a strong day at the plate yesterday, going two-for-three. He and the rest of the Minutemen will return to action today against Hartford.

Carter essential to Raptor success

If Vince Carter would just have the decency to get his team past the first round, then we might have somewhat of a gauge on his playoff performance ability.

But since Vinsanity and his scrapping and clawing Raptors have not yet ventured deeper into the realms of NBA playoff fever, we will simply have to work with what we have.

What we have is a lack of consistency from Carter and his purple and black clad posse.

With memories of a horrid performance in last year's opening round series against the Knicks, Carter exorcised zero demons with a dismal 3-22 shooting performance. Air Canada managed only 13 meaningless points in the game as the New Yorkers took Game One, 92-85.

Carter, the NBA's version of Jekyll and Hyde, showed a completely different face in Game Two at the Garden.

MATTHEW F. SACCO

The NBA's supposed icon shed the straight jacket known as the Knicks defense, and lit up MSG with 22 points and seven boards.

He doubled his shots made with a 10-22 shooting performance and he played a mentally strong game for the first time in his playoff career. Result: Raptors 94, Knicks 74.

The NBA's own Janus (the god of two faces) decided to rear his ugly head in Game Three. The antithesis to his sweet shooting, team leading effort in game two, Carter shot a eerily similar 5-21 and managed a 20 spot only because of his 9-11 shooting from the line.

Even more important was the fact that Carter made very poor shot decisions, quite a contrast from Game Two.

It seems that if Carter's mind is out of the game, then so are the Raptors' chances of winning. And so a 97-89 Knicks victory.

Of course, just as all the hoop scholars around the country were pegging him as a playoff flop, he steps on the hardwood last night and makes the Knicks look like they each are limping around on one leg trying to keep up.

Mental toughness and strong decision making is what made Carter's night, not to mention his 10-22 shooting exhibition.

Number 15 dropped 32 points on New York. Couple that with his seven boards, four dimes and two steals and that's a pretty dominating performance by his standards.

Although he missed 12 shots, there was a big difference in those dozen misses than the 16 or 17 he missed in Games One and Three.

His shooting choices were much better calculated and unlike previous contests he was not content with merely driving to the basket.

Obviously, slashing to the basket is a huge part of Air Canada's game, but his problem lies in going to the rack when the opportunity isn't there.

He can very easily use his outside jump shot to open up lanes and until last night, he hadn't been doing that much.

Last night against the Knicks, Carter was at his peak. Even the missed shots were smart ones, as he worked the outside jumper to exploit the inside lane and once he gets in there, he'll either go to the lone or spoon feed his defender the rock.

The Knicks better spend some time at church praying that Vince is as predictable as a checkerboard, or else they could be spending next week on the links instead of on the hardwood.

DAN SANTILLAN/COLLEGIAN

Senior Chris Campolettano had another strong game in net, stopping 11 Rutgers shots. The Minutemen play again on Saturday at Brown.

'Cuse game by making 11 saves and allowing only seven goals.

"Camps had a great game in net," Cannella said. "He's been playing like that lately."

UMass' stellar goalie is not the only one playing well of late. Sophomore Chris Fiore has shown flashes of his high school All-American status with seven points in his last four games including an assist against Rutgers.

Marc Morley, on the other hand, has been one of the Minutemen's best players of late. With his four-goal ripping of the Knights the junior attack man has notched 10 goals in the previous four games.

The Minutemen now must look ahead to a very tough road game against Brown in Providence, R.I. A loss at the hands of the Bears would spell certain doom for UMass' playoff chances.

Coach Cannella can take solace in the fact that for the first time this season, his team needed to rebound from a losing streak and they did exactly that. The Minutemen put together a full 60-minute effort that proved their worthiness as one of the top teams in the ECAC.

They also shut down possibly the country's best scorer, and with relative ease. Cromwell was clearly frustrated by the smothering Maroon and White defense that has been in many ways overshadowed by the high-powered attack.

For the sake of future UMass opponents, don't make the same mistake Rutgers did, and overlook a very deep and talented defense.

ules because of post-season conflictions. Instead, they'll be trying to figure out how Virginia made the field of 12 with six losses.

The Cavaliers had a tough schedule, obviously. Arguing that point would vault me to the "lacrosse website critic" level. So...

Virginia (6-6) lost to Princeton, 8-4; Notre Dame, 11-8; North Carolina, 7-5; Duke, 10-9; and Maryland, 12-8. It lost to Syracuse 13-7 before all of those games.

UMass (11-2) lost to Georgetown, 13-12, and Syracuse, 9-8.

In the Georgetown game, the Minutemen scored six final quarter goals before being jolted in the final seconds. Against Syracuse, the Maroon and White went goal-for-goal with the Orangemen for 55 minutes. John Glatzel and the 'Cuse defense owned the final five.

If UMass took one of those games, it'd be in vastly. Instead, the Minutemen's "weak schedule" will be blamed for their tourney absence. And Virginia's bid will come courtesy of the NCAA's "you were good last year, so you're good this year" ticket.

It makes perfect sense... (Note: UMass has been ranked higher than Virginia all year long – in every poll).

How can you deny a team that yesterday held Rutgers' Keith Cromwell – probably lacrosse's best player this year – to one goal and one assist? A team that dominated sure-in Hofstra 17-13 on its home turf? That's been in every game to the final second?

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has proved that it should be invited to the NCAA Tournament.

You may think the facts are scattered, but they're there. The Minutemen drilled Rutgers 17-7 today. Watch what happens Saturday at Brown.

Coach Greg Canella is hoping that the NCAA committee will invite his team to play in the big dance. UMass is currently ranked 8th in the nation.

Now's your chance to "Kiss" your favorite seniors goodbye!
Send your friends (OR your potential date for Commencement Ball) a token of appreciation. Stop by the STARS' "Kiss a Senior Goodbye" table on the concourse, and send your friends a limited edition UMass champagne glass (for that post-commencement party) full of Hershey's Kisses!
You can also fill out an order form online, at: www.umassalumni.com (We know how lazy...I mean busy, you all are!) If you have any questions, feel free to call the STARS office at 547-1390.
(Have you bought your Commencement Ball tickets yet?)

MASKED DROPOUT SEEKS AN ENTERTAINMENT...
WISE MAN, I AM ON A QUEST FOR KNOWLEDGE! I SEEK THE ANSWER TO MAN'S TIME LESS QUESTION...
IS HONESTY REALLY THE BEST POLICY?
YES, OF COURSE.
IT'S JUST HELL ON YOUR SEX-LIFE!

I HAVE A GOOD IDEA. I'LL POINT OUT THE LOADS OF GARBAGE AND YOU CAN CARRY THEM OUT TO THE CURB.
WHY DO I HAVE TO CARRY THEM?!
BECAUSE ALL THE GIRLS AT SCHOOL SAY YOU HAVE REALLY BIG MUSCLES.
HERE'S LOAD OF GARBAGE NUMBER TWO.
WHAT WAS THE FIRST?

Monty By Jim Meddick

OH, DR DOOLITTLE! COOCHIE'S BOIL IS BACK!
MRS TUDWELL!
WATCH OUT, DOC! COOCHIE AND FLESHY ARE MORTAL ENEMIES!
FEAR NOT! I AM DOCTOR DOOLITTLE! I WILL TALK TO BOTH PARTIES AND NEGOTIATE A LASTING PEACE!

UMass back to business

Minutemen bounce Rutgers, eye tourney

By Matthew F. Socco
Collegian Staff

Keith Cromwell won't be sleeping much for the next few weeks. It seems that 6-5, 210-pound defenseman Matt McFarland has resurrected horrific childhood memories of swirlies, wedgies and lunch money from his high school days at Hicksville, N.Y.

Unfortunately for the senior All-American, "Big Nasty" wasn't looking for lunch money; he prefers a steady balance of goals and assists, as the hulking defenseman chewed up Cromwell's once impressive 4-64 point per game average in a 17-7 UMass win.

"[McFarland] had another big game," coach Greg Cannella said. "He was given the assignment to shut down Cromwell and he did."

Smothered would probably be a more appropriate word to use, as the Teewaraton Award candidate (college lacrosse Player of the Year) was held to two measly points (one goal, one assist).

McFarland's shining effort against the nation's best player bolstered UMass (11-2, 5-1 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference) to a ten-goal statement win over conference rival Rutgers (5-7, 2-4 ECAC).

The Minutemen's end-to-end, wire-to-wire domination of the home squad should do much to augment their dwindling NCAA tournament hopes, and eradicate the bad taste still lingering after two straight losses.

"It was a good solid win," Cannella said. "We played a complete 60 minutes of lacrosse."

"Big Nasty" and his defensive troops had a truckload of support on the other side of the ball. Marc Morley and Rich Kunkel both registered four-goal games for the Maroon and White while sophomore phenom Kevin Leveille got back on the scoring track with a four-point outing. UMass jumped on the Scarlet Knights right from the opening whistle with two goals in the first two minutes.

Senior captain Jeremy Guski and John Madigan got the scoring started early but the Knights' Seth Benjamin sliced the two-goal lead in half with just under 10 minutes remaining in the quarter.

The Rutgers marker lit a fire under the rear end of the Maroon and White attack, as it proceeded to score nine of the next 10 goals. Kunkel notched a hat trick in the first half while Leveille and Morley added a pair.

Paul "the Flash" Hutchen caged a rare goal in the second quarter while assist man extraordinaire Keith Gabrielli had all three of his helpers in the first half.

The first 30 minutes ended with the Minutemen holding a commanding 11-2 lead. The cushy advantage gave Coach Cannella the chance to play some of the future stars of UMass lacrosse.

Freshmen Neil Lundberg, Kevin Glenz and Jeff Zwycki all received time in the second half while highly touted junior college transfer Rob Schneider saw some burn in net.

Faceoff ace Jeff Seals rebounded from a tough game against Syracuse by dominating the circle. The senior won an astonishing 20 of 28 face offs, helping the Minutemen keep the momentum when they had it.

Seals' performance came as no surprise to his teammates and coaches, as the game represented somewhat of a homecoming for the fifth year middy.

"Seals is a New Jersey native," Cannella said. "He was looking forward to coming back home and playing against some of the players he faced in high school."

Another standout for the Maroon and White was goaltender Chris Campolettano. The senior continued his outstanding play from the Junior Marc Morley had yet another strong game against Rutgers yesterday, as he tallied four goals en route to an easy 17-7 UMass victory.

Team still lax respect nationwide

There should be a leather couch designated to the sidelines of each playing surface in Division I lacrosse – reserved for NCAA officials.

Then, maybe, the NCAA might be able to make well-informed decisions when selection time for the men's tournament rolls around.

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will not make the NCAA Tournament.

Is that possible? It's the consensus of national lacrosse critics.

When the selection committee fails this weekend to recognize the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team for its best season since 1989 (when the late Richard F. Garber – the best coach this game ever had – was boss), it'll be a disgrace.

ERIC SODERSTROM

And the unfortunate fad is that most people won't understand why.

"If this team does not make the NCAA Tournament then lacrosse illegitimates itself as a real sport," a rather well-spoken member of the press said as the buzzer sounded in UMass' one-goal loss to Syracuse last Saturday.

Let's not take this that far – acrimony doesn't parallel decency.

But a 12-2 record doesn't parallel a losing season either. And that's what it'll feel like for the Minutemen if they don't get in.

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will not make the NCAA Tournament.

That's not me talking. Those are the abridged words of InsideLacrosse.com – words that breach every statute of common sense. According to the site, UMass is one of four teams that should be "praying to the Gods this weekend to help them get into the tournament."

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team not making the NCAA Tournament is thoroughly unwarranted.

Those are the words from this coherent chap, one who can't believe that come Monday, the Minutemen – the No. 8 team in this fine country – won't have to worry about rearranging class sched-

No pot at end of rainbow

Minutemen fall to 9-2 in Beanpot play after 10-5 loss at Fenway

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

You can't win 'em all.

The old baseball adage applies perfectly to the Massachusetts baseball team, as it lost in the Beanpot tournament for just the second time in 11 attempts, 10-5 at the hands of Boston College.

BC (25-20) broke open the game in the top of the seventh by way of a bases-clearing double at the hands of Jeff Mackor. Mark Sullivan picked up the win for the Eagles, while senior David Loonie was tagged for the loss. Loonie pitched just one-third of an inning, walking two men and hitting two others. All four Eagles went on to score.

"It was a struggle all day on the mound," said head coach Mike Stone. "It's either a lack of command or a lack of velocity. When you get some runs, you need someone to go out and shut the other team down. Unfortunately, we haven't gotten it done."

UMass got on the board in the top of the first when Sean Sarno led things off with a single. Connell Clark followed by laying down a sacrifice bunt that was thrown away by third baseman Brian Macchi. With runners on second and third, Sarno scampered home on a wild pitch by BC starter Jed Rogers.

In the bottom of the first, Matt Lederhos walked, setting up Macchi, the Eagles best hitter, up for some redemption. Macchi sent UMass starter Brian Flourigan's three-one offering into orbit, as the mammoth shot rattled off the top of the Coke bottles above Fenway's Green Monster.

BC brought in a new hurler in each of the next three innings, and would use a total of six pitchers in the game.

"I think that was more to keep people fresh for

Softball falls to BC; Bears next for women

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

It took over a month and a half to have its first winning streak snapped. For its second one of the season it took only three days.

While inter-state rival Connecticut put an end to the Massachusetts softball team's 24 game winning streak last week, intra-state adversary Boston College (27-24, 7-13 Big East), terminated the squad's three game streak Tuesday in Chestnut Hill, Mass.

After UMass (34-11, 18-0 A-10) had defeated the Eagles 5-4 back on April 5 in Amherst, BC returned the favor and pulled out the victory this time, 5-4 in eight innings.

The Eagles can thank their freshman third baseman, Elyse Meredith, for the victory. Her first career home run in the eighth inning gave BC the win over the 22nd ranked Minutewomen.

After being down 4-3 at the end of six innings, the Maroon and White tied the score at four when with two outs in the top of the seventh, junior outfielder Teri Rooney came home after a throw got away in attempt to get her out at third.

Despite another impressive performance from junior pitcher and co-captain Jen Hadley, the senior was unable to consistently stifle the Eagles' hitting attack throughout the entire game.

"I wasn't as sharp as I have been," said Hadley. "I really did not have my best stuff, specifically in the early innings."

With two outs in the bottom of the eighth inning, Hadley let one get away and next thing she knew, Meredith had smacked a bomb to straight-away center field and the game was over.

"Defensively, we had a setback," said Hadley. "We came out sluggish, and by the time we got back into the game they played well again."

According to the team, defensive setbacks and slow starts have been themes for the season. The team didn't put too much emphasis on the problem during their 24-game streak. However, now that the squad has dropped two out of its last five match-ups, it has become an issue of concern.

"We've had meetings," said Hadley. "As much as we try to fix it as a group, it comes with each individual person."

"There are a few people who are stepping up, but everyone has to be pitching in," she added.

UMass has a chance to tune up its skills and get back to its winning ways when it travels to Providence, R.I. today to play a double header against the Brown Bears (7-36-1, 3-7 Ivy League).

Brown has had a dismal season but it is coming off a somewhat successful twin bill against Providence College. The Bears won the first game, 6-4, and due to darkness the second game was called with the score tied, 3-3.

The doubleheader will mark the last two games of the season for the Bears and they surely would love to end the season on a high note. None would be better than a victory over a softball powerhouse such as Massachusetts.

"We should go out and play hard, no matter who the opponent is," said Hadley.

Graduation Address by student

COURTESY UMASS NEWS OFFICE

Karen Borsetti

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has announced that Karen Borsetti, a finance major, will address the graduating class of 2001 at the 131 Commencement Exercises on Sunday, May 27.

"It is a huge honor to be representing the Class of 2001 as the student Commencement speaker," Borsetti said. "For my friends, family and me, this accomplishment makes UMass feel that much smaller, and makes graduation weekend even more meaningful than it already is."

Borsetti explained what her speech was about, and what drove her to write it.

"In my speech I talk a lot about risk, and what people are afraid of – success or failure," Borsetti said. "I just thought that I might have something to say that I might want to share with my classmates. I decided it was something I really wanted to do."

After writing her speech, Borsetti had to wait for months to find out if she would get the nod.

"I had gone away for Spring Break, and when I came back I was one of seven finalists. The next day I had to deliver it," Borsetti explained. "I was really excited, and I hoped to be able deliver it with the same passion that it was written with."

Borsetti will be working as a consultant in the Enterprise Risk Services department of Deloitte and Touche, Boston after graduation.

Paul Appleby, the American with Disabilities Act compliance officer for the Office of Equal Opportunity and Diversity, is the non-voting chair of the committee that selects the speaker. He explained the make-up of the committee.

"I contact the heads of the English, Communications, and the Journalism departments and ask them to appoint three faculty members," Appleby said. "We try to have three faculty and four students who are graduating."

"Three of the students are nominated by their respective departments, and I send a letter to the Student Government Association. It's been really difficult to get responses from them [SGA]," he added.

To be eligible to submit a speech, students must be graduating seniors.

Applicants submit speeches of about two to three pages in length, which are then edited for any clues as to the writer's identity.

"We try to do this as objectively as possible," Appleby said. "I delete any information pertaining to the true identity of the writer."

There are usually about twenty to thirty paper submissions. Those speeches are evaluated and ranked by the committee, and seven were chosen.

Those chosen were then asked to present their speeches for the committee, which generally have a positive theme.

"I can tell you that the speeches that are selected have a positive spin," Appleby said. "The committee isn't going to pick a negative one, because nobody wants to sit there with your parents and friends and hear how bad somebody's time at UMass was."

Walk for Hunger set to raise funds to help homeless relief

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

Project Bread's Walk for Hunger, the country's largest annual one-day fundraiser, attracted 40,000 participants last year and raised around $3 million. Hopes are high that this year's 20-mile walk on Sunday, May 6th at 9:00 a.m. in Boston will do just as well.

Project Bread accredits itself as a nonprofit community organization "dedicated to alleviating, preventing, and ending hunger" in Massachusetts.

According to the Walk for Hunger Fact Sheet, hunger mostly affects the working poor who use much of their income to pay for the rising costs of rent, medical care, and childcare.

"Hunger is on the rise in Massachusetts, [and] 74 percent of emergency food programs funded by Project Bread report an increase in requests for food aid," wrote University of Massachusetts junior Kathryn Dixon, interning this semester at Project Bread as a Communications Assistant. "Nearly half a million people in the Commonwealth are hungry or lacking access to adequate food."

In Massachusetts, roughly 62,000 children under age 12 go hungry, and 151,000 children are at risk of going hungry. These statistics can be put into context by the fact that 40 percent of Project Bread's clients are children.

"Although jobs are plentiful right now, many do not pay salaries that are consistent with the high cost of living in Massachusetts," said Executive Director of Project Bread Ellen Parker. "More and more working families are struggling, and they are turning to emergency food pantries to help feed their families."

With proceeds from the Walk for Hunger, Project Bread severed 29.1 million emergency meals in 1999 at food pantries and soup kitchens in 129 different Massachusetts communities, including the Amherst Survival Center.

Sponsored by Au Bon Pain, Fleet Bank, Raytheon, and Stop & Shop, Walk for Hunger, which first began in 1969, will commence on the Boston Common. Walkers will weave their way through Brookline, Newton, Watertown, and Cambridge and end back at the Boston Common.

Vice President and General Manager of 7 NBC (WHDH-TV) and Chairman of the Advisory Committee for the Massachusetts Child Hunger Initiative Mike Carson said in a recent news release that 7 NBC feels proud to be a longtime supporter of the Walk for Hunger.

"I believe that all the children in Massachusetts deserve to have the adequate nutrition they need in order to learn and grow," noted Carson. "The Walk for Hunger offers everyone a chance to make a difference, and to help make our community strong."

The walk's registration will take place on Sunday, May 6th from 7:00 a.m. to 9 a.m. at the Boston Common. For those walkers with registrations forms, the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority will offer free rides into Boston between the hours of 6:00 a.m. and 9 a.m. on any subway, bus or commuter train.

Groundhog Day author to speak

Have you ever wondered what it takes to write a screenplay? If you have, get your questions answered when Danny Rubin, author of the movie "Groundhog Day," comes to Campus Center room 163 on Sunday, May 6 at 7:00 p.m. to share his insights on the film industry with the UMass community.

In addition to "Groundhog Day," which received the British Academy Award for Best Screenplay, Rubin's credits include the films "Hear No Evil," and "S.F.W." He holds a B.A. in Biology from Brown University and an M.A. in Radio, Television, and Film from Northwestern University. He has taught screenwriting in Chicago at the University of Illinois, Columbia College, and National High School Institute, at the Sundance Institute in Utah.

He is now teaching in New Mexico at the College of Santa Fe and is the Board President of Warehouse 21, Santa Fe's Teen Arts Center.

The lecture is free, open to the public and is sponsored by UMass Hillel, the Jewish Student Union, and Forum, a recently formed group at UMass Hillel whose slogan is "Anything and Everything Jewish." Organized by undergraduates Rachel Slomovitz and Elana Premack, Forum is dedicated to "Anything and Everything Jewish," sharing Jewish ideas and culture. Recently the group presented a reading and lecture by Eugene Pogany, author of "In My Brother's Image," nominated for a National Jewish Book Award. Forum also sponsors "Just a Nosh," a bi-weekly discussion group meeting about issues of interest to Jewish students. Recent topics have included Jewish love, Judaism and feminism and keeping kosher.

Fun-filled farm festivities at livestock classic

The 66th Annual Bay State Livestock Classic will be held on Saturday, May 5, from about 1a.m. – 5 p.m. at the Hadley Farm, owned by the University of Massachusetts Foundation, Inc., on 111 N. Maple St., Hadley, behind Alumni Stadium on the other side of Rt. 116.

The event is hosted and sponsored by the Pre-Veterinary and Animal Club. Students in the Department of Veterinary and Animal Science spent about six weeks, beginning after spring break, training and grooming an animal of their choice in preparation for the show, which is similar to a Big E or 4-H Club horse and livestock competition.

The students chose from beef cattle, dairy cattle, sheep, goats, swine, or horses, all of which, except for the dairy cattle, already live at the Hadley Farm, a teaching facility for students in the Department of Veterinary and Animal Science. Students and their animals are judged in the showing on the appearance and behavior of their animal. Ribbons are awarded to the student who shows the best animal from each species and to one Premiere Show person.

Other events include hayrides by The Hadley Farm mascot, Diamond, a Clydesdale horse, balloons, a petting zoo, raffle prizes, including a two night stay and dinner in Martha's Vineyard, food, music, games, souvenirs, and face-painting.

Admission is free and the event is open to the public. Also, if you love baby animals, there will be young cattle, piglets, goat kids, lambs and a newborn colt featured by The Hadley Farm.

For more information call Jordyn at 534-3156 or at 665-7725. All donations benefit the Department of Veterinary and Animal Science.

Business plan competition High growth in Entreclub

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Five College Entrepreneur Club and Mass Ventures presented their second annual Entreclub $50K Business Plan Competition yesterday in Mahar Auditorium.

The Entreclub is a club that exists to foster entrepreneurship in the Five College area. They hold business seminars, host speakers and cosponsor the business plan competition that was held last night. This year there was up to $10,000 in cash and $20,000 in services for prizes.

Participants in the business plan competition were divided into groups of one to three people. Each team had to have at least one student from one of the Five Colleges. Some teams were made up of entirely students, but others included area residents and even professors. Most of the teams were from UMass, but there were also teams from Hampshire College and Amherst.

The competition was divided up into three categories: small business, high growth and sustainable ventures. The groups that devised plans in the high growth category were interested in attracting venture capital and growing in wealth rapidly, while the sustainable ventures were designed more with the environment in mind and resource management.

"It's really amazing what these people came up with," said Molly Pasquale, next year's Entreclub president and a Business Administration MBA student. "Skills from different schools are brought together to run a really good business."

There were five judges supervising and deciding in the competition. Each team had ten minutes to pitch their plan to the judges. This year the judges were: Carol Brennan, from the Mass. Technology Development Corporation; Ann Chmielewski, from PricewaterhouseCoopers investment firm; John Fahel, a professor from Hampshire College; Tom Loper, from Mass Ventures Corporation; and Tripp Peake, from Long River Ventures, an area non-profit firm interested in cultivating small businesses in the area.

Most of the teams have worked on their plans for the entire semester, and many have been working all year. According to Pasquale, the competition serves as a stimulus to develop ideas, get them on paper, and get feedback from professionals. She also commented that the teams were cross – functional, bringing people from the areas of finance, engineering and even mathematics together.

Prizes were awarded for the first, second and third place winners in all three categories. Entreclub is sponsored by many organizations including the UMass alumni association, Mass Ventures and Sugar Jones Cookies.

Middle East still racked by Israel conflict

By Erik Haan
Collegian Staff

The prospect of peace in the Middle East ran into a new roadblock on May 2, as Israeli tanks and bulldozers leveled 15 buildings, killing one and injuring 11 others, in an alleged retaliatory attack against Palestinians in Rafah, a refugee camp on the far southern Gaza Strip.

The destruction of the area, which has been under Palestinian control since 1993, was one in a number of recent violent military maneuvers by the Israelis. On April 17, a raid was conducted on Beit Hanoun, in the northern part of the Gaza Strip. Another raid in Rafah, as well as one in Khan Younis, was also implemented.

Israel maintained that the most recent attack was an effort to stop sniper fire on a nearby outpost. Their bulldozing was a success in wiping out buildings and farmland that were apparently serving as cover for Palestinian gunmen.

"If a place is used as a military position," said a spokesman for the Israeli military, "it becomes a military objective."

Israel considers the recent violence to be necessary measures against what it claims is provocation by the Palestinians. They have defended the April 17 attack as a measure to prevent Palestinians from establishing a stage from which to launch assaults on Israel. They also stated that the last raid was in response to events that occurred this past Tuesday, when they claim that Palestinians assaulted an Israeli border patrol with grenades.

What comes as ironic, however, is that the assault occurred just hours before Shimon Peres, Israel's Foreign Minister, met with United States Secretary of State Colin L. Powell to discuss the potential revival of peace talks. Peres wanted to discuss the possibility of the U.S. getting involved in discussion about a cease-fire. State Department spokesman Philip Reeker saw the attacks as detrimental to any new beginnings in the peace process.

"As we've said before, actions such as Israeli incursions into Palestinian-controlled areas—and that would include the incursion into Rafah earlier today – and the bulldozing of Palestinian buildings undermine the efforts to defuse the situation and bring an end to the violence and escalation," said Reeker. "We've also made very clear to the Palestinians that they must carry out their responsibility to break the cycle of violence as well and prevent continued provocative acts of violence emanating from areas under their control."

Despite the words of wisdom from the U.S., the Palestinians are staunch in their position that Israel was the instigator and was to blame for any and all violence. A person who identified themselves as a leader of the Popular Resistance Committees, a Palestinian militia group, felt as though any blame cast towards Palestine by Israel is unfounded and merely an attempt to make excuses for aggressive military policy.

"We will continue, and we will have a reaction against this, and we will continue shooting and throwing mortars at the settlers and the army and they will never stop us," he said.

Palestine officials no doubt received at least a sense of recognition in knowing that the U.S. was behind them on this most recent outburst of violence. Powell backed Palestine's sentiments about the attack, calling it "excessive and disproportionate."

Peter Hansen, a commissioner general of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, which was sent to the Gaza Strip to provide relief, in the form of cash and other necessities, to victims of the bulldozing and destruction, also expressed his puzzlement over the recent developments.

After viewing the victims and the mass of rubble, he stated that he found it difficult to "fully comprehend" the actions when both sides claim to be aiming for peace.

The Gaza Strip, which is bordered by Egypt to its South and Israel to the east, was established as a Palestinian state in 1993, as a result of the Oslo Agreement.

UMass student projects showcased

By Melissa Shattuck
Collegian Staff

The College of Electrical and Computer Engineering recently held their annual design day. Design day is an event which showcases senior projects. In additon to electrical and computer engineering majors, a few CSE majors submitted their senior honors project.

All senior electrical and computer-engineering majors are required to complete a project. Students are then put into groups of three. Advisors try to put students together who have similar interests.

Each team was then allowed to have weekly meetings with their advisor. Advisors provided minimal support, and were used mostly to provide information that the seniors were currently learning in class.

"We want students to investigate various situations, to use problem solving, and to use what they learn along with what they are currently learning," said T. Barid Soules, senior design project coordinator in the department of electrical and computer engineering. "This comes as a challenge, especially because they need to use material they are currently learning. This helps them see where the senior elective material can be used."

Some of the projects on display today included a radio-control system for the Lego Mindstorms Robotics Invention System, a wireless heart monitor and a system for retrieval of Internet based audio data using a cell phone.

The Lego Mindstorms Robotics Invention System is an enhancement of the system that is currently in use. When Lego utilizes their current program they write a program on a computer, and then program the robot over an infrared link. This is limiting because the robot needs to be pointed at a tower. The system devised by Johnpaul Barrieau, Thomas Rudick, Mark Hutchins, and Nathan Merritt under the advisory of Baird replaces the infrared link with a radio link. This creates many opportunities for Lego Robotics. These students have publicized their project on the web, which will allow the Lego community to create an equivalent of their own.

Kevin Arsenault, Shane Foss, and Audra Page, under the advisory of Professor Robert Jackson, created a wireless heart rate monitor. This system allows a person to wear and monitor heart rate and other aspects of the heart. It then broadcasts the data to a nearby personal computer. This computer then logs all of the data, and is capable of graphing the results.

Richard Powers, a senior honors CSE major, did his independent senior research on the retrieval of internet based audio data using a cellular phone. The user is allowed to reach into many different genres of information including real-time/statistical broadcasts, messaging and stored data such as music and even books on tape. By combining the Internet browsing capabilty of cell phones with audio playback, any number of sound files can be reached by the user regardless of location. Powers is currently planning to market this idea.

All and all, said Soules, "the day was a success."

Names to know:

Enemies of the press

Budding journalists, listen up.

The Committee to Protect Journalists released its annual list of the Ten Worst Enemies of the Press yesterday, putting the spotlight on world leaders who are notorious in their abuse of the media.

The enemies cited for the year 2001 are: Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Supreme Leader of the Islamic Republic of Iran; Charles Taylor, President of Liberia; Jiang Zemin, President of The People's Republic of China; Robert Mugabe, President of Zimbabwe; Vladimir Putin, President of Russia; Carlos Castaño, Leader of The United Self Defense Forces of Colombia; Leonid Kuchma, President of Ukraine; Fidel Castro, President of Cuba; Zine al-Abdine Ben Ali, President of Tunisia and Mahathir Mohamad, Prime Minister of Malaysia.

Many on the list – including Castro and Ayatollah Khanenei – are repeat offenders, veterans of a list that seeks to make public those that fight to limit the freedom and rights of the press.

For anyone working in the media, or for the average person, the acts these individuals have committed are outlandish and downright disturbing. Zemin, for instance, rules over what has been deemed "the world's most elaborate system of media control." By the end of 2000, twenty-two journalists had been jailed, and a number of outlets practicing editorial independence had been shut down.

Some leaders have gone past simply jailing journalists, resorting to physical violence and intimidation. Castaño of Columbia has been issued formal charges in the 1999 murder of a political satirist and commentator, while his AUC group has been implicated in three other deaths. For the coverage he disapproves of, it is not uncommon for Castaño to issue violent threats in an effort to patrol what information enters into the marketplace.

As for Cuba, they continue to employ what is essentially a "Big Brother" system of policing the media – a popular tactic currently used by Castro is to arrest journalists and release them hundreds of miles from their homes, while foreign correspondents who are critical of the government are denied visas.

While this yearly list simply reaffirms the obvious to most in the business, it should force everyone to sit up and pay attention – the media is not something that should be controlled or censored in such a sweeping manner by the government. That journalists who are simply doing their jobs are being subjected to violent acts is a threat to all of us – as faulty as the media can sometimes be, we need it to stay informed and abreast of what's happening, of who is doing what, and how those decisions will affect our daily lives.

While these injustices aren't taking place on domestic soil, they do affect the media that is based here and, ultimately, us.

Remebering summers past

JAMIE LOO

Recently I've come down with a serious case of nostalgia. I'm not sure when it started, it's just that suddenly everything I do triggers this sudden loss of reality and plunges me into some memory of the past. As the weather gets warmer we all find ourselves distracted from work and thinking about the upcoming months.

"Make new friends but keep the old, for one is silver and the other gold," said my friend Kim in her high school graduation address. The funny thing is I saw it on a Hallmark card the other day. Darn greeting card companies. It's such a cliche saying but is something that has been so true to me. I still hang out with most of my friends from high school in the summer, and I miss them dearly during the school year. As much fun as I've been having at UMass, there's something very different about being with my old friends. My friends and I have all changed a lot since going to school but not enough for us to grow far apart. Unfortunately, I have lost a few people along the way, some because we lost touch and others because we stopped accepting each other's flaws, turning us into enemies. The cool thing is this summer we'll all be slightly more legal than we were in the past. Most of Boston is now 19-plus on Thursday nights and some places are still 21-plus.

My friend Will and I drove around a club called Waterworks at least once a week last summer and argued over who was going to get out of the car and ask what the age requirement was. I even called their hotline a few times and still couldn't get the information I needed. It didn't matter, since it was only a part of the random road trips that Will and I take around Southeastern Massachusetts. Getting ourselves lost, finding new places and finding our way back out again has almost become an activity for us. Our sense of direction of roads still stinks, but it's not going to stop us this summer from continuing on the open road.

I have been out of practice with my pool skills and know my friend Suzanne will wreck me next time we play. Suzanne is probably one of the only women who understands how my mind works, and I think vice versa. We say the same thing at once and finish each other's sentences sometimes. We used to just play pool and drive around aimlessly, venting whatever was on our minds that the guys in our group of friends just wouldn't understand. Sometimes it wasn't even venting but making crazy plans for the future and creating theories to explain random phenomena.

Now I'm just rambling, so I'll finish up. First, I have to give all my thanks to God for getting me through this semester. It's been rough but by the grace of God, I've survived. Now for just a few of the people at UMass who rock (though there are many more). The Class of 2001, best wishes for the future. I can honestly say I like and respect every graduating senior I've met, good luck to you all. My boyfriend Chris, for always sticking by me even when I go out of my way to spite him. Jeremy for putting up with me and joining forces me with me against the "evil" majors. Paul rocks because he still hangs out with me even though I continue to contest that Rhode Island isn't a real state. Everybody at UVC-19 and at the Office of ALANA Affairs for being my family away from home. Chris Badger, who can do everything and looks like Hugh Grant, is done with being on exchange and is going back to England. Chris is an amazing pool player, ping pong player, and knows Massachusetts politics better than any Mass. resident. Rumors are that he knows how to ride a unicycle too. The 2nd floor will miss his British charm and his stale jokes next year. Monica rocks because she held together our group presentation this week, without her we would have all failed. Pat, don't transfer! I'll miss you too much, and how else will we have hallway mime time! Bill Boyce for keeping things humorous and always keeping it real. To all my regular readers whoever you may be, thanks for joining me in my madness and look out for me in the future. Ben from the 2nd floor, Andy Bail in Northeast, and Aaron from Intervarsity: thanks for your constant feedback on my columns. I've really appreciated the conversations we've had, and hope this column didn't disappoint you guys too much. I'm not done yet, but I'll save it for next semester. Good luck on finals (I know I'll need it) and have a nice summer. Leave large tips for the girls that work at ice cream windows and don't get too lost if you're a road trip type of person. You might end up in Canada.

What once was written, can never be reclaimed...

KATIE LANDERS

The end of the semester is swiftly approaching and so I thought I would write my second to last column of the year as a little update to all of my editorial pieces. To those of you who read them or at least glanced upon the title you might find it a little interesting to go back and see what has happened throughout the course of the year. So my mom might be the only one who really gets it, but read on.

Someone said there's no place better to start than the beginning. I don't know who said it, but still we'll start from the beginning. If you remember reading the paper way back in September, I wrote a little column on DC food and the hazards of sleeping on the top bunk. Needless to say the DC food is still gross and I'm glad I won't have to eat it next year. I haven't once seen southern fried steak so maybe dining services gave up on that. I've also managed to not fall out of my bed once since the first week of school. In fact my bed is really comfortable, despite the fact I sleep about two inches from the ceiling. With the warm weather it has become a little stifling, but I've managed.

My favorite article I wrote this whole year was the one about people who ride bikes on campus. Over the winter there were fewer bikes for obvious reasons, people who ride them didn't want to be killed by ice.

> Thanksgiving came and went as it does every year. I wrote a column on all the things I was grateful for. I was forced to go the football game as I am every year and I did sit through dinner with my family and talked about nothing. I'm still thankful for Jason Varitek and Nomar, who should be back hopefully next month, but curly fries haven't made an appearance in the DC in a while. Someone should take care of that.

Of course they wouldn't ride their bikes for their own safety, who cares about everyone elses. However, I've noticed fewer bikes this spring. I'm not saying that this is in part of my doing, but I am very appreciative that people are taking the time to walk to class, if they are still going to class at all.

Spring is here and the Red Sox have started back up again. The team ended on a sour note last October, but only two weeks into the season the Sox had a strong home series against the Yankees. I attended the first game, and it was by far the best Red Sox game I've ever been to. My friend Phil and I were ten rows back from third base. In the bottom of the tenth with the Yankees leading by one run, Manny hit one into the gap to bring home Carl Everett and Jose Offerman, winning the game 3-2. Now I understand it was only the first time the teams played each other this season, but a game like that sets precedence.

The only disagreement I have with fellow Red Sox fans is the worshipping of Manny. I understand that he's a great player.

There is no doubt in my mind. But I've been to two games this season and whenever he gets up to bat the crowd stands and goes wild for him. Manny Ramirez is only one man. I know he'll do a lot of great things for the team this season, especially after the Yankees game I saw, but he can't be the whole team. I think fans are counting on him a little too much. It should be a great season. This could be the year.

Thanksgiving came and went as it does every year. I wrote a column on all the things I was grateful for. I was forced to go the football game as I am every year and I did sit through dinner with my family and talked about nothing. I'm still thankful for Jason Varitek and Nomar, who should be back hopefully next month, but curly fries haven't made an appearance in the DC in a while. Someone should take care of that.

Valentine's Day wasn't as much a disappointment as I thought it would be. In fact I got some really nice cards. My high school boyfriend sent me the sweetest card because he asked me if I had a Valentine and I said I didn't. No one has taken me to the Children's Museum in Boston. I think I'm going to take my brother there this summer. He's 7. He hasn't yet developed the ability to be a jerk.

I turned 20 without any big catastrophe. It wasn't that big of a deal. When someone asks me how old I am I'm a little struck by saying 20 but that's life. I got some "Happy Birthday"s from strangers which was nice. And there was that huge snow storm that got us two days off from class on my birthday, so I was able to celebrate in style with some of my friends. I'm now 10 months away from 21, another interesting birthday.

You may remember I wrote an Ed/Op about serious subjects just once. I didn't get a really good response from people. Most people just said they liked it better when I talked about lighter topics. Other people just blatantly called me an idiot. Not to my face but in written words.

Sticks and stones...Now you all know how I feel and I can be mindless again.

I wrote one article last semester when I got everyone's name in the paper that asked me. Suprisingly only two people have asked me to mention them this year. Lance, who recognized me from my picture in the dark on a Friday night after a party, what's up. Pat Coyle, please stop calling me Flange.

Just a month ago my editorial was about the housing staff here on campus. I got a lot of good response from that and I was happy. Not only did a lot of people who read it agree that students in the dorms are disgusting, but the housing staff liked it too. They smile and always say hi to me.

A handful of people have come up to me and said, "Hey hey, running the Boston Marathon." Now I'm suckered into it. I can't back out now. I plan on running the Baystate Marathon in October in an attempt to qualify for a number at the Boston Marathon, so I can be a true runner. On the ironic side, I got a piano, too.

You may remember I mentioned that I aspired to play the piano in high school and last semester, but quit due to lack of funds. Well, my Nanny called me the other day to let me know that I've inherited the family piano. So I guess I'll be taking it back up again.

After this I still have one left and I will write it to the seniors who are graduating. I've enjoyed writing for the Collegian this year a lot. I get a big kick out of it when people tell me they read my article, whether they liked it or not. I tried to write this year like you and I were friends. We might have been at one time, we might be now, or we may have never known each other. You know me a little now.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

EMILY VACANTI

Four years at UMass, and two years at the Collegian. I never thought I would have had as few regrets as I do.

They say that friendships last forever. Some do. Three years and eight months with Martin and less than five fights. Three years with Trenkle and I'm still speaking to him. Two years with the Collegian, and I still care about the staff.

Bad memories from over the past four years have almost gotten me to leave UMass, but Martin, White, and Trenkle have persisted and kept me here.

Here's a funny little story for all of you who think of me as completely innocent. One night I was at ABC and I got the attention of a very attractive guy. He signaled me to come over. As I got off of the bar stool, I fell over. This was after a Long Island Ice Tea and half of a Tequila Sunrise. I am not kidding. Martin caught me, and I have yet to live down that little fall.

I had my first Bloody Mary in Crabtree. Damn that drink is good. Thank you, Joe.

Over the past two semesters, I have lived in a variety of different buildings: Greenough, Dickinson, Thatcher, Brett, and Crabtree (different from the Bloody Mary time). Thank you to the residents of all of those rooms. I caught up on my sleep and gossip because of you.

I wish that I could give a shout out to everyone that has been there for me over the past four years. Not all of them have been on my top ten list, but they all deserved a spot. Thank you to all of the Brian's, Rich's, Jason's, Adam's, Kate's, Soane, Melissa's, Linda's, etc. I made it through four year at this place because of you guys, Zima, and DNA.

Brian and Dan, thank you again for taking me in both nights that I was sick. I still don't know how the vomit got onto the bottom of the trash can. Brian, never forget that you are my only non-relative friend that I let drive my car.

Thank you for everything from that night. I made it because of you.

Martin, Monica Lewinsky is not hot, and neither is Hillary Clinton.

Pete, I'll never forget the intellectual conversations that we had; and the semi-intellectual conversations that we attempted to have with Martin.

Sloan, two words: Harrison Ford.

Rich, get a new microwave.

Pat, you'll always be Quiet Boy/The Ladies Man to me.

Eric, It's been an experience.

Cathy, you could never be a skank. You just couldn't.

Kim, where's my cellular phone. Oh yeah, I'm using it.

Stacey, I can't make funny stories funny either.

Kobo, you are, for lack of a better word, unforgettable.

Smith and Despres, if I would have known, I wouldn't have bet either of you. Keep up the good hitting.

Sacco, the ball is supposed to go over the batting mound, not into the stands. Learn how to pitch.

White...hold on, you get a whole paragraph.

Ien and Dave, you guys both know how much you mean to me.

Elana, you made pathetic excuses for Thursday nights during my senior year very bearable. Thank you.

Tanya... hold on, you get a whole paragraph too.

I started writing down here two years ago to meet Seth Koenig. It was a shotgun decision that I will never be able to make sense of that made my last two years good. Thanks to everyone on the staff who really knows me and who caught me whenever I fell.

Thank you for everything from that night. I made it because of you.

White, it's finally your turn. Two years, and I never stopped respecting you. You cooled me down when I would get super mad, and you kept me laughing many a time. I wish you the best of luck for post-graduation life and forever.

Tanya, now you. I've never received so much enthusiastic support from someone. You've never put me down, but instead always complimented me and made me feel like somebody special. I will never forget you.

Thank you to Ien, Dave, Adam, Tanya, Rich, Robin, Martin, Linda and Sloane. You guys got me through this semester. I'll never forget you guys. Boyfriends come and go, especially for me, but friendships last forever.

Now for academics. Having gone through a few departments and a variety of majors, I have to admit that Sociology is excellent. Many of the professors have had a profoundly positive effect on me. I'm proud to be graduating in Sociology with Criminal Justice.

"It's better to have loved and lost than to never have loved at all." I've fallen in love twice since I've been here. No matter how much both breakups hurt, I'll never regret experiencing it.

If I had to give anyone a piece of advice for their college career, it would be to open yourself up to new experiences, and don't ever turn down an invitation unless it's sketchy. You'll be a better, more rounded out person because of it.

Liquor than beer; don't fear. Beer than liquor and you'll never be sicker. I never personally experienced this, but I've seen it happen.

Tequila + Mountain Dew = the perfect break-up cure. Thank you Liquors 44!

Try not to skip classes. Unless you write for the Collegian or are a psychic, it's a bad idea and you will regret it.

Sam, you made the top 25 list, while Seth is at a distant 24,999 on this UMass campus.

Two years at the Collegian, and I got a shirt.

Posthumous 2ge+her release a must

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

2GE+HER: THE MOVIE
Directed by Nigel Dick
Starring Kevin Farley, Evan Farmer, Noah Bastian, Alex Solowitz, Michael Cuccione
Available on video May 8

Finally, the day is almost upon us when MTV will release its first-ever made for TV movie, 2gether, on home video. Previously, the only way to see the movie was to catch one of its MTV re-airings, which were plentiful after the spring 2000 debut. A spoof of the boy band phenomenon, 2gether is undoubtedly one of the most under appreciated parodies in the history of pop culture... seriously.

The film, which eventually spawned a weekly series on MTV, takes us back to where it all began, as we meet Jerry O'Keefe (Evan Farmer), Chad Linus (Noah Bastian), Doug Linus (Kevin Farley), Mickey Parke (Alex Solowitz), and Jason "QT" McKnight (Michael Cuccione) for the first time.

It all starts with a man with a vision – Bob Buss – who is fired from his position of manager of the popular boy band Whoa. Buss is determined to keep his fledgling career alive by assembling the perfect boy band. To achieve his goal, Buss hunts across the US to compile the five guys who meet the five necessary boy band traits: The Heartthrob (Jerry), the rebel (Mickey), the shy one (Chad), the cute one (QT), and the older brother (Doug). After being assembled, the five guys brave boy band boot camp, learn the necessary dance moves, choose their favorite colors, and pick a name for themselves (Matchbox 30 is suggested, but turned down), and their fifteen minutes of fame begins.

Although many people will quickly dismiss a film like this because of the boy band element, it is by no means a film that was made solely to attract screaming teenage girls. While the plot is easily digestible enough for a younger crowd, the film still includes a wide variety of highly satirical and intelligent humor, and is right on in its parody of modern pop music. While groups like NSync and pop princesses like Britney Spears are routinely criticized for the subtle innuendo behind their music and dance steps, 2gether flat out says it.

Case in point: "I need a young thing to keep up with my pace/ to hold me in her arms and take me straight to second base," from the song "U+Me=Us (Calculus)," or, "In case we break up, can I still have sex with you?" from the song "Before We Say Goodbye." All the aspects of pop music that people poke fun at - the ridiculous lyrics, costumes, and "fake personalities" – 2gether partakes in to the utmost extreme, which is precisely what makes them so funny.

The film's obvious strength lies in the unique and quirky personalities that encompass the five guys. While Jerry is the least comical of the bunch, the other four are each a riot in their own unique way. After all, any boy band with a 35 year-old overweight man (Kevin Farley) in it has got to be cool. Chris Farley fans will notice striking similarities in the mannerisms and physical comedy style of Kevin Farley's character Doug, the brother of Chris.

Meanwhile, Doug's younger brother Chad is particularly strong in the role of the dimwitted shy one, and is a human one-liner machine throughout the film. QT McKnight – the cute one – plays the role of a 15 year-old wannabe playa with a terminal illness, who in one memorable scene makes out with his own hand, and spouts such immortal lines as "I hope at the hotel there's a lot of girls and not enough sleeping bags, so me and a girl have to share one."

But perhaps the most uproarious character is Mickey Parke, the bad boy of the group, who plays the role of the ultimate poseur. Mickey, who insists on wearing a bulletproof vest because "you saw what happened to Biggie and 2pac, someone my position has gotsta be careful," takes the "bad ass" character to the next level, and perhaps one or two levels beyond that as well.

If one still isn't sold on the fact that they should give 2gether a try, perhaps you'll be persuaded by the fact that the film was directed by Nigel Dick, a highly respected music video director for the likes of Oasis. Dick did an excellent job in making 2gether as the LA Times put it, "What Spinal Tap was to 80's heavy metal."

Unfortunately, if after renting this movie you develop an interest in the group, you'll be a little late joining the boy bandwagon. Since the movie's successful premiere last spring, the series (which featured more edgy humor than the movie) was canceled by MTV after the death of Michael Cuccione, just days after his 16th birthday, due to complications from pneumonia. As the esteemed Music Editor of the Collegian so aptly put it, R.I.P QT.

Overall, 2gether succeeds in being an intelligent parody of boy bands. The movie's plot is rather simplistic, however the film makes its mark with its well developed cast of characters, and its tongue and cheek kind of humor. Whether you like boy bands or not, 2gether provides a decent helping of laughs.

ONE NIGHT AT McCOOL'S
Directed by Harald Zwart
With Liv Tyler, Matt Dillon, Paul Reiser and John Goodman
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

It would feel unethical, almost dirty, to criticize a movie whose writer recently died. As part of being a journalist, though, one must contend with the equilibrium between what's morally right and wrong, and also what is honest and true. One Night At McCool's has the sentimental credit at the end that says "In Loving Memory of Stan Seidel," the man who penned the quirky script.

In it, Liv Tyler plays lewel, a feisty, sumptuous young woman who meets three hapless men one night at McCool's, a local bar. One man is a lawyer who is having marital problems (Reiser), another is a widowed cop (Goodman), and the third is the slow-witted bartender (Dillon). In the course of the night's proceedings, lewel shoots her boyfriend Utah (Andrew Dice Clay, barely recognizable behind his biker beard) and finds that these three lovelorn men will do anything for her to keep her out of trouble.

Tyler certainly has the goods to capture men's fancies, as she has done so many times before (Armageddon, That Thing You Do!), and here it shows double-time. From her dangerous curves to the ditzy and adorable Marilyn Monroe demeanor, she fits the role to a tee (and a very tight one at that). Much like Charlize Theron did in her breakthrough role Two Days In The Valley, Tyler takes a primarily male-oriented film and dominates it with her irresistibility, while not upstaging her gentleman cast mates.

As for the men themselves, One Night At McCool's is fortunate enough to have a talented ensemble that is also very well versed for comedy. Reiser, a founding father of Must-See TV on Mad About You, and jovial John Goodman's several years on Roseanne (and many film projects to boot) make them both suitable for a movie that's lighthearted like their aforementioned television shows. Matt Dillon, who possesses a knack for slow-witted characters (or is that just how he is?), is still riding the wave of one of the most successful comedies of all time, There's Something About Mary (which, coincidentally, is also about three men falling for the same, klutzy woman). The cast is rounded out by Michael Douglas, who also produced the movie, as a hired gun sent to kill lewel. He is the best part of the entire movie, even though he has the smallest role. His 1970's hair-do and dry comedy take a while to register before the humor fully comes across. When Douglas is asked if he trusts Dillon's character, he replies, "Yes," and then casually adds, "but I do kill people." Douglas proves not only that he is a multi-talented actor who excels in all film genres, but also that a lot can be done with the smaller parts in films.

Overall, however, the movie doesn't really make you laugh out loud, like the coming attractions might lead you to think. There are a few moments when laughter gets the better of you (such as Goodman catching Reiser in a leather and chain S&M outfit) but for the most part, the humor is dark and bizarre (witness a DVD player killing a man, and a trash dumpster falling out of the sky on another). Unlike current films quoting themselves as comedies, One Night At McCool's doesn't resort to toilet humor, so older crowds are sure to love it. At the same time, this could be the film's downfall: I still have yet to see evidence that young audiences can digest and appreciate clean comedy.

This movie does have a clever spin, however. We see the story of what happened that night at McCool's three different times, first by Dillon, then Reiser, and lastly Goodman. There is fun overlap between the three versions, and then a climax where Utah's brother (also played by Clay) comes a-knocking for some revenge. If the movie until now has left you surprised, you'll never expect the ending where an extremely violent shoot-out takes place. Yet the film goes on in its cheery manner, and we're still stuck wondering, "What the hell was that?"

One Night At McCool's certainly is different than one could ever expect. You're thrown back and forth between like and dislike, comedy and drama. The amount of talent behind it, though, is clearly evident, and the talented and likeable actors save it from being anything less than a pre-summer piece of entertaining fare.

Comic visits UMass

Comedian/Actor Dave Chappelle will be visiting the University of Massachusetts this Sunday at 8 p.m. at the Fine Arts Center. Chappelle, who has starred in the films Half Baked, Robin Hood: Men in Tights and You've got Mail, and has also appeared in The Nutty Professor, Blue Streak, and Con Air. He is visiting the UMass campus has part of a comedy tour he has been doing since last year.

Chappelle has been performing stand-up comedy since he was 14 years old and by the young age of 17 had a style and fan base in his home-town of Washington, D.C. His social commentary brand of comedy has gained recognition by critics and the public. He has appeared on Def Comedy Jam and has had his own HBO comedy special, Killin' Em Softly.

If you wish to be a stand up comic and open for Dave Chappelle on Sunday night, you can audition for the show today outside the Student Union. Also if you have a bad hair day story you can go to the "Hairlarious Highlights Awards" site and enter your "Bad Hair Day" story. Contestants will give a confessional on their worst hair day ever on a digital video camera and the funniest one will receive a package of Salon Selectives and will be put in a drawing for a six-day, five-night trip in Paris.

"When Comics Attack" is sponsored by the ComedyLab, Pontiac Sunfire, College Television Network, Salon Selectives, and Coty Rimmel London.

Kevin Smith talks about his newest film project

By Angela Williams
Daily Lobo (U. New Mexico)

(U-WIRE) ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. – Something good finally sauntered out of New Jersey. That's right, folks – Redbank, N.J., somehow produced a comedic genius. What else is there to say about hit independent film writer, director, actor and comic book connoisseur Kevin Smith?

To go down the résumé of Smith is a time-consuming endeavor but enjoyable nonetheless. He is the writer of the 1994 cult hit Clerks about disgruntled convenience store workers that bedazzled audiences with its obscene wit and memorable one-liners from hell. The film knocked out the Sundance Film Festival and Miramax picked it up, making Smith an instant paramour for people across the country with too much time on their hands.

Clerks also introduced the world to Jay and Silent Bob, the two coolest, shoplifting, small-time drug dealing losers the world has ever known. Smith, who created the warped duo, played the part of Silent Bob, the quiet counterpart of the obnoxious stoner Jay, played by Smith's friend and actor Jason Mewes.

Smith admitted that he isn't the most masterful of actors and he doesn't really mind his character.

"I just bug my eyes out and give Jay a scornful look," he said. "It wasn't real difficult."

He said the difficult part is directing and that cruising on adrenaline is one of the only things that gets him through his movies.

"It was tough, a lot of jumping back and forth," Smith said. "But it's way better than jockeying a register for a living."

Next in line for Smith was the all too unappreciated Mallrats, starring

An open letter to the mutant bees on campus

I hate the damn mutant bees.

The first night I slept at UMass as a freshman, a bee landed on my face in the middle of the night. Mind you, it was a non-mutant bee, but the stage was set for future confrontation. A bee genocide followed, with my roommate, the esteemed Rob Schulze, and I amassing a death toll upwards of 50 bees, all barrowing into our dorm from a tunnel connecting 300 Webster to their hive outside. I was also stung by a non-mutant bee while waiting for a Peter Pan bus last year.

These previous run-ins with the bee population of UMass didn't sour my attitude toward normal, non-mutant, blue-collar bees. It's the mutant bees with whom I have a bone to pick.

Mutant bees are those bloated, bowling ball sized bees that float around campus. Home base seems to be the courtyard area between the Morril Science buildings. It's here where the bees talk strategy, namely how they will annoy and embarrass me.

The biggest of the mutant bees (I call him Vito) is the guardian of the bus stop in front of Hasbrouck. Most of the time, Vito simply levitates in one spot, his belly prominently displayed, and keeps everyone walking by him at about a five foot radius. Vito is essentially that ball guy wearing the pink shirt starting at everybody; he's just daring you to say or do something, because then it's on.

Vito's trademark aggressive maneuver is the "rear-miss." This is where Vito, with a buzz about as subtle as a lawnmower, gets in your face and then flies straight upward at the last second. It's as if Vito is saying "Whoops! Didn't see ya there, chief!" Sure you didn't Vito.

Of course, the purpose of this tactic, sometimes done (in tribute) by other mutant bees, is to transform me into a freak that flails his arms wildly. This is inevitably done in the presence of what I call a "bee ally," a person that is never bothered by bees, and shakes their head in pity and shame at anyone who might have a bee in their face.

Mutant bees, can we call a truce? I live with the guilt of the bee holocaust of fall 1998 every day. Please tell me this recent aggression is not just petty vengeance.

Dazed and Confused alum Jason London, and Joey Lauren Adams. Shannen Doherty, Ben Affleck and the newly christened actor/professional skateboarder Jason Lee. Although the cast delivered Smith's twisted dialogue with unremitting glee, the movie bombed. The next film would make Smith an independent film god.

Chasing Amy shot Mallrats alum Affleck to stardom and certainly didn't kill the careers of Adams and Lee. The movie was a slight departure from Smith's fart joke scripts and introduced a more serious side — although Star Wars jokes were still included. The movie follows a comic book artist, played by Affleck, who falls in love with a lesbian, Adams, while his homophobic best friend, Lee, scorns him. The shocking part of this movie was that Smith actually wrote his character Silent Bob more than four words, but he delivered his lines with a purity that shocked all lovers of the Jersey Chronicles.

Dogma marked Smith's last film and also angered religious fundamentalists nationally. The religion-bashing movie starred heavy hitters such as Chris Rock and Salma Hayek and also brought together a familiar cast from Smith's previous films. Affleck and Lee played a fallen angel and a fallen muse, one bent on getting back home and the other making sure it happens so the world can be destroyed. The newcomers also included Matt Damon and Men In Black's Linda Fiorentino, who plays the distant descendant of Jesus Christ, who's out to stop the angels.

Fans of Smith's quirky, obnoxious characters will get one last chance to delve into Smith's latest movie, Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back. The film opens Aug. 24 and promises to be one the funniest Smith movies to date.

"There's some satire, some kind of smart humor," he said. "Anyone who's kind of come into the game will be like, 'What the fuck did you do?'"

In the bottom of the eighth, Gorneault added the exclamation point to the Minuteman victory as he shellacked a Bellavance pitch over the wall for his second long ball of the day and ninth of the season.

Sophomore Paul Washenko pitched a 1-2-3 ninth to make it 19 out of the last 20 for the Maroon and White hurlers.

The Minutemen are back in action this weekend, facing George Washington University in a crucial A-10 series.

"[This weekend] is very important, especially to get off to a good start," Altieri said. "This weekend and then the middle of next week, we need to take a lot of [games]. If we don't, we won't have a chance at the postseason."

The Colonials are a strong 31-17, with an impressive 19 of those victories coming at home. For Stone, the GW series will be a tough proving ground that will help gauge the postseason chances of his club.

"We need to play our best baseball of the season," Stone said. "We need to be solid; we need good pitching, good defense, we need to swing the bats. If that's the case it will be a good series. We've got to be ready to go."

The first pitch of Saturday's doubleheader is scheduled for noon.

Softball sweeps Brown; Post-season approaches

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

This weekend is about pride and momentum.

The No. 23 Massachusetts softball team (36-11, 18-0 Atlantic 10) has already clinched its seventh consecutive A-10 regular season title. No matter what happens this weekend, UMass will be in Dayton, Ohio in just one week for the A-10 championships – fighting for an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament.

This weekend at the UMass Softball Complex, the Maroon and White will be looking to sweep three games against conference rival Rhode Island (28-25, 10-8 A-10) and close out the A-10 regular season with an undefeated record while making a very strong statement to the entire A-10 community.

With just four games left before post-season play begins, UMass needs to build some momentum – a repeat of last year's performances against the Rams would be a good start. UMass swept last year's two game series against URI last year. The Minutewomen outscored the Rams 21-0 in the doubleheader.

The twin bill saw then-freshman Brandi Cross hit her ninth home run of the season – breaking the UMass record, while then-sophomore Jen Hadley notched win number 10 on the season in game one's shutout.

Last year's embarrassing losses dashed URI's hopes of a post-season berth, something the Rams have certainly not forgotten. This year's URI squad is much improved. At 28-25, the Rams are eight wins better than they were last year at this time.

UMass batters will have to deal with Rhode Island's Gwen Rack – one of the top pitchers in the A-10. Last week's Pitcher of the Week, Rack tossed a no-hitter against La Salle en route to the award. The junior flamethrower has compiled an impressive eight straight victories – keeping the Rams over .500 and in the hunt for a playoff birth.

The Minutewomen will counter with a 1-2-3 combination of junior Jen Hadley, senior Carrie Jeffries, and sophomore Kaila Holtz. Hadley has been A-10 Pitcher of the Week twice this season, while Jeffries has shut down the opposition – posting a 1.53 ERA on the season. Holtz, meanwhile, has amassed an awe inspiring 11-1 record on the season.

Clean-up hitter Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler will lead the UMass offense. Scooter is the tied for the team lead in batting average (.331), and leads the team in home runs (6), RBI (38), slugging (.540), and on-base percentage (.430).

While UMass needs the victories to build on, URI is desperate to make the A-10 post-season something it can accomplish with a series win. The desperation of two teams will be on display this weekend-desperation typically leads to hard-fought, exciting games.

Thursday afternoon saw the Minutewomen travel to Providence, RI to challenge the Brown Bears. UMass dominated its opponent, essentially using the doubleheader to get back on track after a tough loss at Boston College earlier in the week.

UMass 6, Brown 3

The Minutewomen welcomed Holtz back to the mound after an extended absence due to an arm injury. The hurler impressed in her return, scattered four hits while striking out seven and improved her record to 11-1 on the season.

The Maroon and White fell behind early, but bounced back in the fourth, scoring all six of its runs. Senior Debbie Tomoguchi came up with the big two-run double and scored later in the inning. Junior Ashley Bakken contributed with an RBI and a run scored.

UMass 9, Brown 0

Jeffries stole the show on the mound in the nightcap. The California native embarrassed the Bears – tossing a one-hit shutout as the Minutewomen won the contest easily. The rights walked zero while striking out five. Her record improves to 11-4 on the season.

Sophomore Anna Perez and Bakken led the way with a pair of 2-for-3 performances. Perez added two RBI and a run scored while Bakken crossed the plate twice for the Minutewomen. Round tripper Wheeler smacked (6), a three-run homer and Junior Teri Rooney (2), a two-run homer.

With the two losses, Brown closes its 2001 campaign with a 7-38-1 record.

an Ingrallea hat trick to up their all-time record against UMass to 17-3-1.

Despite the big advantage in the all-time series, the Minutewomen defeated the Owls twice last season, including the pivotal A-10 Championship game. But that was then and this is now, and Temple will have the momentum from last month's victory and the home field advantage.

"We have to maintain our composure for the full 60 minutes," said Barnes. "We had a 10 minute spurt where we let things get out of control [in the last meeting] and we need to stop them on their set attack. If we can control them defensively and get the same aggressive production we have the past couple weeks, hopefully things will work out."

The Minutewomen head to the city of Brotherly Love with a big bulls-eye on their back. But will hope to return with something else – the A-10 Championship Trophy.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You may be feeling as though something is hanging over you today, and, indeed, later on you'll be compelled to address a hidden issue.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You may find yourself going back and forth all day long today. There's a reason for this that will be made clear later.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You may have to make nice someone today merely to open a window of opportunity for yourself in the nick of time.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Your surroundings may change quite suddenly today, and you're going to have to get used to a new way of doing things as a result.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Focus on your own long-term plans today. Seek out the answers to some difficult questions. Focus on cooperative efforts at home.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Tact is required today, and you can benefit greatly by engaging in polite negotiations revolving around a sensitive issue. Don't be too guarded.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – What you do and what you say must be in sync today, or you're not likely to gain the confidence of others. You must be credible at all times.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You may learn something quite surprising about a friend or loved one today which actually reflects on you in a highly unexpected way.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You may misinterpret the information given you during the first part of the day, and, as a result, you must spend time reorganizing and catching up.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You must be sure that you supply others with all the information they need in order to help you as much as possible today and in the future.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You must be sure to acknowledge those who have helped you get where you are today – whether or not it is your final destination.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Concentrate on focusing on your chosen goal in a manner that allow you to avoid distraction and to keep yourself pure in thought and action.

Lorden fences don't hold up

UMass hits six deep in win

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

After a tough loss, there's nothing better than going home.

The Massachusetts baseball team (18-16, 8-5 Atlantic 10) enjoyed some time in the sun yesterday at Lorden Field as it obliterated Hartford 13-1. The Minutemen launched six homers on the day, as senior captain Nick Gorneault and sophomore Jeff Altieri each hit two bombs. Brandon White added seven strong innings in his first start to secure the win for the Maroon and White.

"It was good to get the confidence," head coach Mike Stone said. "It was a fun ballgame; everyone had a chance to play, everybody's happy. It was a good game."

The Hawks started strong in the top of the first as senior centerfielder Matt Marchese singled with one out. Senior Gavin Clark attempted to throw out Marchese at first and his throw got by Altieri to allow Marchese to go to second. Two batters later, designated hitter Miguel Marichal singled him home up the middle to give them the 1-0 lead.

But that was only temporary. In the bottom of the first, Connell Clark drew a one-out walk and trotted home when Altieri roped a two-run homer over the left field fence.

Both teams went scoreless until the fourth, when the Minutemen started the offense up again. Junior Aaron Senez led off the inning with a walk. Mike Kulak followed by dropping down a sacrifice bunt that was thrown away by Hawk starter John Manning. Senez went all the way around to score on the play and Kulak moved to third. He scored on a Tom Ellerbrook sacrifice fly to give the Maroon and White a 4-1 lead.

The fifth saw lefty Brian Darcy enter the game for Hartford. Gorneault led things off with a single and Altieri brought him home on his second longball of the day – a deep shot the other way – his eighth of the season. The elder Clark was hit by the next offering, and promptly swiped second and third. Darcy's pickoff attempt went wide of first to score Clark and move Senez to second. Kulak then singled him home to make the score 8-1. He advanced to second on a passed ball and stole third. He scored on yet another sacrifice fly by Ellerbrook to make the score 9-1 after five.

The festivities continued in the sixth inning when Jason Bellavance entered the game for the Hawks. After the younger Clark popped out to shortstop, Gorneault launched a home run that just cleared the fence. Two batters later, Gavin Clark hit a mammoth shot that made it on to the roof of the skating rink beyond the right field wall. Senez sent the next pitch over the wall in right center to make it three home runs out of four pitches for UMass.

"I wish we had seen somebody with a little more juice because we're going to see some good pitchers this weekend," Stone said.

On the other side, White was cruising, as he retired 13 out of the last 14 batters he faced. For the game, he allowed three hits and three walks, striking out four in his seven innings of work. Eric Chown came in for the eighth inning and struck out the side in order.

"Brandon [White] came in and struggled a little with the location early, but as he got used to being out there, he settled down and had more command," Stone said. "It was good, he had a lot of confidence."

Women's lax targeted in Philadelphia

Minutewomen gear up for A-10 title defense

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

More than 100 years ago, our nation's Founding Fathers convened in Philadelphia to determine the future of America.

This weekend, the best women's lacrosse teams that the Atlantic 10 conference has to offer will do the same, but with a slightly different prize at stake: the A-10 Championship.

On Friday, Massachusetts takes on Duquense while Temple battles St. Joseph's in the semi-finals with the winners meeting on Saturday afternoon.

Despite the presence of two Philadelphia based teams – Temple and St. Joseph's – the one team that everybody will be gunning for is the defending champion Minutewomen. Last year UMass (6-9, 3-2 A-10) captured its first ever A-10 title with a dramatic 3-2 overtime victory over Temple in Amherst.

"We're going in right now as the underdogs based on how we played against Temple and Duquense (0-2 this season)," said senior co-captain Fay Naber. "But after winning last years tournament it's really important to have pretty much the same showing this year because people are after us."

Naber, along with fellow senior Rachel Ingraffea, will be the focal points of a Maroon and White offense that has scored 10 or more goals in four of its last five games. The pair, who were named to the A-10 All-Conference Team on Thursday, occupy the top two spots on the UMass scoring charts.

Ingraffea led the way with 35 goals and one assist for 36 points while Naber tallied 17 goals and 16 assists for 33 points. Both point totals are career highs for the duo.

While Ingraffea and Naber will attempt to get the job done in the offensive zone for the Minutewomen, fellow senior Jen Nardi and the rest of the UMass defense will have their work cut out for them against Duquense on Friday. The Dukes defeated UMass for the first time ever earlier this season (12-9 on April 13) and have five of the top 15 scorers in the conference this season.

Senior Meghan Hungate and junior Katie Harner ranked second and third in the conference in scoring with 70 and 64 points, respectively. Hungate was one of three A-10 players to tally 50 or more goals this season while Harner led the conference with 32 assists and collected eight points in the victory over the Minutewomen.

In the first meeting between these two combatants, the Dukes jumped out to a 7-1 halftime lead and held on for a 12-9 victory despite a furious UMass rally early in the second half that cut the lead to 7-6.

"Our offensive woes in the first Duquense game in the half (just one goal) were directly related to our ball handling through the midfield," said UMass coach Phil Barnes. "In the past few weeks we've cleaned it up so if we can take care of the midfield transition we should be better than UMass? I don't think so.

"We think UMass is one of the best team's in the country. They have very good lacrosse players and they're well coached so we're going to have to play very smart to be in the game."

Ranked No. 12 early in the season, Brown (6-7, 2-4 Ivy) comes into the game riding a three-game winning streak. Their most recent victory coming on a 14-9 win over Fairfield, the Bears knocked off conference foe Cornell 9-8 in overtime a week earlier to pull the reality from a Big Red tourney appearance.

And they'll look to do the same on Saturday against UMass.

Maroon and White post-season lies in a Hofstra or Towson collapse in the America East Tournament or a Virginia stumble to Butler.

But Brown's head coach, Scott Nelson, said yesterday that UMass "certainly deserves" one of the five at-large bids that the NCAA committee will dish out on Sunday.

"They are one of the best teams we've seen all year and they should be in that tournament, without a doubt," he said. [The teams you should be comparing UMass to] are Hofstra and Towson. Do they have any wins that are any better than UMass? I don't think so.

"We think UMass is one of the best team's in the country. They have very good lacrosse players and they're well coached so we're going to have to play very smart to be in the game."

Weekend decisions could lead to surprises

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

The Division I Men's Lacrosse Championship is scheduled to begin in eight days.

Brown will not be invited. And neither will Massachusetts if it loses to the Bears Saturday at Stevenson field.

After beating Rutgers Wednesday, 17-7, the Minutemen are just one win away from completing a 12-2 regular season – a campaign stained with two one-goal losses – UMass' best run since 1989 when the Maroon and White won 15 times under legendary coach Richard F. Garber.

Still, a win this weekend in Providence doesn't guarantee a bid. It only situates UMass at high priority for the post-season.

Bucknell went an undefeated 12-0 in 1996 – winning the Patriot League Championship and sweeping the league honors. But the Bison – ranked in the nation's Top 20 in eight statistical categories – were not selected to compete in the NCAA Championship.

"[Bucknell] beat Army to win its league that year, but Army went to the NCAA Tournament and Bucknell didn't," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

"I'd like to think that [beating Brown secures us a spot in the tournament]. But I have no idea. The guys on the selection committee will make those decisions on Sunday."

The championship is a 12-team, single-elimination tournament. One independent team is chosen from each of the three geographical regions – Northeast, Southeast and West. Four conferences – the America East Conference, Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC), Ivy Group and Patriot League – receive automatic qualification for their champion. The lasting teams are selected at-large.

UMass (11-2, 5-1 ECAC) tied for first place in the ECAC this year with Georgetown. But the Hoyas' 9-8 victory over the Minutemen on April 21 granted them the automatic qualifier.

With that spot taken, critics say the only chance for a

Annual Herbfest sure to promise tasty treat

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The Department of Plant and Soil Sciences will showcase a variety of products made directly herbs at its 15th annual Herb Fest tomorrow from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

The event will help to display the works of University of Massachusetts students in the Plant Soils class "Herbs, Spices and Medicinal Plants" The event has been held annually since 1987 and has drawn up to 125 student participants for the event.

The event was founded by Lyle E. Craker, a professor in the department, as a way to inform the campus community of the role that herbs have played in the evolution of today's modern conveniences.

"Herbfest is a day of celebration for herbs and students, an opportunity to show others the wonderful world of herbs, spices, and medicinal plants" Craker said. "At Herbfest, student projects are highlighted with displays and presentations throughout the day."

Projects this year are designed to highlight aspects of culture and processing as well as the varied uses of herbs, spices and medicinal plants.

In addition, the projects will showcase many of the capacities in which herbs have been used throughout the ages such as for religious reasons, culinary, medicinal and cosmetic purposes.

In the past, student projects have included bath vinegars and hair rinses made out of chamomile, rosemary, sage, thyme and lavender. Informational pamphlets about the products along with free samples of them were available at previous Herbfests.

"Herbs have been used intimately by societies for centuries in ceremonial and medicinal traditions," Craker said in a previous Collegian story. "Herbs stimulate all of the human's five senses with their smells, flavors, colors and textures."

Students, in addition to herbal beauty products, have also showcased medicinal projects. In past years, students have created remedies out of herbs intended to cure upset stomachs, teas guaranteed to soothe migraine headaches, acne lotions, treatment for insect bites and herbal treatments to ease a sore throat.

Herbal foods have also been popular in the past featuring such items as salsa, cinnamon and sugar cookies, mint chocolate chip cookies and basil pizza.

Besides showcasing their projects, students will also offer samples of items made with herbs and spices and offer advice to anyone that is interested in starting their own herb garden.

"Herbal treats are available for sampling and a garden of herbs is featured [at the event]," he said.

The UMass Horticulture Club will also be on hand to sell starter plants to anyone that is interested in growing some of the herbs that were displayed.

The event is free and open to the public.

The European Court of Human Rights ruled Friday that in four separate cases the United Kingdom had violated the "right to life" of Irish and British citizens in their efforts to keep the peace in Northern Ireland.

The court's decision however, does not classify the killings of the fourteen individuals, some with suspected Irish Republican Army ties, as illegal. Rather, it found that the procedural and inconsistent treatment of the victims' families by the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the government was sufficient enough to warrant damages totaling 115,000 pounds to the families of the victims. The court's decision came on the anniversary of the death of Bobby Sands, a minister of Parliament and Irish political prisoner, who died twenty years ago in a prison hunger strike to protest British oppression.

"The Court was not prepared to conduct, on the basis largely of statistical information and selective evidence, an analysis of incidents over the past thirty years with a view to establishing whether they disclosed a practice by security forces of using disproportionate force," the decision reads. "However, even though statistically it appeared that the majority of people shot by the security forces were from the Catholic or nationalist community, the Court did not consider that statistics could in themselves disclose a practice which could be classified as discriminatory."

The Royal Ulster Constabulary is the police force of Northern Ireland. All of the killings involved RUC officers. In one case, Kelly & Others, British soldiers and RUC officers preemptively ambushed and killed eight IRA soldiers and one civilian. Other cases involved the murders of three unarmed civilians, an assassination of a Sinn Fein member, and the 1992 killing of Pearse Jordan. Jordan was shot in the back three times by RUC officers in Belfast, Northern Ireland. His father, Hugh Jordan, petitioned the court.

Sinn Fein, the oldest political party in Ireland, has long felt that RUC uses excessive force in the policing of the six counties of Northern Ireland. Gerry Kelly, a Sinn Fein spokesman, explained the verdict's meaning.

"[It's] the single most important legal judgment in 30 years of conflict. British policy, the RUC, and the legal and judicial system which they created, stand indicted before the world," Kelly said in a Sinn Fein statement. "The families of those who were killed, The Relatives for Justice and their legal teams are to be commended for their hard work and perseverance."

Sinn Fein party leader Gerry Adams called on the British government to "in light of this judgment, to invite the United Nations in to carry out a full investigation into the overt and covert activities of British state forces."

British Secretary of State (Northern Ireland) John Reid stressed the fact that the killings, even the deaths of civilians, were found to be "not illegal."

"These are lengthy judgments of nearly three hundred pages which will require careful consideration, but I welcome the fact that the Court has not made any finding that these deaths amounted to unlawful killing," Reid said in a released statement. "The criticisms are of procedures, the investigations, not the deaths themselves. We will want to study those criticisms seriously."

Sinn Fein disagrees. Vice President of the party Pat Doherty reacted angrily.

"The claim by British Secretary of State John Reid that today's European Court ruling against the British

Performers reach for the stars

By Andrew C. Chin
Collegian Correspondent

Friends, family and those who just wanted to try something new were treated to a very special performance on a weekend in early April. The group of performers was made up of people who were "developmentally disabled," and also included people who weren't disabled.

The performance was called "Reach for the Stars," presented by Amherst Leisure Services and performed at the Amherst Regional Middle School Auditorium. The "Reach for the Stars" program was designed to bring out the best in each troupe of performers, known as the "Open Arm Rainbow" Players. The program did just that, as each person worked hard to put together a dazzling display of improvisations, dance, musical renditions, jokes and creative story telling.

For Ezzell Floranina, who has directed the open arts project for four years, it's been an important project for her to work with the Amherst community. She sees it as her obligation to make this group's multiculturalism its strength, a place where a rainbow of people of different races and different abilities can converge to be respected, not segregated from the rest of the community.

"The whole show has come about from improvisations workshops that we engaged in since January of last year," said Ezzell. "January to April was really a kind of getting a sense of what is about to be put on stage, and how we can have something to show people. And so it was a collage of pieces, a kind of cabaret of a variety show."

This month's two showings of "Reach for the Stars" have an added improvement of being more intentional, with a clearer purpose than last year's. As Ezzell explains, "It takes some bits from last year and expands it through the improvisations that they've been doing."

The preparations for April's performance have resulted in a series of well-done pieces.

In "Circle Improv," the Players formed a semi-circle around two people whose job it was to constantly be in a form of action, whether swimming, biking, skating, etc. At any point in the piece, a performer could be allowed to tap in and replace that person in mid-action. Also, as the action progresses, conversation was added as well as a third person who could enter the fray if necessary.

In "Frame It," the Players chose a pose that they would hold for a specified period of time and under suggestions given by the crowd. For example, if the suggestion was "I feel angry when," then the Players would hold a position that fit well with that emotion. The audience was then asked to share their "thought bubble" from that moment of frozen time.

In "Interpreter," a pair was chosen in the group to perform a "scene" suggested from the crowd, where one person was the interpreter and the other the interpretee. The situations included a speaker at a graduation, a foreign exchange teacher, a visiting doctor, as well as other suggestions taken from the crowd.

In "Baby of Mine," a child's abnormality was a main cause for concern for one parent, played by Stephanie Parker. In the end, the child's uniqueness surmounted his "abnormali-

Alumni talk on STPEC

By Cedrick G. Rogers
Collegian Correspondent

The end of the semester is fast approaching. For some students it is simply just the end of this semester, and they have already pre-registered for classes in the Summer and or next Fall. For other students though, this is just the end. The culmination of however many years here at the University of Massachusetts. After graduation, they will enter the next phase of their lives.

Recently the Women's Studies and STPEC programs co-sponsored a panel discussion featuring five alumni talking about their experiences in the working world. All of them are now activists, and they all attribute at least part of their success to the Women's Studies and or STPEC programs.

Cecile "CC" Sullivan graduated two years ago with degrees in Women's Studies and Nutrition. She now works for the Vermont Campaign to End Childhood Hunger as a Nutrition Program Specialist.

When she initially applied to jobs out of college, Sullivan said she was turned down due to lack of experience. She then decided to work at America Corps for a year, and while there, she gained organizing skills.

Sullivan wanted a job she could be passionate about. She said that current students should take her lead.

"Don't just apply for something because it is going to look good on a resume," Sullivan said. "Be sure you are getting out of it what you really want."

She encouraged students to follow what interests them, even if it means that they will not graduate in four years.

Linda Vannoni graduated three years ago with a STPEC degree. She is a union organizer in New Haven, Conn.

When she asked students in the audience how many of them thought they could get a job that would make a difference in people's lives and also paid good money, few raised their hands. She acknowledged that it's hard to do, and considers herself to be one of the lucky ones since she has done it.

Vannoni explained how she knew that she wanted to be an activist and used her time at UMass to foster her future as one.

"STPEC allowed me to do that activism and get credit for it," Vannoni said. "If you can really figure out a neat deal, you can get financial aid and get paid to do organizing."

Vannoni admitted that being a union organizer is more demanding than the average 9 to 5 job, but said if you are

Arkansas

A small earthquake registering a mere 4.4 on the Richter scale shook central Arkansas on Thursday night.

The epicenter was about 15 miles northeast of Conway, and tremors were believed to have been felt all the way at the Oklahoma, Missouri and Mississippi borders. Over 15 counties have reported feeling the quake.

No major injuries were sustained, or any serious damage done. According to the US Geological Survey, the quake only shook shelves and may have broken a few glasses.

California

A group of Disneyland officials have begun an inspection of all the trees on the theme park's grounds after a tree fell on a group of visitors on Friday.

27 people, including children, were injured when the tree, which had been in the park since its opening in 1955, toppled. Nobody was seriously hurt, however two Disneyland employees suffered minor injuries.

The tree fell directly on a food wagon in Frontierland. A Disneyland spokesman said that they believed the age of the tree as well as high winds may have contributed to the fall.

The fall comes just a month after Disneyland announced that it would station full-time city paramedics in the Anaheim parks in case of emergencies.

The city of San Francisco announced plans to adopt transgender health benefits for city employees last week. The new benefits would cover everything from sex changes to mastectomies, and possibly hormone therapy. The city's Board of Supervisors voted 9-2 in favor of the benefits.

So far there are 14 city employees who have been identified as transgender. To receive the new benefits, employees would have to work for the city for at least a year. There would also be a lifetime benefit cap of $50,000. Persons seeking sex changes would have to pay 15 percent out of their pockets if they use a doctor from the city health network. They would otherwise have to pay 50 percent for a doctor outside the system.

The city may adopt the international standard that has been set by the International Gender Dysphoria Association. Under these guidelines, employees seeking the benefits would have to go through a year of counseling and therapy and must also prove that they have struggled with gender identification in the past. Many people also must be treated for depression or drug use. The final step is to have a board of experts to vote on whether or not the candidate is truly eligible.

Though there have been many opponents of the new plan, many see it as a logical extension of the city's already liberal domestic partner benefits law and a step against gender discrimination. Other California cities such as Oakland, San Jose and Berkeley have already expressed interest in adopting similar benefit packages.

Canada, the Netherlands, Denmark and Germany are countries that already pay for their employees' sex-change benefits. The new law in California would make it the first city in the United States to follow suit.

Texas

An 11 year-old girl was reunited with her family after being abducted three days ago. The girl, Leah Henry, ran out of her abductor's car and into the arms of a deputy sheriff that was approaching. The kidnapper then shot and killed himself.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation had already launched an extensive two-statewide hunt. Authorities had already linked Henry's kidnapping to the abduction of two other girls who had been released from their kidnapper. Using information from the other girls, the agents were able to zero-in on a suspect near San Antonio.

The deputy sheriff then pulled the suspect, Gary Dale Cox, over after responding to a call about a suspicious vehicle. Cox's car had been painted a different color and had different license tags, which threw the police off at first.

All three girls, including Leah Henry, are safely at home, and all remember being taken to a hunting cabin. Authorities are now searching for the cabin and for possible partners in crime.

Cox was a convicted sex offender.

Georgia

John A. "junior" Gotti, son of the former Gambino crime family boss John Gotti, has pleaded the fifth amendment and refuses to cooperate in a racketeering case against the Gold Club, a strip club in Atlanta.

Junior Gotti, who has already been convicted for other mobster crimes, was moved to Atlanta's federal penitentiary to await the racketeering trial. Gotti's lawyers claim that he had nothing to do with the Gold Club case, which includes charges of prostitution, money laundering, extortion and fraud, and don't feel that there is any reason for Gotti to be called to testify.

Steve Kaplan who now faces charges along with six other men owns the club, which is one of the most high-profile all-nude strip clubs in the state. Gotti is supposedly involved in the case because Kaplan paid the Gambino family for protection.

Testimony is to begin next week after jurors have been selected.

Doctor shortage in Western Massachusetts

Doctors just don't seem to want to come practice in Western Mass. Doctors in this part of the state have reported rapidly dropping wages in the past few years have meant declining insurance payments, recruitment troubles and practices that have been going under.

Salary increase in this area for doctors is 3.2, the slowest increase out of any other place in the country, making it very likely that for some time to come emergency room lines will be out the door and appointments will be difficult to make.

Pittsfield man described as "worst thief in the world"

A judge described 19-year-old Brian Bouchez as the "worst thief in the world" after he committed the exact same offense that he had been placed under arrest and put on probation for a week earlier.

Allegedly, Bouchez cashed a stolen check belonging to the Berkshire Public Theater, a defunct company in Pittsfield that has been out of business since 1995. He was sentenced on April 26 for cashing three of the checks and sentenced to a year's probation after his guilty plea.

"He just got out of jail and pleaded guilty to the same thing last week with the same checks and the same set of circumstances," Judge Alfred A. Barbalunga told the Boston Globe. "I'm beside myself. It doesn't make any sense."

Bouchez pleaded not guilty to the charges of forgery of a check and is awaiting a hearing on June 6.

"It's incredible to me," Barbalunga said. "He did the same thing the last time. He's the worst thief in the world."

Vonnegut finishing up time at Smith College

Kurt Vonnegut, a world-renown writer of satire and dark fiction, has finished up what can be called a year of controversy at Smith College.

During a public lecture last fall, Vonnegut discussed an Indian woman that he lusts after, a woman who works in a Manhattan grocery store. He wondered in the lecture whether or not she puts the jewels she wears in her eyes in water at night, like dentures. The speech caused controversy and resulted in a scathing editorial in the school newspaper.

Vonnegut himself was overall unconcerned about any controversy that he caused at the College.

"I'll say whatever I want; that's the price of my freedom," he told the Boston Globe. "If it hurts someone's feelings, too bad! That's the way it goes."

In addition to holding lectures, he has also spent his time sitting down with students reviewing their work and answering questions about his own work.

Congress to improve pediatric medicinal research

Congress has recently expressed concern about the quality of medical care that children have been receiving in the United States.

In terms of treatment children are treated as if they were little versions of adults. Instead of getting pills or shots that are formulated for children, they receive smaller doses of the drugs. This is potentially dangerous to them, pediatric experts explain.

"Only a fraction of the drugs on the market have been tested for safety to children," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn to the Boston Globe. "It's a lot like playing Russian roulette with our kids."

Congress is considering renewing the Food and Drug Administration extends brand name patents for six-months to companies to conduct FDA approved research for children. To be eligible the drugs must have some potential to help children.

Defense plans for possible missile attacks

President Bush began plans last week to protect the US from possible missile attacks within the next thirty years.

One possible plan is an airborne laser that could be relatively expensive and by some deemed impossible. Another potential plan could be a laser that is set in the sky with as many as 24 missiles also set up in the sky that are meant to shoot down missiles.

"The nature of what we are trying to do with missile defense is entirely different ... the nature of the threats today ... are entirely different," Paul Wolfowitz Deputy Defense Secretary told a gathering of the American Jewish Committee on Friday.

Wolfowitz is one of the individuals that will be sent out in three teams in order to stop at major cities and discuss new plans for missile defense. Bush described the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, as outdated. Countries such as Russia disagree however, calling the treaty the foundation of peace and world security.

"First, we should not destroy the established system of international security, and second, we must act together to perfect it," Russian President Vladimir Putin said.

China's state press also accused Bush of trying to threaten global peace with his plans and claimed that he would start an arms race, and destroy disarmament efforts. Sweden and Germany have also expressed concern about the new plan. Britain and Canada have stopped short of endorsing the idea.

Big Small Press Fest a big publishing deal

By Sarah Williamson
Collegian Correspondent

A large group of writers, poets, artisans and editors arrived at the Big Small Press Fest this past Friday and Saturday at the University of Massachusetts Memorial Hall.

The Big Small Press Fest was a gathering of talented guests who shared ideas and celebrated accomplishments in the small publishing industry. The fest also gave the guests a chance to address some of the current problems they face in the business. Such problems included lack of funding and minimum distribution.

The event gave various editors and publishers an opportunity to show the newest technology available for solving problems or to use artistically in publishing literary magazines. Ethan Paquin editor of the online journal Slope and Daniel Nester senior editor of Painted Bride Quarterly gave a demonstration on web based publishing techniques.

Walker Rumble and Karen Donovan both co-editors of the journal Paragraph demonstrated bookmaking technique while Corwin Ericson the new editor of The Massachusetts Review gave a tour of literary web sites. The keynote speaker of the fest was David Lehman, a poet and author of Signs of the Times: Deconstruction and the Fall of Paul de Man. Lehman is also editor of the celebrated Best American Poetry anthology. His address was based on literary publishing in the US and how important it is that they continue to publish despite many difficulties. There are many progress of small literary magazines such as scarce funding and low distribution numbers.

"Only sixty percent of funding comes from sales," Gillian Conoley of Volt magazine explained. "The other ways small publishers find funding is through self attribution, donations or grants. Grants were and are still a fundamental way magazines get started."

David Lenson, professor of Comparative literature at UMass and author of Drugs made similar comments, explaining that grants were essential to small literary magazines but that they are more difficult to get now.

"Grants were easier to receive in the seventies than today, the money flowed back then, it was endless," Lenson said. "Then, in the eighties when government began seizing grants there was a shock within the small literary publishing community."

Lenson jokingly described the distribution of fewer grants to a junkie withdrawing from smack.

William D. Waltz, publisher of Conduit magazine laughed in agreement.

"We have a slogan at Conduit," he said, 'Grant free since 1993'."

Brian Henry, the founder of Verse Press explained that lack of funding often results in less of the finished product.

"Funding has always been the problem. Books cost a lot of money to print," Henry stressed. "The problem of fewer funds results in fewer magazines, and thus even less exposure of critical poetry. Yet it is this exposure, which allows a magazine to gain support, thus generate profits."

Heny explained that 90 percent of poetry is published by universities.

"Libraries seem to be a helping factor in gaining exposure, but as one member of the panel said, getting a library to buy a subscription is nearly impossible," he explained. "All of their money that does go to subscriptions ends up purchasing the bigger, more well known magazines. All the money is tied up there."

The press fest, and other literary fests just like it seem to be the best form of exposure.

"There is interest in publishing critical poetry, and this festival shows that," Waltz said.

The Keynote speaker agreed, citing the importance of poetry in his address.

"The audience for poetry has grown, and the editors of literary magazines are heroes of poetry," he said. "They give the future hope."

The Big Small Press Fest also signified the cultural importance of nurturing and celebrating unrecognized talent. To the guests at the Big Small Press Fest the small literary magazines serve a purpose through a cycle. They begin by recognizing critically different poetry and exposing it. As funds decrease the magazine bows out and makes room for more poets to bloom.

passionate about your job you don't mind working hard.

Michael Aleo graduated six years ago also with a STPEC degree. He is a now special education teacher at South Hadley High School. He admitted that after he graduated he did not really have a foundation laid out for his future and it was frightening at times. He resorted to taking jobs just to make ends meet.

Despite the facts that he took these jobs, he knew he still wanted to make the world a better place. He found a way to do this by becoming a teacher of radical history.

"More important than opening mind I feel like as a teacher what I am able to do is give kids positive self esteem," Aleo said.

He feels that opening his student's minds and giving them positive self-esteem will help them to become the future leaders and activists of the world.

Aleo continued the theme of telling the students in the audience to do what they wanted to do and what they believed in after graduating.

Mimi Turchinetz graduated seventeen years ago with a STPEC degree and a certificate in Women's Studies. She works in Boston as Attorney, Living Wage Administrator in the Office of Jobs and Community Services.

While at UMass, Aleo said she did a lot of political work and activism.

"UMass provided me with a laboratory to give me the skills to go out and do other things," she said. "It is really important to use UMass and what you have here because you can do whatever you need to do to develop your life here within all the different constructs of fun political work you can take advantage of."

Early in her life, Turchinetz realized that if you do what is in your heart, it can be risky; so risky in fact that you may lose that job. This is why, she said, organizing, advocacy and volunteering can be beneficial.

The last panelist Rachel Tanenhaus graduated five years ago with degrees in Women's Studies and Journalism. She is an Information Specialist at the New England Disability and Business Technical Assistance Center in Boston. Although she graduated with a degree in Journalism, Tanenhaus knew that she did not want to enter the field before she graduated.

She explained how she did temp work for a year and a half, and though she didn't like it, she was terrified to quit because she did not know what other job she would be able to find. Eventually she was able to get a job in public health. She said she dealt with women's issues and people with disabilities (she herself has a visual impairment) among other things.

After working there for two years, her relationship with her boss became rocky, and she was at a loss. She explained how she was able to find another job, and also learn an important lesson.

"You may not always know what you are going to do and that's okay because you have to work for the stuff you want," Tanenhaus said, " but the stuff you want will come to you. If you do not have a game plan, eventually you will."

She said that there are many forms of activism; it is not just marching and protesting.

All panelists admitted that life after UMass, or college in general, does not always work out the way one usually plans. Eventually though, they said people will find their way. All the panelists said UMass is a good stepping-stone in one's future as an activist as long as you take advantage of what the University has to offer.

ties," and he was finally welcomed into the group.

"The Rite of Spring" was a beautiful rendition of the "awakening of nature," with the players acting the roles of either trees or animals. As each scene reveled in the change, the director, using cue cards, addressed the "rights," of everyone. The director talked of the right to express one's own feelings, the right to be free and have free choice, the right to follow one's dreams and a few others more.

In "Elvis is Back 2001," (or "A Day in the Life of a Custodian"), a janitor played by Lee Williams found a dusty old wig and guitar in a trash bin and was instantly transformed into Elvis. He then transformed the Black Sheep Coffee House into a rock and roll dance hall with all of the Players dancing in the background.

In the final piece, "Reach for the Stars," each performer was given a designated amount of time to perform the piece of work that each had been diligently preparing prior to the April event. It began with Missy Kennedy performing the main theme from Titanic, "My Heart Will Go On." Next was Heather Lowing singing a piece from "Cats," and then her brother Doug told assorted jokes. Later, Chris Wood reenacted the many different sounds of the loons that he had acquired in many of his outings in the woods. Stephanie Parker sang the song of a Western cowgirl in her musical tune "Runaway." The final part of "Reach for the Stars" was an encore performance with Missy at the helm, as she led the ensemble in a sing-along; the title theme, "Reach for the Stars."

In the end, there was a "talk-back" session where people in the audience were given a chance to ask the performers certain questions. When asked about what was the hardest thing about performing, Kathy Dion summed it up by saying, "getting everybody focused, because you don't really know what's going on, until you're really doing it."

Ezzell concurred by saying that each performance piece was tailored to each performer's individualism. Each cast member showed great effort and was well-received. No one was disappointed and everyone came out of the auditorium with a better understanding of how others should be treated.

government was merely procedural is ridiculous," Doherty said. "The fact is that the British government denied 12 men, all of whom were killed by its forces or by its agents at its behest, their human rights. The British government violated their right to life. The families of these men, when seeking justice were thwarted at every turn by the British government.

"If the British government has nothing to fear then it should immediately allow the UN to send in a delegation of Special Reporters to investigate these killings and his governments role in them."

Beware!
Mass Pike a death trap

A section of the Massachusetts Turnpike has turned into an all out death trap, and it needs to be fixed right now!

However, even if it gets fixed soon, it could still be way too late. Simply put, there is no conceivable excuse for the gross display of inattention and disregard for driver safety that the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority so blatantly is allowing to stand unattended to.

A chunk of land between exits 9 and 10 on the westward side of the Mass Pike, for about one mile, is currently under construction and lies unpaved and bumpy. This is just flat out dangerous. There is very little warning to motorists that anything is about to happen to the road before hitting it, and there is also no caution to reduce speed.

If you travel at the speed limit of 65 MPH or even slower, your car will still undoubtedly plow into a sea of unpaved broken street, tarnishing any chance your undercarriage ever has of surviving. Depending on the vehicle, the construction can cause cars to shimmy all over the road, making movement extremely difficult. If you are not prepared for the sudden change in the physical terrain, it comes as an implausible shock to both you and your vehicle.

Since the Pike is under construction, apparently it's appropriate to leave the street in a condition that is so incredibly unbearable to drive on, that it makes you wonder why they even chose to fix it at all. They might as well release a pack of wild boars into the highway and let them run toward cars in a desperate attempt to shatter everything in a mass array of destruction. That'd be safer than the way it's being kept up right now.

According to the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, as of right now, the Pike is entirely owned and operated through the tolls that are collected for travel on the road, leasing, advertising and the development of real estate along it. Therefore, in some way or another, all the money that the Pike brings in is from Massachusetts's citizens like us. If for the simple given human right to safety is not enough to make this portion of the road unacceptable, then the fact that we're paying money for it to not appear like that should be.

Instead the road is left half constructed, with nothing but a hope that an accident does not occur.

It is sheer negligence that the Pike appears like this. It's almost as careless as the signs recently posted around the UMass campus that say, "Caution, It's pothole season." As if the reason those potholes are in the UMass roads is anything other than the University's negligence and lack of ability to fix them. A sign like that is insulting to the students, faculty and visitors of this campus and whoever was involved in making or posting them should be ashamed of his or herself.

Driver safety has apparently taken a backburner seat to indolent construction both on the Pike and at UMass. The Pike is of utmost importance because millions of people drive on it every week, and it is only a matter of time before something terrible happens. When it does, of course blame will shift all over the place, and no one will take responsibility. Apparently pointing fingers is much more convenient than just actually getting out side of highway.

Throw caution to the wind

KEN CAMPBELL

I spent last weekend sleeping on the cold ground of Pennsylvania and trying to think what it must have been like for a young man from Eastern Massachusetts in 1861 or so, far from home, cold and scared.

Surprisingly, I think I learned a lot about what it must have been like in the Civil War. Call it a hands-on history lesson.

As I lay there cold and sleepless, some five hours away, a young man fell from the roof of Butterfield dormitory.

That royally sucks.

For one thing, until May 2, I was the governor of Central. Yep, that's right, I was an officer in the Student Government Association. I lived two lives – one for Central, and one for the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. But anyway, I love Central. It's unique. Its quiet and loud, its traditional and radical. It's diverse and wonderful. So to have any tragedy befall my area during my term hurts.

Secondly, and more importantly, this kid was just being a kid. He was trying to get a flag. Trying to prove something. Who knows? The answer is: he does, but he may not live to tell us his real reasons.

Which really bites the big one.

We think that we are invincible, we twenty-somethings. We have this strange sense that nothing can touch us. We drink till we drop, and we get up again. We narrowly avoid a car accident. We do stupid things all the time, and we live to tell about it.

Most of the time these stories start with an "I was so lucky."

Some of us are lucky. Some of us can tell those tales.

If the boy dies, yes, life will go on. But it won't be the same. A death at the University is like a stone tossed into a calm pond. The ripples cascade out and touch everything. The worst part is the people closest to the center, that is, the young man, feel the force the hardest.

And Lord how it hurts.

Some have said, and rightly so, that Tom Degnan, the young man in question, was more than just a prankster. Of course he was.

I once had a prankster friend. I loved him like a brother. He was the experienced one, the one who guided us through the choppy seas of high school. He taught us how the world really worked. He showed us laughter was the best medicine, and that the inside truth was always a punch line.

His current address is a cemetery in Lakeville, Massachusetts.

The circumstances of his death were not of his choosing, as they rarely are for any of us. Shot down in cold blood, folks may not see the connection between Tom and my friend.

The connection is not exactly clear, at least to somebody not used to burying friends. That said, I'll explain it.

There was not a day that went by that my friend did not feel invincible.

All of us do.

We all watch the news, seeing the latest tragedies and think: "that can never happen here. That can never happen to me."

How arrogant.

The human body is at the same time both fragile and rugged. The slightest misstep may scar us for life, yet we think little of the eggshell like protection that we have between the great beyond and us. We cross roads while cars, brakes screeching, barely miss us. We hardly think what would happen if a ton of steel barreled into us at even ten miles an hour.

We drink till we can't see straight, and never think, "Will I wake up?"

And we climb roofs to get flags, never thinking that one wrong step may put us in intensive care.

While the weather warms around the Pioneer Valley, we all want to get outside and have fun. We've been frozen for far too long. We need activity, any activity.

"The human body is at the same time both fragile and rugged. The slightest misstep may lame us for life, yet we think little of the eggshell like protection that we have between the great beyond and us."

But we must be careful.

It seems so simple. As if by simply saying the words, we can avoid catastrophe. The truth is we have very little power over our fates.

So what's the point, you may ask. How much can we avoid death? Well, we can't. It's going to catch up with us sooner or later. But we can give it a hard time. We can try not to tempt fate, or the Reaper.

It's easy. The risks we take everyday – jaywalking across the street, partying quite heartily on the weekends, and other small, inconsequential (to us) dangers can be avoided. It's not hard. Use crosswalks, drink in moderation and, most importantly, be careful.

This is not to say you should go through life jumping at shadows. Simply avoiding unnecessary risks is sufficient to extending life. For instance, if you don't wish to wind up in intensive care, don't walk on roofs. Don't dash across the street because you think you can make it. Refrain from trying to jump large bodies of water on your skateboard. The rottweiler probably doesn't understand that you want him to "join the hack."

Don't do stupid things, whatever your motivation. It really just isn't worth it. Stupidity combined with our sense of indestructibility will more often than not result in one of those shaded boxes on the front page explaining the circumstances of our demise.

I hate a slow news day as much as the next reporter, but we really would prefer not to write that.

Question the answers...and questions

RYAN BENHARRIS

I have this friend who, every time he wants to ask you a question, will actually say "question," and then proceed to ask it. I suppose that makes sense. I think the "question" question that precedes the question is actually a statement and not a question though. The real question is the question that comes after "question," questioning the statement he eventually plans to question. When he is done stating that he plans to question a statement by saying, "question," he then questions the statement, but not the statement "question." The question, "question," is just a statement and not the actual question. Thoroughly confused yet? Good. (Read that paragraph out loud, it actually makes it easier to understand.)

Anyway, I like to ask questions. Who doesn't? It's good to question things. Just the other day I asked a question. I asked an ant not to bite me in the arm. It did it anyway though, and I now have a rash. You can imagine what my conversation with the ant was. "Hey, ant crawling up my arm. Question: Can you do me a favor and not bite me, spreading infectious disease and constant itch?" Unfortunately the ant responded in the negative and I am now Ryan, the bumpy red arm freak. However, the important thing was not that I was bitten, it was that my question was answered. It feels good to have your questions answered because we all feed off of response and attention. Therefore, I'm going answer some very important questions for you that you may still be at ease with.

Question: Did Tom Cruise ever have an affair with a gay porn star?

Answer: Well, if you haven't heard, Tom Cruise is suing a tabloid and an individual man for $100 Million after the illustrious porn star claimed that he had a gay love affair with Cruise which lead to the end of his marriage to Nicole Kidman. I'm sorry, but he definitely didn't have an affair with a gay porn star. Tom Cruise was the star of Top Gun the manliest film of all time. A movie about a man who spends hours alone in a jet, and even more time with other men, in big phallic airplanes, smoky bars and sweaty locker rooms, all while wearing tight pants and a sailor hat. That's about as far from gay porn as you can get. (Please pick up on the sarcasm)

Spring concert is rolling around, and we have two huge acts that love to ask questions. If you pick up Uncle Kracker's album Double Wide, you'll hear a song called, "Who's Your Uncle?"

Question: Who's your uncle?

Answer: Well, there's my uncle Steven. He's my dad's brother who lives in CA with his son, my cousin Dylan. Then there's my mother's brother, my uncle Barry. I don't speak to him much, but his mother (my grandmother) caught him having sex on her bed.

Part two of the spring concert festivities comes from Lil Kim, or the Notorious K.I.M. as she likes to call herself. We all know what she'll be asking.

Question: "How many licks till you get to the center of the...uh uh?"

Answer: Well, for me it's usually two. Three if I'm drunk. Nobody's licked me in a while though. This is probably why.

Question: Do I pee in the shower?

Answer: Apparently everyone's all-abuzz about the whole 75 percent of college students peeing in the shower thing. I do not now, nor have I ever urinated in the shower. What's wrong with you people!? I don't care if you aim for the drain or say, "It all goes to the same place anyway." It doesn't all go to the same place if it's going on my foot. If you have to pee that bad, get out of the shower, dry your self off and walk to the toilet...or at least the sink.

Question: Where are all the girls on campus?

Answer: We don't have girls at UMass. We only have women.

Question: Who's the real star of The Mummy Returns? Is it Brendan Fraser or The Rock?

Answer: Tough call. Brendan Fraser is the Encino Man, but The Rock is The Rock. Fraser is definitely a better actor, but The Rock is definitely a better wrestler. Brendan Fraser has made out with Alicia Silverstone while The Rock has punched Stone Cold Steve Austin in the face. It's so difficult to decide. I love them both so much. Dear God, why must you torture me with such a hard decision. Hard! Rocks are Hard. I pick The Rock. Whew, close one there.

"It's good to question things. Just the other day I asked a question. I asked an ant not to bite me in the arm. It did it anyway though, and I now have a rash."

Question: What happens after graduation?

Answer: You move back home, baby sit the dogs and clean the pool. Uh...I mean, you get a job.

Question: What's the dumbest thing you've heard in a long time?

Answer: This conversation actually took place. I am not making this up. I swear to God. I was walking through the Campus Center and a woman behind me said, "My friend broke up with her boyfriend, but she did it after they got married. So she ended up with a house and a kid."

Question: Isn't there a word for that?

Answer: Yeah, it's called divorce.

Question: What's the best Britney Spears song?

Answer: "Oops, I did it Again." No, wait. "Hit Me Baby One More time." No, no, no wait, the correct answer is "her breasts."

Question: If you could fight one celebrity, who'd it be?

Answer: Gilbert Godfried. But I'd make him dress up as the parrot from Aladdin just to kill two birds with one stone.

Question: Did you know that thing you said about only having women on campus is the cheesiest excuse for a pick up line ever?

Answer: Yes, but at least it's not as direct as, "Hey baby, let's go play carpenter. You get hammered and I'll nail you."

Question: Who won "Survivor?"

Answer: CBS

Question: What's Jamie Murray, a former cast member on MTV's "Real World" up to now-a-days?

Answer: He got arrested for bungee jumping off the Golden Gate bridge last week. He could get a fine of $10,000 and forced to do community service. If he does have to serve the public, let's keep him off of suicide watch.

Question: Who let the dogs out?

Answer: I don't know, but when you find out can you thank that person for killing the Baha Men?

Question: What does the 2983 mean on my AOL screen name, Benny2983?

Answer: Nothing, it was a number I was assigned. I was the 2,983 person to request my screen name be, "Benny." If that doesn't scream, "Ryan, you're special," I don't know what does.

Question: What does the Benny on my AOL screen name mean?

Answer: It means you're an idiot if you can't figure that out.

Question: How many people were in the bowl last Friday night on Orchard Hill?

Answer: Enough to start a new country with its own army and racist, classist, elitist political system. And I'm so sure that thought crossed the Orchard Hill honors kids minds several times.

Question: Are you out of your mind?

Answer: You simply have no idea what kind of bag of worms a question like that opens with me. You're better off just using the statement: you're out of your mind.

New Mummy film reprises past stupidity

THE MUMMY RETURNS
Directed by Stephen Sommers with Brendan Fraser, Rachel Weisz and The Rock
Playing at Cinemark Theaters

The sequel to the astoundingly popular first film, The Mummy Returns brings back the spectacular special effects and the minimal plot development that The Mummy gave the public. Stephen Sommers, who helmed the first film (and who has written and is currently filming the prequel, The Scorpion King starring The Rock) is able to put together some spectacular action sequences, but doesn't really go any further than that.

We join Rick O'Connell (Brendan Fraser) eight years after his supernatural encounter with Im-Ho-Tep (Arnold Vosloo). He is now married to Evie (played by Rachel Weisz) and has a seven-year-old son, Alex (played by new child star Freddie Boath), and despite his reservations, still accompanies his wife on her ventures into Egypt. We join them searching for the mythical Scorpion King's tomb, which is said to be protected by Enubis himself. According to legend, The Scorpion King was a fierce warrior who led an army to defeat the great king around 1500 B.C. However, he was defeated and as his army slowly died, he sold his soul to Enubis and acquired the army of death with whom he destroyed most of Egypt's great monuments before retreating into the underworld, leaving his bracelet behind and allowing the opportunity for his army to rise again and take over the world. The historical accuracy of this film is amazing, by the way.

Anyway, Evie finds The Scorpion King's legendary bracelet at the same time as a forgotten Egyptian cult digs up Im-Ho-Tep in hopes that he will defeat The Scorpion King and take Enubis' army, which eventually take over the world. That's pretty much where the story ends. The rest of the film is an action packed special effects bonanza that can become tiring to watch. The special effects aren't even that impressive – if you've seen the first film, then you have seen basically everything that is meant to be astonishing in the second. Many of the same ideas are used; instead of borrowing a plane, Rick borrows a blimp, which is swallowed by a wall of water much like the bi-plane that is swallowed by the wall of sand in the first film. We see the same royal guards, the same scarab beetles demonstrated by Im-Ho-Tep, and the same dull plot.

The cast is possibly the redeeming factor for the film. Brendan Fraser is a fantastic action hero (even if he is a young Indiana Jones), mixing the appeal of running fast, firing guns and whipping up ingenious plans with a glib smile, eyes ladies love to stare into and witty one-liners. He plays the character as well as the first time, and although it isn't the brilliance of his character in Of Gods and Monsters, for two hours and ten minutes he is the definite gem of the film, keeping the audience interested in the fast-moving but unoriginal story.

Other returning characters besides Fraser, Vosloo and Weisz include John Hannah as Evie's brother and the Arab defender Oded Fehr. Hannah is just silly as an exaggerated of the typical action film coward. Fehr perhaps has a better performance in this film, but his character is not developed, and we are supposed to assume automatically that he knows the antagonists' moves as soon as they happen. Freddie Boath plays Fraser's son, and with his English accent is adorable, but with his incredible intelligence his character also is a stereotypical young side-kick. As for The Rock, well, this film does not really show his artistic ability, and we will have to wait for his starring role debut in the prequel The Scorpion King. Despite his twenty minutes on screen, he has one line, "Hase-Lia," which could be pronounced "Ooga Booga" and would still mean the same thing, "just bring it!"

Brendan Fraser reprises his role as Rick O'Connell.

Do you like action films? Then by all means, go see The Mummy Returns. Did you like the first film? Then go see the second. However, if you like good action films, don't bother. If you hated the first, you'll be indifferent to the second. It's a film that reminds us why we need writers.

Pharcyde to bring LA rap to Northhampton

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Valley hip-hop fans will be treated to a bizarre ride tonight from the Pharcyde, the always changing and evolving Los Angeles rap crew.

Romye "Booty Brown" Robinson, Imani Wilcox, Tre "Slimkid" Hardtion, and Derrick "Fatlip" Stewart working with producer J-Swift, let loose Bizarre Ride II the Pharcyde in 1992. The lovable mix of positive thinking, humor and sheer craziness earned the album a spot as one of hip-hop's most creative and enduring classics. Spirited tracks like "Soul Flower (Remix)" and "Return of the B-Boy" stand alongside the more personal down tempo flows of "Passing Me By" and "Otha Fish," making the album a constantly enlightening listen that seems to have a larger scope every spin.

Pharcyde's 1995 follow-up LabCabinCalifornia received a cool reception from fans and the press, most feeling that it simply didn't capitalize on all the promise and energy of the debut.

In the time following their sophomore effort, the departure of Fatlip and the near absence of music from the group in five years led many to believe Pharcyde was just a brilliant, unfulfilled promise from the past. But the now-threesome resurfaced late in 2000 with producer J-Swift and released Plain Rap.

"When you feel there's no one to trust/ you can always count on Pharcyde to bust," featured "Trust," the first single from Plain Rap. It turned out Pharcyde could be trusted to return to the scene with some solid funky tunes that stood strong on their own, but severely disappointed many fans still holding tight to the group's glory days.

The current tour will allow a whole new generation of hip-hop fans to experience Pharcyde live and examine the roots and influences of many of today's prominent artists. Tonight's show will also be the first time the local Pharcyde faithful will be able to see material performed from Plain Rap.

The recent Rhino compilation Cydeways: The Best of the Pharcyde and the "Passing Me By" sample featured in the Joe and Mystikal collaboration "Stutter (Remix)" have upped the Pharcyde profile considerably as of late, so a diverse mix of curious newcomers and longtime veterans should characterize tonight's crowd.

Ugly Duckling, a fellow Los Angeles rap act, will open the show. The retro threesome is an interesting pick for an opening act, since their old school approach to hip-hop pays extreme tribute to the sound of acts like De La Soul and the Pharcyde. The wild antics of Dizzy, Andycat, and DJ Einstein will no doubt get the show off to a very fresh start.

The Pharcyde will be performing tonight at 8:30 p.m. at the Pearl Street in Northampton. Ugly Duckling will open the show. Tickets are $17.50 and can be purchased at the Northampton Box Office and through 1-800-THE-TICK.

Slaves on Dope rock to thin Skybox crowd

SLAVES ON DOPE
Skybox
May 5

"It doesn't matter if there's five people, one hundred, or five hundred – we put on a great show no matter what!" declared Slaves on Dope frontman Jason Rockman midway during his band's set.

He wasn't lying.

The Slaves-led New Blood Tour stop at the Skybox may have been sparsely attended, but those with common sense and good taste enough to make the show were treated to quite a night indeed. Alternately intense and comical, low-key yet all-out, it was a memorably intimate night with some of the hottest up-and-coming bands in modern metal.

The headlining Slaves on Dope set was a study in contradiction. The intensity and speed of such songs as "Thanks for Nothing," "Inches from the Mainline" and "I Can't Die" (easily the best song of the evening) was unparalleled, pure headbanging with some creeping melody, perfect for getting your mosh on or tossing a sucker punch at the guy next to you. Tortured lyrics of (you guessed it) drug abuse and self-loathing, complete with references to Kafka and the year 1988, screamed from Rockman's throat while the rest of the band kept pace with fast, heavy and original music. Guitarist Kevin Jardine especially showed off with complex and interesting guitar work, utilizing a massive pedal board, every switch and lever on the guitar, and even a drill (a maneuver I've heard of but never actually seen performed) to get the most out of his instrument.

That was one of the Slaves on Dope, which showed up on Saturday. The other was not a screaming band of metal headbanging drug-addled badasses, but four French-Canadians with big smiles, broad and quirky senses of humor and a healthy respect for the loyalty of their fans. This other Slaves on Dope featured bassist Frankie Salvaggio and Rockman trading off jokes with the audience (one memorable one began with "A woman goes into a grocery store and buys an banana, an apple, and an orange" with the punchline being "Because you're ugly, that's why!"), poking fun at the UMass library and saying that they may pass out for lack of oxygen due to the height at which they were playing. They also repeatedly and earnestly thanked the fans who came out and tried in vain to pronounce "Amherst."

Supporting the Slaves was a band by the name of No One. An up-and-coming band out of Chicago, they're hanging out on the New Blood Tour and then Fear Factory until they hook up with the Ozzfest second-stage in July. Touring without a record until June 19th when their self-titled debut comes out, No One are obviously trying to make a name for themselves based entirely on their music – and, judging by their Skybox set, doing it quite well.

Heavy nu-metal with some industrial components thrown in for good measure, No One showed that the sound still has some life in it when done with some passion and by the right people. Due to some technical difficulties (such as the guitar not working) in the beginning of the set, the members of this band also had some fun fooling around with improv drum 'n bass versions of Metallica, Rush and Deep Purple tunes while singer Murk shot the proverbial poo with the audience. Once they got going they made an impression, however. No rap, no DJ, but hard beats and heavy distorted guitars backed by a frontman with great stage presence and rapport with fans offstage, No One should be exploding onto rock radio very soon. "Chemical" was the highlight song of the set; let us hope it will also be the single.

By some bizarre luck, special guest opener Edgar managed to escape the angry mobs that have been roaming campus seeking their destruction after their last craptacular on-campus appearance and disgrace the stage once more. Let us hope they are cast to the piranhas in the campus pond before they ever get to destroy our ears and our souls with their trash music again.

Sex lives not accurately portrayed by media

By Kara Desantis
Campus Times (U. Rochester)

(U-WIRE) ROCHESTER, N.Y. – A chance encounter with the hot guy down the hall leads to a night of passionate sex. An innocent game of spin the bottle leads to a make-out session with your best friend – and you're the same sex. Your boyfriend invites you to take part in a threesome, and you willingly oblige. This is exactly what your everyday life is like ... isn't it?

We're all familiar with the media's representation of what it means to have a healthy sex life. As a college student, this is the time to be having wild and exciting sexual encounters with a variety of people. If you're not having lots of adventurous sex, you're just not normal.

Could this be true? Just because your life doesn't run like an episode of MTV's pseudo-porn drama "Undressed," does it mean you're abnormal? Are you being left in the dust while everyone else is having the time of their lives?

The answer is a resounding "no." Most Americans are leading a life that is much less sexually adventurous than the media and popular culture's portrayals of life would let on. As University of Rochester Professor of Clinical and Social Psychology Harry Reis explains, "American sex life is far more normal than the media would lead you to believe."

The book "Sex in America" by Robert T. Michael, et al. discusses a survey conducted by a group of psychologists to determine the true state of sexual relationships in the United States. The survey was entitled the National Health and Social Life Survey and was the most ambitious coverage of the status of Americans' relationships and sex lives to date. What they uncovered is that modern sex and relationships are a lot more mundane than we are often led to believe. The NHSLS discovered that in 1994, over 70 percent of the population had only had one sexual partner in the last year.

In a sample population made up of people aged 18 to 59, the survey determined that one-third of the population is having sex more than two times a week, one third is having sex a few times a month, and the remaining third has sex either only a few times a year, or not at all. No study has been based solely on college students, due to problems with the age of consent for psychological studies. Still, these statistics are a far cry from what the average television show, movie or music video would suggest.

"If I was a college student I would be convinced that if I wasn't having group sex on a balcony at least once a week I was missing out, and that's not what sex is really about. Certainly not good sex," Reis said.

"Sex in America" reported that the people who were most physically and emotionally satisfied were married couples. The group that was the least satisfied was that of people who were not married or living with someone – the group that the media portrays as having the most sex of all.

Other myths about sex were also refuted by the report. The survey found that far fewer people engaged in same-sex encounters and extramarital affairs than was the popular conception.

This type of exaggeration of the facts leads to myths and misconceptions about how one should go about conducting a relationship. The problem with these modern myths about sexuality is that they may create unrealistic expectations for people in relationships.

If a person enters into a relationship with expectations that are based on media standards, he or she may face problems becoming intimate with another person. "The media puts the emphasis on females being passive, and males being dominant and having to perform," sophomore Katie Moore said.

Moore also believes that the media gives a very one-dimensional view of homosexual relationships and characters. "Homosexual characters are either comedians or are stereotyped. Only one side of their personality is portrayed," Moore said.

"Sex in the media definitely gives you a misconception about how things operate. It makes sex cool, and so if you want to be cool, you're supposed to be having sex too," sophomore Chris Alden said.

Freshman Jenni Smith agrees that the media doesn't present an accurate view of relationships.

"People having sex on the second date isn't a typical portrayal of life," Smith said. "The media puts unnecessary emphasis on sex. People think about sex a lot anyways — it doesn't need to be constantly reinforced."

But what about "Sex in the City?" Isn't that a good representation of the life of a modern single woman? What about the people who call in for "Loveline" and Dr. Ruth? Think of all those people, lining up to get questions about their scandalous sex lives answered. What does that tell us?

It tells us about life, just not everyone's life. While almost everything shown in the media does have some truth to it, it is important to realize that things get exaggerated and are shown as being far more commonplace than they are in reality. Perhaps this is because the media presents an image of how people want to be living, rather than how they actually are living.

So take a deep breath and relax. Whether you have sex regularly on top of a moving train, or you've never had sex at all, don't worry. You and your sex life are normal, and don't let television or the movies tell you otherwise.

Directors explain science behind Shrek

Matt McCormick
The Battalion (Texas A&M U.)

(U-WIRE) COLLEGE STATION, Texas – Shrek is a movie that has been long awaited. Just ask John Lithgow, who recorded some of his dialogue more than four years ago. At a recent press conference, Lithgow said he was very excited about seeing the film, saying that it had been so long since he began the project that he has forgotten much of what he said.

The movie, which is based on a short illustrated book of the same name by author William Steig, has been fully supported by DreamWorks co-founder Jeffrey Katzenberg, arguably one of the most powerful men in Hollywood.

Directors Andrew Adamson and Vicky Jenson assembled a voice cast including Mike Myers as the heroic ogre Shrek, Eddie Murphy as his sidekick, a talking donkey; Cameron Diaz as the damsel in distress, Princess Fiona; and Lithgow as the evil Prince Farquaad, who sets out to destroy fairy tales.

So what took so long between conception and the final product?

The answer lies in the cutting-edge computer animation provided by PDI/DreamWorks.

This project was designed to raise the bar of computer-animation capabilities, and that took time. New programs and software had to be developed to render some of the innovative shots in the movie.

To begin with, Shrek features 36 separate locations, more than any previous computer-animated feature. These locations range from forests and swamps to a castle completely surrounded by a moat of steaming lava, which Shrek and his sidekick Donkey must cross to rescue the princess.

Adamson and Jenson were not content to have this amazing location animated in the traditional sense. They wanted the action, like a mad dash across a rickety bridge with a fire-breathing dragon in hot pursuit on their heels, to be shown in a new way. They worked with the animators to devise ways of moving the "camera" to make the action sequences seem more like those seen in Jerry Bruckheimer films than in the typical cartoon. This task was extremely difficult, but the results were well worth it as both directors expressed a belief that the camera movement enhances the sense of danger.

PDI/DreamWorks developed innovative techniques for portraying bodies of water and fire that eclipse all works in the field of computer animation.

The most impressive accomplishment of the film is its realistic animation of humans, a feat never before accomplished. In fact, the animators became so adept at this process that they had to undo some of their work on Princess Fiona because she became too realistic.

This area of the animation gives Shrek its heart, enhancing the performances of Murphy and Myers with amazing facial movements and body language.

This is extremely important, considering that, for the most part, the actors never saw one another. Lithgow recalled how he showed up for work on this project and finished in a half an hour. He said he never worked with any of the other actors, nor did he listen to a playback of their recordings.

"I met Eddie just the other day for the first time," Lithgow said.

The chemistry demonstrated by the characters on screen came about as a result of the painstaking animation process.

Lithgow said, "That's the amazing thing. I don't create the chemistry. They [the animators] do."

It goes without saying that impressive visuals and cool special effects are not enough to carry a movie that has no story.

The production team on Shrek realized this and spent a great deal of time perfecting the script in hopes that it would span generations and be able to connect with audiences of all ages.

As with all fairy tales, Shrek had to have a moral, a final lesson for the audience. Jenson said she really liked the moral of this particular story.

"The story is about self-acceptance and that things aren't always as they appear. We definitely turn the concept of beauty on its ear, which I think is a very powerful theme," she said.

Adamson said, "Yes there is a moral to the story and it has tremendous heart, but all of that, I hope comes ultimately through the humor." Lithgow said the movie successfully portrayed this theme that and is a great movie because of it.

"It is one of the most amazing accomplishments of this movie – the fact that they created a movie that is delightful not just to kids and adults. But to teenagers as well," Lithgow said. "That is very, very rare."

Disappointing was the word that best fit after the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team finished out its season by falling to Duquesne, 10-6, in the first round of the Atlantic 10 tournament in Philadelphia.

"It is really disappointing," leading scorer Rachel Ingraffea said after totaling her ninth hat trick of the season in her final collegiate game. "We thought we could beat [Duquesne] and we came out strong. Everyone gave a good effort, but it just wasn't enough."

"We played well and we all wanted to beat Duquesne," added sophomore Bridget Byrne. "We should have beat [Duquesne] the first time, so it was disappointing to lose to them again."

In the first meeting between the teams, the Dukes got out to an early 7-1 lead before withstanding a furious Minutewomen second half rally to hang on for the 12-9 victory.

This time around things were a little different, as the two squads went into halftime tied at five. In the second frame, however, Duquesne pulled away, and waltzed into the finals of the A-10 tourney where it would lose in overtime to Temple.

After the weekend's festivities (the first round was on Friday while the finals took place on Saturday), UMass ended the season with a 6-10 (3-5 A-10) record while the Dukes finished up at 13-5 (5-2 A-10). Both of Duquesne's conference losses this year came at the hands of the Owls, who earned a place in the NCAA tournament by winning the conference championship.

With the score tied at five at the intermission, the second half opened up as a defensive struggle, with neither team able to find the back of its opponent's cage. Lauren Dutch and Meghan Hungate quickly ended the drought midway through the frame, however, by tallying back-to-back goals.

Ingraffea was able to answer with a score of her own a few minutes later, but that would be the only goal the Maroon and White would be able to pick up over the game's final 30 minutes thanks to a combination of the Duquesne defense, the referees and bad luck.

Dukes' goaltender P.J. Harrison played outstanding throughout the contest, making 10 saves, but she also received a lot of help along the way. Kara DePaula tickled the back of the twine in the second half, but the refs took her goal back, to the dismay of coach Phil Barnes and the remainder of the Minutewomen.

In addition to that, three UMass shots came within inches of counting as scores, but instead bounced off the post and back into play. Had these three attempts gone in, it would have been a different game, but as Ingraffea said, "it wasn't meant to be."

"Hitting posts is always frustrating, especially in the playoffs," Ingraffea said. "You know you are that close to getting a goal."

Still, despite its offensive woes, the Maroon and White were still very much in the game until two Katie Harner tallies and a lone Lauren Mincher score put the game out of reach.

"Everyone gave a big effort," Ingraffea said. "But it just wasn't enough."

In the first half, the two squads battled it out evenly, with neither team able to gain a significant advantage. Mincher opened the scoring for the Dukes with the first of her three goals on the day, but Ingraffea answered with the first of her three goals, to tie the contest at one.

Andrea Valachovic then came up from her usual defensive position to fire a shot into the opposing net. Not only did this give UMass the 2-1 lead, but it was also the first time the freshman had found the back of the cage since the Minutewomen's home opener against Vermont.

Harner and Hungate (three goals each) put Duquesne quickly back on top with their first scores of the day, but this did not faze the Maroon and White "D", and it continued to hang in there throughout the contest.

"The defense played well," Byrne said. "We have been improving with every game this year, but the little things like marking up hurt us a bit."

Ingraffea would tie up the score at three a few moments later, before Hungate put her team back up by one. The half ended with Lori Kaln and Jada Emery scoring for the Minutewomen, while Mincher was able to knot another tally for the Dukes.

As the final seconds ticked off the clock, it marked the last time that Ingraffea, DePaula, Fay Naber, Denise Brey and Jen Nardi would take the field for UMass.

And even though their careers are now done, the five seniors feel confident that their younger counterparts can continue the tradition that is Massachusetts women's lacrosse.

"The younger players got their kinks and they now know what it's like to play at the division one level," Ingraffea said. "If the sophomores step it up, which they have done, then the team can be competitive next year."

The three Deans of Arts and Sciences, the Dean of Commonwealth College, and Nu Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa are pleased to announce new members elected from the Junior and Senior Classes. Phi Beta Kappa is the oldest and most prestigious American honors society in the Liberal Arts. It was founded at the College of William and Mary of December 5, 1776. Yale's chapter was formed in 1780, Harvard's in 1781. During the next century additional chapters of Phi Beta Kappa were added and in 1883 a national organization called the United Chapters of Phi Beta Kappa was created. At present only 237 liberal arts colleges were or universities have been accredited by the national organization and permitted to form chapters. In New England only six public institutions are so recognized.

Candidates do not apply for membership nor is an application made on their behalf. They are nominated by the chapter's faculty members on the basis of their academic records as shown on their transcripts. Candidates must be majors in one of the three faculties of the College of Arts and Sciences and must satisfy certain grade point, foriegn language and distribution requirements set by the national organization. Approximately 3% of Seniors with the strongest academic records are elected each year; one half of 1% of Juniors are selected.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20-May 20)- Hide your dark side from people who can't handle it. The group's interests are best served by compromise or a muted message.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20)- By identifying and labeling a problem, you give it a life of its own. A fresh start is risky, but it's a risk worth taking.

CANCER (June 21-July 22)- Everyone else has gone home, but you're too busy to care. You appreciate the silence and the chance to relax into your personal rhythm.

LEO (July 23-Aug.22)- If you huff and puff every time a friend asks to borrow a quarter try and be a little more generous. Before you start counting pennies, think about how it makes you look.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22)- You're an emotional mess today. Try to avoid any stressful situations.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22)- You like things out on the table, but you feel like they're all stuffed in random cupboards and hidden around the house this time.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21)- A mysterious job opportunity will arise... possibly in the news field, or in construction. Maybe sales, or investing.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21)- Pivotal decisions need to wait. You don't know what you want, so don't go committing yourself to anything or you'll regret it soon.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19)- Work is on your mind. You haven't been feeling entirely productive lately, and it might have nothing to do,with whether or not you're making money.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18)- Now that you're moving in the right direction, take a little time to notice the scenery.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20)- If you let people push you around, you're a self-made punching bag. Stop trying to accommodate everyone else and start taking care of yourself.

ARIES (March 21-April 19)- Nobody likes feeling stifled and you're making the people in your life feel downright suffocated these days.

DISRESPECTED

The entire setup is wrong.

Instead of forcing teams into little conference rooms to watch their fates expire on television, the NCAA should send its officials to the respective schools of possible tournament teams to tell the players, "no."

"No, you didn't make it. Instead we've picked a team you beat 17-13 to play next week. You can come watch them if you want. We've set aside tickets for you at West Point to watch."

We're sure 6-foot-3, 210 pound junior Matt McFarland and 6-foot-4, 230 pound would love to sit down and have a nice tete-a-tete with any member of the committee.

The NCAA really outdid itself this time.

Everyone isn't invited – not to worry – we haven't forgotten that. But when a team that wins 12 times (more wins than 11 teams that made the tournament) is excluded from the tournament, questions begin to arise about the objectivity and power of the so-called "committee."

Is the committee biased? The politically correct answer would be no. But when looking at the members of this group of selectors (found in the 2001 NCAA Lacrosse Rules) and cross analyzing it with this year's bracket, certain trends appear.

Trend A: Hofstra, a team that the Minutemen defeated 17-13 in Hempstead, N.Y., sneaked in as an unseeded at-large bid. The Pride, ranked No. 9 in many preseason polls, struggled this season going 9-6 and lost in the America East championship game to Towson.

Harry Rosle is Hofstra's Director of Intercollegiate Athletics. His name can be found on page four of the 2001 Men's Lacrosse Rules book under NCAA Men's Lacrosse Committee.

Trend B: Virginia is 7-6. Their coach, Dominic D. Starsia, is also on the committee. This is the Cavaliers' ninth consecutive tournament appearance.

So why was UMass ignored?

Under the committee's reasoning, the Minutemen had only one quality win – that being over Hofstra. Hofstra had two. It beat Notre Dame (seeded No. 5 in the tournament) and Duke (at-large bid).

It doesn't matter Hofstra lost six times. The Maroon and White could have lost to Boston College, Stony Brook, Vermont or Albany – but if it beat either Georgetown or Syracuse by one goal instead of losing by that margin then UMass would have been a virtual tournament lock.

Let us reminisce on the words of Syracuse coach and committee member John Desko: "I thought the way [UMass] played [April 28] as a team – both offensively and defensively – was of a playoff caliber team."

Or how about Brown coach Scott Nelson: "They are one of the best teams we've seen all year and they should be in that tournament, without a doubt," he said. [The teams you should be comparing UMass to] are Hofstra and Towson. Do they have any wins that are any better than UMass? I don't think so."

We can also recall Georgetown coach Dave Urick's sentiments on April 21 following a hard fought 13-12 Hoya win: "A lot of people in the lacrosse world wanted to see what was going to happen in this game...

"I think UMass proved that it's one of the best teams in the country."

Committees made up of representatives from participating schools should hold some kind of accountability for their decisions. But we don't see any of these members explaining their reasoning. Instead they sit behind an office door shielded from the tears of some of UMass' 12 seniors. Guys, who on Saturday – didn't think they had played their last game. Guys, who knew that they were a part of one of the 12 best teams in the country.

"I'm going to try not to let this ruin an outstanding year – one of the best we've ever had here," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

Talk about dedication. If UMass had been selected to play in next week's first round, Cannella told us he would have driven immediately to his office to prepare.

Instead, he drove home.

ERIC SODERSTROM/COLLEGIAN

Assistant coach Terry Mangan cleans up the football conference room after the No. 8 men's lacrosse team found out that its 12-2 record was not enough to earn a spot in the NCAA tournament.

Morley scores five goals in UMass finale

PROVIDENCE – Don't touch him. Don't even go near him. If this were NBA Jam then he would be on fire. "Marc Morley is hot," said Stan Hutchen, father of Massachusetts midfielder Paul.

Mr. Hutchen smartly kept his distance from the sizzling Morley but the Bears defensemen were not nearly as bright, as the attackman exploded for a career high seven points.

"I was just feeling it today," Morley said. "I was playing well and I tried to keep it going throughout the game"

Morley turned the Stevenson Field nets into kindling with five goals and two assists in a 15-5 UMass torching of Brown.

After playing in only eight games last year, Morley has emerged as one of the Minutemen's top finishers with 37 points in 14 games.

"Good teams have good attackmen that finish the ball," coach Greg Cannella said. "Marc has done that for us down the stretch."

The stretch run is where Morley has proven to be his most spectacular. In four crucial games against Georgetown, Syracuse, Rutgers and Brown, the junior has netted 16 goals and 18 totaled points.

Proving that he can play with the best in college lacrosse, Morley has been instrumental in UMass' run toward an NCAA tournament berth.

Saturday's contest in Providence was truly the crescent of a fine all around season for the attackman. Not only did he dominate on the offensive end, but he was a Maroon and White menace on nearly every Brown clearing attempt.

A Bear goal early in the second half brought the score to 6-4 so with the NCAA Tournament hanging in the balance Morley decided to take the game into his own hands.

With the momentum rolling towards the home side, the junior got his squad all fired up with a leaping check that halted a Bear clearing attempt and silenced the suddenly boisterous home crowd.

Morley's defensive gem spurred a three-goal run for the Minutemen to end the third quarter but the junior was not done contributing. Early on in the fourth Morley bore his offensive gifts when he set up a beautiful Kevin Leveille goal on a counter attack right before netting his own marker off a rebound.

The Canton, N.Y. native topped off his five-goal outing with a sweet inside move from the right side. Morley, on the right goal line extended, received a pass from Kevin Dell and while being cross-checked by his defender spun and laced the left side netting for the score.

Morley, despite his 5-10, 180 pound frame, enjoys studying and having tea in the crease... not to mention scoring goals.

"I had a lot of help from my teammates," Morley said. "A lot of times I was just sitting in front of the crease."

A converted midfielder, the junior has become a pure goal scorer and a perfect compliment for senior Rich Kunkel.

"He is in a different position, he's down there to score goals," Cannella said. "Attackmen are the glory boys, they get all the goals"

Morley has truly relished his position in front of the net, in fact physical contact seems to motivate the New Yorker rather than deter him.

"We came out and we knew we wanted to body them," Morley said. "We knew it was their last game and they were going to be physical and we wanted to match that."

Brown's futile attempts at cross-checking, slashing and tripping the junior were engulfed in his fiery style of play and in the end the Bears just could not keep up.

With the annual UMass-Brown game marking the end of the regular season, Morley may be wishing he had a few more games to play.

The junior enjoyed his best season to date ranking third on the team in points and second in goals.

Cannella must be licking his chops at the prospects of a Morley-led attack in 2002. With his trench dweller taking over the role as go-to-guy, there is seemingly no limit to his production.

Eighteen points in 2000, 39 points in 2001, 2002... who knows?

Minutemen crush pesky Bears

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE – The maintenance crew at Brown University should do something about the terrain on the east side of Stevenson Field – the ground that supports the goal in that region during lacrosse games.

It's elevated.

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will direct anyone interested to the problem. It scored six goals in the final quarter Saturday to upend Brown, 15-5, and end the regular season at 12-2 (5-1 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference).

"If you shot on the right of the goal, you had to shoot up," sophomore Kevin Leveille said, pointing to the elevation in the Providence grass. "It was weird shooting on it."

Faced with the reality that a loss to Brown (6-8, 2-4 Ivy Group) would condemn its best season since 1981, the Minutemen scored nine of the game's final 10 goals to break open a close game in the third quarter and transfer its post-season chances to an NCAA committee.

"There's nothing we can really do now," Leveille said. "We just wanted to play well today let everyone know that it's real."

Down 6-3 at the start of the second half, the Maroon and White saw its lead cut to two when junior Matt Kelley drove to the right side of the UMass net and beat senior Chris Campolettano (nine saves) through his five-hole. But the next Bears tally came from freshman Charles Towers at the eight-second mark of the final stanza.

In between those Brown goals, it was all Maroon and White.

"We thought [UMass] was an excellent team," Brown coach Scott Nelson said. "When it was 6-3 [at the end of the first half] we were amazed it was that close because they outshot us by so much. But UMass just had too much offensive talent for us in the end."

Leveille (three goals) and junior Marc Morely (five goals, two assists) combined for four of the Minutemen's nine second half scores. Their hook-up at the start of the fourth quarter highlighted the afternoon.

Breaking on the left wing, Morely laced a pass to Leveille wide open in the slot. After faking twice (high and then low) on senior Beret Dixon (21 saves), Leveille fired a behind-the-back shot into the top left corner of the cage for the 10-4 lead.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Marc Morley scored a career-high seven points (five goals, two assists) as the No. 8 men's lacrosse team took down Brown, 15-5.

"I was a little upset about getting hit," Leveille said, referring to his knock down by a Brown defender in the second quarter.

"I knew I had a lot of time and he (Dixon) was pretty good on the fake so I knew I could dress it up."

Junior Dan Paccione netted the first goal of UMass' second half run on a sidearm shot to make it 7-4. Junior Don Little scored a couple minutes later from the high slot and Leveille finished off the third quarter faking Dixon into the air and sending the ball into the low netting to give the Minutemen a 9-4 advantage.

Senior Rich Kunkel lead the Maroon and White's final quarter march, scoring all of his three goals in the stanza, while Morely added two.

UMass outshot Brown 58-26 while Minuteman Jeff Seals took 21 out of the 23 possible faceoffs. For UMass, the 12 victories on the season are tied for the third highest total ever. The 1981 and 1989 squads both took 13 games, and the 1972 team ended 12-4.

CLASS OF 2001 SENIOR CAMPAIGN

In keeping with the Senior Campaign tradition that dates back to 1917, the Class of 2001 will be raising money to make a gift to the University in honor of their graduation. This year's Senior Gift will build on the momentum set by the class of 2000 by continuing the renovation of the Reserve Reading Room in the W.E.B. DuBois Library. The Senior Class gift is a way for the class of 2001 to leave its mark on the campus and begin a tradition of support for the University. The Senior Campaign will begin in April, and it is expected that $25,000 will be pledged by Commencement.

STARS

STARS (Student Alumni Association) is a student group who works very closely with your UMass Alumni Association and the Alumni Relations Office. STARS was formed to be the bridge between the students and the alumni. Many of their events bring both groups together for networking and social activities. STARS is open to any University student who is interested in making a difference while here at UMass.

For more Information and Meeting times, please contact us at 577-1390.

Remember to send off your favorite seniors in style...

Kiss them Goodbye!

Send a senior a commemorative glass filled with Hershey Hugs and Kisses for just $6.50.

You can order them any time there is a STARS table on the Campus Center Concourse. They can be picked up by the Senior in May!

Elton John and Billy Joel took the stage together.

Local realtors run background checks

UMass students' judicial records not so confidential, potential renters find

By Ryan Girard
Collegian Correspondent

Anyone looking for off-campus housing in Colonial Village, Presidential Apartments, College Inn, Perry Apartments, Mill Hollow, Lantern Camp, 177 North Pleasant Street or Griggs Apartments had better check their University of Massachusetts judicial records first. If students have been written-up during their stay in the residence halls, they might want to consider living elsewhere.

Kamins Real Estate manages the aforementioned apartments and under its new policy, any UMass student must sign a release form before being considered as an applicant. Signing the release gives the Dean of Students' office permission to research the student's housing history, which is then sent back to the realtors.

Although the details of the record and any violation remains confidential, the associate Dean of Student's, Paul Vasconcellos, is obligated to paraphrase the incident as a "warning," "minor" or "major" residence hall violation. Along with this information, the number of housing violations the student has received is also disseminated.

When asked about the policy, Lance Lucas, a member of the staff at Kamins, explained that any housing violation will result in a student not being rented to.

"A disciplinary check through the University's Dean of Student's office is done," he said. "If the student turns out to have a record, they are not rented to."

Lucas explained that Kamins does not discriminate among different violations.

"We don't get that specific," he said. "Kamins has a very strict policy regarding housing violations. Students who have any type of record are denied."

Under this policy, a student who has a simple noise violation and a student who has a handful of write-ups are lumped into the same category. A University administrator in the Dean of Student's Office, who wished to remain anonymous, cited one particular incident of how the policy is being implemented.

"I know of a case where the student had been cited for a warning, the absolute lowest infraction you can get in the dorms, and Kamins denied [renting to] them too," he said.

Kamins is not the only real estate agency in the area that requires these release forms as a perquisite for rental. Harlow Jones Properties, Lincoln Rental property and Townhouses of Amherst have all followed suit since Kamins introduced the policy last summer.

According to Vasconcellos, the judicial check by area realtors is a response to the rioting and dumpster fires that have occurred in housing complexes like Brandywine and Townhouses of Amherst.

In contrast to Kamins criteria, the Townhouses use its own judgment when receiving notification that a potential applicant does, in fact, have a record with UMass Housing Services.

"I don't see how anyone could use it [release of judicial record] as an end-all," Townhouses' Manager Judy Johnson said. "It doesn't give any details. To us, it's just another dynamic to look at."

Office manager of Lincoln rental property, Nancy Bowser, takes a similar stance on the new policy, explaining, "We just talk about it and discuss the issue and then go from there."

Brandywine has not implemented such rental policies yet, but property manager, Andrew Newcomb supported the Kamins policy.

"Whatever any landlord in Amherst can do to protect themselves from problem residents is good," said Newcomb. "There's no support from the community, local courts or the University. Power to them [landlords]: the more, the better."

Student Trustee Seth Avakian, who works directly with judicial matters, receives these release forms from Kamins and other agencies. He said that students are uncomfortable with these rental policies.

"Every student I have talked to is very upset. They feel it is a violation of their rights," Avakian said.

Still, the release is a mandatory part of the application process at Kamin's.

"Although it hasn't happened yet, if a student doesn't wish to sign the release, it would be just like they didn't fill out the application at all," said Patrick Kamin, Office Manager at Kamins.

Mapa to discuss cultural identity, stereotypes in one-man play

In an entertainment culture that routinely typecasts stars based on ethnicity (J-Lo: Latino sexpot) and sexual orientation (Ellen Degeneres: did anyone see that straight-to-video B-movie with her and Sharon Stone?), an actor who defies categorization is a welcome and refreshing change.

Alec Mapa, self-described as "a nightmare to cast," will bring his one-man tour-de-force "I Remember Mapa" to the University of Massachusetts' Bowker Auditorium for a single performance on Thursday, May 10.

Based on his own experiences as a gay Asian male, the piece tackles questions of Asian and gay stereotypes, Filipino identity, family and perseverance in "making it" as an actor. Mapa's strength lies in his ability to traverse boundaries of identity, exploring with flair the challenge of finding one's place and voice in a society that seeks to reduce people to one adjective apiece.

From high school to the professional acting world, Mapa has constantly found himself out of place. A 5'5" Filipino actor, he has experienced the tendency of the professional acting world to label actors on sight.

"As an actor, I've always tried to get people to see beyond 'type,' and as a gay person of color my life has been spent pretty much trying to do the same thing," he said. "Writing and performing this show became a perfect opportunity for me to be seen as I wish to be seen...on my own terms and in my own words."

The performance Thursday will be at 8 p.m. Tickets are $10 general admission, $5 students.

SGA looks backward and forward

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

With summer quickly approaching, members of the Student Government Association are finishing up old business as well as beginning anew.

After a rough year, members of the newly elected SGA executive cabinet have been eagerly awaiting the up and coming semester with high hopes and anticipation. President John Sheehan expressed his optimism over what has been already accomplished this present year and what he and his cabinet plan to accomplish in the following year.

"We're really focused on getting new students into the SGA next year and working heavily with the new students program," Sheehan said. "If we sit on our ass this summer we won't get anything done like this year."

Parking Services and the Greek seating apportionment in the Senate were two issues that were expressed as major concerns by members of the SGA.

"The issue with the Greeks was one thing that divided us this year, but we've changed all that," Sheehan said. "We now have two districts, commuter and on-campus residential, we got rid of the third district making it one person, one vote. This has helped to close the door on a lot of hostility that we previously had."

Sheehan furthered to explain that he plans to start the fall semester with a clean slate not only within the SGA but with students and administrators as well.

"A cohesive relationship with the administration is huge," Sheehan said. "We put a lot of wrong kinds of pressure on the administration, and they want to help us out. We need to be friends instead of ordering them around."

Executive Cabinet member in charge of Public Policy Tom Fleenor expressed similar thoughts when asked about next year and what it holds for the SGA. Fleenor explained that they plan to get the word out about the SGA and draw in as many students as possible.

"I've been working on making up bulletin board packets for every dorm and working with the Registered Student Organization Resource Center," Fleenor said. "We need to get the word out to the students about the Senate and let them know what is going on."

Fleenor continued to explain that one of his goals for next semester would be getting RSO's more active with one another.

"Jon Laubinger [elected Student Trustee] and I have been talking about getting programs started in dorms such as Patterson," Fleenor said. "Students don't know about all the resources there are here on campus and we want to get them involved."

Two main priorities expressed by Sheehan for the summer where that of laying building blocks for next year and student awareness.

"We're really focusing on laying the building blocks for next year and throughout the rest of the summer," Sheehan said. "We need to change the culture on this campus and build relationships between RSO's and students so we can work as a cohesive student body."

Fleenor agreed explaining that it's the SGA's job is to get students involved and that they plan on doing this to the fullest.

"Everybody is powered up to no end and the fact that things are already happening is a good sign," Fleenor said.

Sheehan expressed similar thoughts regarding the SGA Senate and its improvements as well.

"We passed 19 motions two Senate meetings ago and that shows what we can do as a body when we work together," Sheehan said. "We have a lot of good people involved in the SGA and we need to continue that into the fall."

Children's mental health bill introduced by Rep. Story

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts Representative Ellen Story (D-Amherst) is spearheading a move within the Legislature to pass House Bill 1206, which would create a commission to "deal with children's mental health."

Bill 1206, entitled 'an Act to ensure accountability and provide for the mental health needs of children', has been endorsed by several organizations, including the Boston Bar Association, the Children's Health Access Coalition, the Federation for Children with Special Needs and the Youth Advocacy Project.

"We need more information, more communication between agencies, and more accountability to improve our children's mental health system," Rep. Story said. "This legislation will shed light on the situation so we can know how to improve it."

The legislation would create a 14 member panel, made up of political and public appointees, which would collect statistics and deliver a report four times a year to the Legislature.

"The Commonwealth of Massachusetts recognizes the need to create a commission to study and evaluate the delivery of mental health services to children," the bill reads.

"There is a lack of accountability and coordination of services for children in need of mental health care, many children have been deprived of appropriate, adequate or, in some cases, any care responsive to their needs."

The commission would be made up of members of the Executive Office Health an Human Services agencies, as well as public appointments of certified psychiatrists, psychologists and other mental health expert. Data will be sorted by categories to determine the numbers of 'stuck kids': children living in inpatient psychiatric facilities because there is no other place for them to go.

"Data will provide the means of allocating the available public resources in an efficient and humane manner," said Jane Lukey, president of the Boston Bar Association, which has worked on the issue before. "Data will prove the success of some current efforts to care properly for our children, as well as bring into sharp focus the shortcomings of some of these efforts.

The Children's Hospital of Boston, rated top among pediatric hospitals, also supports the measure.

"The only way we'll get true improvements in the children's mental health crises is through fundamental systems reform," explained Dr. Bill Beardslee, a psychiatrist at the Children's Hospital.

INTERNATIONAL BRIEFS

Compiled By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

AMERICAS

Colombia – Dumar de Jesus Guerrero, otherwise known as "Head-Chopper or "Mochacabezas," was captured by the Colombian armed forces in Bogota on Sunday. Guerrero was supposedly a right-wing paramilitary leader known for his brutality.

The capture comes after a secret police agency, the Administrative Security Department, launched a crackdown of the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia, or AUC. Guerrero is supposedly the fourth-highest ranking member in the AUC, which has up to 8,000 members.

Last week, the AUC was branded a terrorist group by the United States. On the same day, 60 paramilitary fighters of the AUC were arrested. The fighters are accused of taking part in the Easter massacre where 40 peasants were killed. The AUC claims that they only fought guerrillas, however the bodies were found by officials to be unarmed and some of them killed with chainsaws.

The crackdown has come from increasing US and European pressure, as they support the Colombian government by sending it over $1 billion in aid. However, human rights groups claim that the aid isn't helping the hundreds of people that continue to suffer from the fighting between the Colombian government, the AUC, the FARC and the ELN.

Mexico – Everardo Arturo Paez Martinez, a high-ranking member of one of the most violent drug cartels, was extradited to the United States from Mexico after a long legal battle to keep him in Mexico.

Martinez, who is accused of distributing cocaine in California, belongs to the Tijuana Cartel, which is run by the Arellano Felix brothers, who are on the Federal Bureau of Investigation's top 10 Most Wanted Fugitives list.

Martinez has been in Mexican prison for three years. He faces charges of distribution and money laundering in California. Because of a new government policy, he will now have to face charges in the state.

Before today, the US could not extradite criminals from Mexico. However, after the US complained that Mexico was harboring too many international criminals, Mexico began selecting fugitives to be sent to trial in the US.

Since Vicente Fox became president, he has promised better bilateral communication between the two countries and cooperation in the fight against drugs. Furthermore, the Mexican Supreme Court decided that extraditing criminals was not against the constitution.

The US has also agreed to hand over Mexican criminals that are hiding. The move to charge Martinez and other international fugitives is seen by both sides as a move toward more comprehensive and cohesive law enforcement on both sides of the border.

Venezuela – Classrooms have become political battlegrounds between teacher and parent groups and President Hugo Chavez. Chavez has turned his attention toward the nation's schools in an attempt to increase solidarity and nationalism for his "Bolivarian Revolution."

Student and teacher protestors have begun holding rallies to try and oppose Chavez's plan, demanding freedom and democratization in education. Opponents are fearful that his plan will turn into indoctrination and enforce the president's ideological and political views.

The plan, called the "National Education Project," is also being feared by the Roman Catholic Church because they fear that the state is trying to expand its powers at the expense of religion.

Meanwhile the National Education Project will be able to fire principals that don't meet the standards of state appointed supervisors, and intimidate the rest of the principals that do not want to adopt the new political agenda of the government.

Chavez has appealed to the middle class to denounce any teachers or principals that don't agree with his plan. He also claims that the living standards of teachers have been increased due to bigger state funding of student fees and doubling of salaries.

Civic groups continue to call for democracy and protest for democracy.

Bangladesh – A treatment for diarrhea is the winner of a new prize given out by American computer mogul Bill Gates. The Gates Award for Global Health has been designed to reward efforts to relieve health problems that effect poor populations. It is the largest medical prize awarded, at $1 million.

Medical technicians at the Center for Health and Population Research in Dacca are responsible for inventing a cheap and easy treatment for childhood diarrhea that saves up to 3 million lives every year. The Center also did extensive research on birth control programs in the third world and their safe implementation.

The diarrhea treatment involves oral re-hydration salts. The Center discovered the molecular biology process of the treatment.

Gates has set up a foundation for the vaccination of thousands of people in poor countries, and has pledged to give large amounts of money to AIDS patients in Africa.

North Korea – Kim Jong Il has announced that though he wants to keep promises he made to Washington, North Korea can not afford to stop selling arms to Europe.

Kim Jong Il met with European officials this past weekend. The group met in Seoul and talked about everything from trade to relations with the United States. European officials said that they could tell that Jong was eager to increase trade and keep normal relations.

Jong also expressed despair and frustration that the United States continues to regard North Korea as a rogue state. Jong wanted to make it clear that North Korea is dedicated to complying with a missile test moratorium, which means that they will refrain from testing until at least 2003.

Jong also expressed sincerity to advance reconciliation with South Korea.

The European delegates were pleased to meet with a leader that surpassed their expectations. Up until recently, Kim Jong Il was virtually unknown and considered to be a hermit and hostile. The delegates found Jong to be considerate, courteous and willing to listen to change.

The US missile defense plan was not discussed during the meeting.

It is believed that North Korea supplies arms and missiles to third world countries. The EU has denounced these sales as not acceptable. The European delegates reportedly told Jong that if he wanted a relationship with the EU, he would have to follow the rules of the game, essentially meaning the end of exporting missiles to developing nations.

To that, Jong replied that his country was in need of money and it was their decision to whom they would sell missiles.

Indonesia – Vice President Megawati Sukarnoputri, known to her followers as the 'mother of the nation', is the daughter of Indonesia founding president Sukarnaro, is in line to be the next president, even if it is unclear whether or not she even wants the position.

It seems that the Vice President may be just inches from taking over the presidency since the current president Abdurrahman Wahid, has been censured by parliament, and according to many analysts, has his days in politics numbered.

Megawati became vice president a year and a half ago after Wahid basically snuck behind her back to seize a top position in the electoral assembly, even though he knew that she deserved it.

Megawati now leads the largest and strongest political party and is backed by thousands of supporters, many of whom are the poor. Many of her backers believe that becoming president is her destiny and she will be a fantastic president and a great leader. If Wahid is impeached, it is likely that Megawati will indeed take over his position.

AFRICA

Zambia – After attempting to change the constitution to increase term limits to more than two, president Frederick Chiluba has announced that he will abandon his crusade and leave the constitution as it is, and step down after this term.

The move was reportedly spurred by members of parliament who threatened to impeach Mr. Chiluba if he did not follow the constitution. He then announced that he would be dissolving his cabinet and rebuilding it in the next week. He expressed his desire to remain the president of his party even when his term in office is at an end.

Many students and civil groups have been protesting Chiluba's controversial plan to increase the term limits. The political tensions continued to grow, sparking fights in parliament, and eventually lead to the turnaround of Chiluba's mind.

Since he dropped the campaign, both Chiluba's supporters and opponents have agreed that he has now put the interests of the country ahead of personal greed.

Noho Meeting House history long and rich

By Laura Leonard
Collegian Correspondent

In May 1655, twenty-three men from Connecticut and one from Dorchester, MA, petitioned the Massachusetts general court for permission to produce a habit of plays on the Connecticut River. Their petition was supplemented by another, dated May 6, 1653.

Signed by three outstanding Springfield citizens, John Pynchon, Elizure Holyoke and Samuel J. Chapin, they requested that Liberty be granted to Farth Plantation, a piece of land about 15 miles above them on the River. It was to be for large quantities of land sufficient for two miles of plantation. The aesthetics of the land was greatly advantageous to the Commonwealth during the United States' Civil War.

The negotiations between the commissioners and the Yankees were successful, and for a purchase price of 100,000 waffle whitetail, 10 cods and a few trinkets, they compromised their way into creating the now present towns of Northampton, East Hampton, West Hampton, and Hatfield, Montgomery, VT was conveyed by a deed to John Pynchon as well, on Sept. 24, 1653.

In October 1654, the first settlers arrived at Northampton, MA. In April 1655, the first Meeting House in Northampton was completed. It was built of twenty-six foot-long timbers one piled upon another. The house was eighteen feet wide and nine feet high from the lower part of the sill to the upper part. Its roof was thatched.

The exact location of the first meeting house cannot be ascertained. No settlers were located west of that point at that time. What is assumed is that the House faced easterly towards the brow of the Hill, which was then much more abrupt than its present appearance.

From such data it is now possible to obtain land probes to research the actual foundations of the Meeting Houses prior to 1812. It was found that this particular meeting house was actually in a different location than it is now.

During the time of this meeting house's construction, no church had been organized. There was no settled minister. It was not until two years after the building of the first Meeting House was any effort made to obtain a minister. Then, at a meeting held on June 7 1658, the town agreed by unanimous consent to allow Reverend Eleazare Mather to minister to them. Mather was the son of Richard Mather of Dorchester, MA. He graduated from Harvard College in 1656, and he was the only minister ever to preach in the first house.

Rev. Mather officiated there for about three years before a church was organized on June 18, 1661. He was ordained its pastor. Mr. Mather died July 24, 1669, at the age of 32 living only eight years after ordination.

Three hundred and fifty years later, the seventh meeting house stands not far from the original. It is in poor shape and the community, in desperate need of support, is seeking funds.

The Meeting House in Northampton has a long tradition dating back to the late 1600's

UMass prof. Platt explains flood laws

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

President George Bush and the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) have suggested placing limits next year on the number of repetitious National Flood Insurance claims of those who live in geographically predictable flood areas.

"That's something a number of us have been urging for a while," noted University of Massachusetts Geosciences Professor Rutherford Platt, adding that US natural disasters cost the government, insurance agencies, and victims about $20 billion annually.

Platt has disputed over whether the federal government should provide funding to areas that are repeatedly flooded and explained how talk about limiting people who live in geographically expectable natural disaster areas to less than two national insurance claims in a certain amount of time pleases him.

"[People] should expect and take precautions when they live in areas like floodplains or on the coast," he said, "compared to areas that get hard to predict natural disasters, like tornados or freezing ice storms."

People living on floodplains usually have anywhere from three to five flood insurance payments in a span of ten years, which sometimes adds up to more than their property is worth, said Platt.

According to FEMA's National Situation Update, Iowa's severe storms, tornados, and flooding prompted President Bush to sign a declaration on May 2nd, making seven counties eligible for individual assistance and six counties eligible for individual and public assistance from FEMA in the areas of debris removal and emergency protective measures.

"I think the problem [is] the federal government has created a reputation for itself that it will rush in and make everyone happy [after a natural disaster]," said Platt, "and that's not wise."

He explained how it is understandable and necessary for people with low income whose only choice is to live on a floodplain to receive federal help when a flood hits.

However, wealthier people who can afford to live in areas other than floodplains, said Platt, should not be encouraged to live on low lands and then expect the government to bail them out when a flood occurs.

"At the heart of the matter," stated Platt, "is the issue of how much responsibility individuals and local communities should be expected to assume in order to protect themselves."

His most recent book "Disasters and Democracy: The Politics of Extreme Natural Events," deals with three case studies in the US, examining them in terms of politics and how the availability of federal disaster assistance and flood insurance contributes to a false sense of security.

He also wondered if communities concerned about property values and tax revenue are more likely to allow or even encourage building or rebuilding in unsafe locations, such as on floodplains or coastal property, with the expectation of a federal bail-out if a natural disaster occurs.

Hoping people will begin to acknowledge the risk of living in these potential disaster areas if FEMA places limits on insurance claims, Platt added, "People need to have a certain level of self reliance."

Don't brag about avoiding jury duty

Nearing the end of another year at UMass, we sense liberty around the bend, a summer claimed in the name of all that's holy: love, work, beach, travel. After months of what now feel like stale, thankless afternoons in the library, the splashy image of a Coca Cola ad is enough to set us dreaming.

A small percentage of us will receive a summons in the mail that seems to threaten some small loss of this liberty, so long awaited. That official piece of paper is an "invitation" to serve as a juror in a trial near home, a civic duty that could last a day, or stretch into months for some criminal cases.

Some people will start muttering. "Why me?" They'll ask. "Why now?"

Others will share secrets to "successful" abdication of jury duty:

"When they ask you if you can be unbiased in judging the case, you say, 'No.' Then they have to let you go!" There are other tips passed around. Whole Web pages are devoted to getting out of jury duty.

People avoid giving the government time that could be spent at work or play. One person reasoned that the state and country tax his money every week, and therefore have no right to expect anything more from him.

What gets lost in all the discussion about how to slither one's way out of jury duty is this: it isn't a gift to Uncle Sam.

It's a lifeline to a fellow citizen. A juror who serves in a trial has the opportunity to exonerate a person who has been wrongfully accused, or to determine just punishment for the perpetrator of a crime. By interpreting and applying the laws, jurors hold the power to give a person liberty or deprive him of it for cause.

It is not surprising that some people feel jury duty to be a waste of time. Many people arrive at the courthouse in the early morning, bleary-eyed, and read the old magazines in the juror's room, only to be sent home a few hours later.

It's important to remember that merely being present furthers the cause of justice. It gives the judge leverage to broker plea bargains between parties for cases that might otherwise go to trial. If no jurors are available, prosecutors and defendants who are eager for a delay in the proceedings may be able to postpone them by invoking the right to a trial by jury.

On the other hand, if jurors are ready to serve, the trial process avoids costly, bureaucratic snarls like the one mentioned above. Often, the parties will settle matters with the help of a negotiator or the judge, bypassing the hurdles of full litigation. Freeing up the courts in this way helps expedite justice: the wait for a trial is decreased.

If all else fails, remember this: Massachusetts is a state with a "one day, one trial" policy. In other words, if there isn't a trial, jurors go home, having fulfilled their duty by waiting the day. If there is a trial, jurors serve for the duration of it, no longer.

In some states, jurors stay for a full month, whether needed or not. For once, a perk to living in the Bay State.

Anyone who still wants so desperately to avoid this civic duty: good riddance. And in that free time you hold so dear, stay out of trouble, because you wouldn't want to end up in court. You know that flawed, biased American justice system: can't trust it.

Never count out the disabled

MELODY ZAGAMI

Harry Blake II can rebuild a racecar and is the head of a non-profit organization that he started. It's no big deal; mechanics are a dime a dozen and non-profits are coming out of the charitable woodwork, right?

Harry Blake II is blind.

I encounter individuals like Harry every day. I spend 20 hours a week working at the Office of Disability Services in Whitmore. The thought of spending more than your obligatory time in the building of long lines, transcript requests and crushed hopes for housing is upsetting for some. But working there has taught me far more than any lecture ever could.

I am not going to preach to you on behalf of the handicapped. I'm not going to tell you to hold open doors when you see someone in a wheelchair or refrain from taking their spaces. You already should do these things. What I want to do is make you think or rethink what it means to have a disability and how we can learn from those with them in every area of our education and personal lives.

As the child of a handicapped mother I have a personal bias. I am always amazed by people's reaction to a person in a wheelchair. They are always utterly sympathetic, completely confused or absolutely rude. Each time my mother and I go to the makeup counter at Filene's, the Lancome ladies refuse to wait on her ("Lancome" by the way is French for "done up like a prostitute"). Is a woman in a wheelchair not supposed to wear the latest spring colors? I always have to yell at the Lancome lady. "Excuse me could you give my mother some assistance?!"

She looks at me, smiles, then looks down at my mother with her mouth in an "o" of surprise. "Oh, I'm sorry I didn't see you down there."

While she waits on my mom I write obscenities regarding her and the rest of the Lancome staff on the glass counter in matte lipstick. All right, I don't do that; that would be juvenile. I use eyeliner. You're saying, "Just boycott Lancome."

It's not that easy. It's not just them; it's everyone.

In all seriousness, I suppose that this doesn't seem like a big deal, but it is just one example of how people simply do not know how to interact with the disabled. It also shows the obstacles that disabled people come into contact with every day. but that they never let stop them in their quest to do the same things that the able-bodied do only with much more patience and understanding.

At Disability Services, we advocate for students and employees at UMass with hearing, visual and physical disabilities. While you may have an average two hours of outside class work, a student with a disability has double or triple that amount. You may be stressed out because you have to take finals next week. If you were a blind student you would have to come to us and we would find a reader for you so you could take the same test the other students are going to take. If you had cerebral palsy or multiple sclerosis you'd need a scribe to record your answers. As a deaf student you need an oral interpreter for your classes so you can understand the instructor.

While you're in class whispering to your friends about the past weekend's parties, there's a deaf student visually learning from a sign language interpreter.

The most amazing thing is that people with disabilities accept obstacles far better than the rest of us. Able-bodied people let obstacles stop us. I constantly listen to my peers complain about various academic and social issues. They have a huge test or paper next week. They haven't been employed yet and graduation is in two weeks. They can't score with the pretty girl from class, blah, blah, blah. The list of our problems is endless.

Young adulthood is so challenging, but imagine what you take for granted; imagine how insignificant it all is in the great scheme of life and living. At work I will sit at the front desk and chat with the handicapped students. They tell me about their day and the work they're doing. They talk about how they're going to be a teacher or a psychiatrist when they graduate and the whole time they smile. Our office is right next to housing and while we're talking three girls walk by bitching about the fact that they didn't get that triple in Cance they wanted for next semester.

And it is always in those moments when I am absolutely sure that those with disabilities not only realize how fortunate they are, but also know that what we allow to stand in our way is only there because we put it there.

Accommodating people with disabilities is viewed as expensive, time-consuming and an overall pain in the ass. Think about how you benefit from various handicapped accommodations. Electric doors and ramps for example. If you think about it, they make your life a little easier too.

Academically, how would you like it if you were able to listen to your textbooks on tape? This semester I personally recorded the Psychology 213 textbook "Understanding Human Sexuality" on tape for our blind students.

Isn't it exciting to think that you could receive sex education personally from me, your every other Tuesday columnist (okay, maybe that's just weird.) But it would save you from carrying the book around and being cast odd glances while you "study" the pictures.

Individuals like Henry Blake II, entrepreneur and blind mechanic, surround you everyday here at our esteemed location of higher learning. The parking may be crappy, the meal plan may be bad and you might be sleeping on a bench outside the library because you didn't get housing, but, for the most part, we have it pretty good. I invite you to stop in 231 Whitmore just in case you ever need a reminder.

What now? A semester ends...

MATT DEPRES

This always happens.

Without fail, the end of the semester rolls around and I don't have a damn thing to say. Nothing. Anything that has caught my interest in the slightest I've already tried to tackle, with varying degrees of success, and now I've simply run dry. It's a terrible thing, it hurts, but as with anything else, it happens. Just something else to deal with. If nothing else, it's an opportunity to flush out the excess of thoughts that tend to build up over the course of one very long, very tiring semester.

Right now there's a girl walking around in France who I met two years ago while working at a miserable summer job in my town. She's beautiful. Looking back from the safe distance of now, she was the only reason I lasted through that tough summer, and a good reason for why I returned the next, on the outside chance that she would too. I only knew her for those few months before she left to go back to school, and I did the same. It's odd, then, how she's become such a good friend, this girl that disappeared just as I was getting to know her. In the time since, I've come to value my friendship with her more than most others I have made.

Which leads me to wonder: why does it seem that most of the incredible and dynamic individuals we come across in our lives only remain there, physically, for short periods of time? It has undoubtedly happened to you, or someone you know, and it can be as frustrating as Hell. Either they are pushed away or just seem to go, and in either case, the hole they leave, the physical absence, is an enormous if not impossible gap to fill. I've gone through both, and would never move to take one over the other.

The good thing, though, that comes out of this, is that I've had the chance to sit down and write letters, actual letters, and send them to places that I've never been, and may very well never go. In a way, I've succeeded in getting a small part of myself there, and with the time it takes, both the writing and reading, friendships can flourish as a result of the genuine desire to stay in touch.

And what makes it that much sweeter is when you can picture the smile on the other side.

In seven days, the members of R.E.M release their new album. This band means an extraordinary amount to me, and I've spent the latter part of this semester rediscovering why. I hadn't listened to UP in over a year, because it carried a weight with it I didn't think I was ready to handle again. It's a beautiful album, though, as most of their work tends to be, and I'm waiting for the new one to accomplish what all the others have as well. Music can save you. Trust me.

Almost Famous is a great film. Cameron Crowe? A Golden God, perhaps. When I watched it, though, I was filled with a sense of inadequacy, a sense that I wasn't doing enough in my own life. Enough of what I want. Sometimes I want to get up and just walk, find a band and write about them. I want to sit on a dirty bus and drive across country, taking on whatever falls before me. It won't make me rich, and I'll doubt much fame will result, but it will make me happy.

Am I writing a senior column with a good two years to go before I actually graduate? This is sad. This needs to stop. For the sake of continuity, however, I'll give you just one more.

This summer. I have no job. You don't care. It's held my interest, though, wondering how I'll spend the next few months before the first installment of an anticipated multivolume senior year. I have applied for various writing jobs and have heard nothing, expect one call from the rag that kicks around my town every Thursday. I'd like to think I'm more capable than that. I realize this problem isn't unique, and that another summer spent in retail Hell will most likely build character, but for now, all it does is build frustration.

That's it. If I've seen you this semester…thanks.

Enjoy the time you have

ADAM MARTIGNETTI

Consider this a precursor to my senior column, which will run next Tuesday. If you know me, then you definitely should read it because it's almost certain to mention you. Whereas my last column thanks those people and remembers those moments that have made UMass special for me, this column has a more universal appeal, I think.

I once told my girlfriend that graduation was a terribly unfair thing. Think about it for a minute – it may be the last one you have. Despite all the pomp and circumstance, despite the presence of prestigious guests, despite the celebration, it is just a moment. People have worked so hard for so long to get to that one moment. There's so much left lying behind you and still so much lying in front of you. And as at any of life's major landmarks, there is so much to think about. Yet, all you get is that brief moment during the graduation ceremony. Considering the magnitude of the accomplishment, there really should be some week-long party to celebrate.

I can't imagine what must run through your mind in that one second when your college is called and your degree is conferred upon you. In a little under three weeks, I'll find out.

There I said it. I'm graduating. And sometimes, I'm so glad because the routine of school has become tiresome. It has become tired not just in the sense that affects every student toward the end of the semester – the classes, the tests, the papers, the anticipation of summer. This tiredness is more like an accumulation of the last four years, and the previous four, and the eight or so before that. With regards to all of my professors and my classes, I feel like I have nothing left to learn here. I have actually felt like that for most of this semester. When a teacher hands me a paper assignment, I feel like I should have a "Get out of paper writing" card, which explains that, if I were to write the paper, it would be coherent, well-argued and well written. It's not because I'm lazy or I don't like writing – I'll hopefully be doing it for a living – but rather because I've written so many papers. That's the kind of tiredness I'm talking about.

Other times, I think I'm graduating and I'm sad, because I know I'll miss it. I'll miss the things, and more importantly, the people I love. I'll miss just being here, because college is something that you can never get back. This time, this place, these people – not that they are all forever lost – but the way they all come together in college is lost when you graduate. And that's why it's sad.

I was sitting in the Collegian last week, just goofing off, as we sometimes do, and the subject of graduation came up. Somebody said that they didn't want to leave because it felt safe there (referring to our humble abode in the Campus Center basement). And I thought about that office – the place where I've spent so much time, perhaps too much – and I realized that the person was absolutely right. It was safe. It was familiar. Not just the office, but the people in the office, my friends, and the routine of putting out a paper – it's all safe and familiar. And this logic extends beyond the Campus Center basement. I ord knows, life should. All my friends – from people I've just met recently to those I've known forever – are safe and familiar. And those are not bad things; in fact, I would argue that they're the best things. Without those people, the college experience (learning aside) would be worthless.

It's odd because we come here as freshmen not knowing many people around us, into surroundings that are unfamiliar and, perhaps, intimidating. In our four years, or maybe longer, we have an absolutely great time. We meet so many great people. We make this place familiar. Then, we have to leave. Somehow, that seems sad.

And I guess what I'm getting at, or what I've been trying to build toward here, is the loss of potential. For me, that's one of the saddest things about graduating. College is supposed to be the place of endless possibilities, endless potential. Unforeseen opportunities, exciting experiences, intriguing people – all things supposed to characterize college. And I'm not saying that then didn't for me. To look back on where I was four years ago and to compare it to where I am now would take another whole column – something, unfortunately, I simply do not have. I'm just wondering where all that potential goes now that college is over.

And the point? Well, the point is some wisdom to those of you who aren't graduating. Enjoy whatever time you do have left here. Enjoy the people around you. Stay up way past your bedtime to hang out with the people on your floor. Ask that incredibly attractive blonde girl to cuddle with you. Skip class (every once in a while) to play basketball because the weather is nice. Get drunk on a class night. Why? Because soon, you'll probably never be on campus, and you won't see your friends on your floor as much, or at least not like you do in the dorms. And sooner than you think, you'll graduate and you definitely won't see them as much. And if you don't ask the attractive blonde girl to cuddle, then you'll never know what might have happened. In the end, that one class isn't really going to mean a whole lot, but you may remember the pick-up basketball game when you played like God. And going to class with a hangover isn't that bad.

So enjoy. That's my advice. Don't let the "could be's," the "should be's" and the "I wants" become "could have been," "should have been" and "I wanted." When you're in my position, you truly realize how significant that change in tense is.

I'm sorry for the over-sentimentality, but this is the last time you'll have to endure it. I'm graduating.

Moulin Rouge soundtrack fails despite talent

Unfortunately, the Moulin Rouge soundtrack is far less than the sum of its parts.

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

VARIOUS ARTISTS
Music from Baz Luhrmann's Film Moulin Rouge
Interscope Records

Most movie soundtracks these days are a lackluster collection of would-be radio hits that may or may not have appeared in the actual film. Perhaps some of the movie's score is thrown into the mix, although most producers are unwilling to risk losing an audience's interest with non-commercial music.

The better non-score soundtracks can act as a greatest-hits album for bygone eras of music, an obvious example being Pulp Fiction, which also benefited from clever sound byte tie-ins with the film. The Rushmore soundtrack does a marvelous job of blending a solid British Invasion line-up with a highly listenable original score. Such soundtracks are noteworthy not just because they offer good music, but because they recreate the musical landscape of films which rely on music for much of their mood. They offer not just songs you may have heard in the movie, but songs which were essential in defining the movie.

It is this latter, higher-minded sort that the soundtrack to Moulin Rouge clearly wants to be – like Pulp Fiction, it uses bits of dialogue from the follow to reconstruct the music's context and (theoretically) give everything the proper emotional edge. All of the music plays prominently in the film itself (none of the "from and inspired by" nonsense), and the album's producers seem genuinely interested in making available a piece of the movie, not just a collection of music benefiting promotionally from its association with the movie.

Intention is not a guarantee of success, however, and unfortunately the musical landscape of Moulin Rouge, no matter how accurately recreated, has little of substance to recommend it.

To begin with, several of the pieces are performed by the film's stars, Ewan McGregor and Nicole Kidman, and although the film is certain to benefit from not needing to rely on voice-overs, on the album we are left only with the unavoidable fact that neither McGregor nor Kidman are stellar vocalist. They aren't even good. Both have bland, unpolished deliveries, relying on tricky phrasing to cheat their way out of difficult passages, and their performances, although most of the time technically decent, sound awkward, silly and lifeless alongside such excellent vocalists as Bono, David Bowie and Christina Aguilera.

Even these established acts, however, aren't at their best. Aguilera teams up with Lil' Kim, Mya and Pink for "Lady Marmalade," a raucous piece of radio candy with a chorus that doubles as a French lesson: "Voulez-vous couchez avec moi?" Fatboy Slim gives us "Because We Can," which demonstrates just how awful his music can be when stripped of anything resembling a hook.

David Bowie makes a considerable contribution with two different versions of molasses-slow "Nature Boy," collaborating with Massive Attack on the second. Massive Attack makes a solid effort at dressing up the tired-sounding tune with their standard array of trippy atmospherics, but it's too little, too late.

The album's best offering comes from Beck – a cover of "Diamond Dogs," a Bowie tune, a dire election-ic arrangement that finds Beck alternating between rapping and singing. Compared with other Beck material, however, it's at best an exercise in synthesizers and falsetto backing vocals lacking the opportunity and textural complexity that makes Beck worth entertaining.

None of the music on the Moulin Rouge soundtrack is particularly noteworthy, but what really kills the album is the disconnectedness of everything: there's no stylistic tie, no point, no thread, no context beyond the snippets of story thrown in like a bad mix tape.

Twin piano gods put on phenomenal show

BILLY JOEL & ELTON JOHN – FACE TO FACE
Syracuse, N.Y.
May 5

The venue could not have been better – two of the world's most influential pop artists on stage together at a university.

The lesson learned by the sellout crowd of 38,500 at the Carrier Dome was that chemistry is essential. The two professors that taught this lesson were Billy Joel and Elton John.

As the pianos emerged from within the stage the duo took their seats and began a 3-hour musical masterpiece.

It was all business for the opening number as the first notes of John's 1970 classic "Your Song," came from the speakers. Although it was the first hit for John it was Joel that had the luxury of singing its opening verse.

The second number was Joel's "The Way You Are," for which he dedicated to his first ex-wife (Elizabeth Weber). Joel changed the final line of the chorus from "I couldn't love her any better" to "I couldn't love her any longer" to show his bitterness toward his former manager.

No sooner was the song finished that John tried to outdo him and sent his "Don't Let The Sun Go Down On Me" to a fictitious first ex-husband with his full band on stage.

When the song was over Joel's piano disappeared and John began his solo set. Again there was a class in chemistry as John's band showed just how important they are to his music. When John introduced the band he joked that the "accumulated age on stage is more than 500,000." The age did not matter as original drummer Nigel Olson and veteran guitarist Davey Johnstone traded the spotlight with the legend.

The set began with the majestic "Funeral For A Friend/Love Lies Bleeding" in an extended version, but it was "Someone Saved My Life Tonight" that earned him flowers from a woman in the front row.

In his time on stage alone he progressed through his more famous albums like Madman Across The Water, Captain Fantastic and the Brown Dirt Cowboys, and his Goodbye Yellow Brick Road.

While we went through the abridged version of his over 30-year career he made sure that the singles that made him the icon that he is today were covered. He grandly performed his hits "Rocketman," "Tiny Dancer" and "Levon" in succession before he played Joel's "Uptown Girl," which was written for his second ex-wife Christie Brinkley. Before he went into his version of "Uptown Girl" he explained to the crowd that it recently went to No. 1 in England with a cover by Westlife.

He also let it be known that the Joel donated the proceeds that he receives to charity.

For his final two songs John got adventurous and led the crowd in a chorus of "laaaaaaa, la la la la laaaaaa" for his upbeat "Crocodile Rock." In his final number he kicked the stool out from under him and played "Saturday Night" from his knees.

At the conclusion of his set John embraced the crowd and gave way to Joel with the crowd in a frenzy.

Joel continued with the rapport as he began with "I Go To Extremes," from his 1989 release Storm Front.

Joel's first crowd interaction came when he apologized to the fans on the right side of the arena for having his back to them before he played "Angry Young Man." He also joked and said, "at least you get to see the piano being played, and you get a little ass thrown in."

"New York State of Mind" was next, a song that he let the crowd know he will soon be recording with Tony Bennett and dedicated to it to a woman named Trish. Joel continued with his dedications on "Scenes From An Italian Restaurant," for which chef Emeril Lagasse of Food Network fame.

Joel brought a tear to the eyes of many members of the crowd when two songs that were "born together" were played. "Lullabye," which he wrote for his only daughter with Brinkley and "River of Dream" where he incorporated Joey Dee and the Starlighters' 1963 smash "Shout."

Joel then played the John's "Goodbye Yellow Brick Road" before he ditched the piano for the guitar for "We Didn't Start the Fire" and "It's Still Rock 'N' Roll to Me," where he handed the microphone to a man in the front row to sing the final line. He concluded his set with the ever-popular "Only the Good Die Young" with the crowd dancing for the first time.

Then it was time for the duo to again show how much respect they have for each other by playing together again.

The first encore began with Joel's "My Life" and was followed by John's "The Bitch is Back." The song provided comic relief as the duo watched the other play while lying on top the piano.

The two again traded the next pair of songs with Joel's "You May Be Right" and John's "Bennie and the Jets" before finishing with Jerry Lee Lewis' "Great Balls of Fire."

Just when the crowd could not expel any more energy the two returned to the stage for the second encore and the most anticipated songs of the night.

John started with the largest grossing single of all time "Candle In the Wind" and then Joel played his classic sing-along "Piano Man."

As the crowd was left awestruck by the rendition of "Candle In the Wind" it was quickly revived for "Piano Man."

The concert ended with the entire crowd swaying and singing the final chorus in unison, just the way that Joel had intended it to be.

Beatty & co. offer over-forty hijinks

TOWN & COUNTRY
With Warren Beatty, Diane Keaton, Goldie Hawn, Garry Shandling, Andie MacDowell, and Jenna Elfman
Directed by Peter Chelsom
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

Peter Chelsom knew that this day would come, although he probably didn't think it would come after such a long amount of time. After nearly four-and-a-half years, the director's first major feature film, Town & Country, has made it to the screen, and into view of movie critics everywhere. After rewrites, extended shooting, further editing and other delays, several Hollywood strategists may have been thinking that Chelsom's first film would also be his last.

However it's safe to say that Town & Country was worth the wait. It boasts an awesome cast, at least for moviegoers over 30, or those who are able to recognize the big names in the business. It's very rarely that this hefty a cast stars in one movie (unless it's a Woody Allen film), and it's all very refreshing to see these screen legends together. Headlining the film is Warren Beatty, who despite his 64 years is still one of the best-looking leading men in showbiz. It's no wonder that in this movie about adulters three women lust after him: much like Paul Newman, Beatty has only become more handsome as he's aged, which makes him perfect here for the role of Porter Stoddard, a likeable and successful New York City architect who has an affair with a young musician after 25 years of marriage.

Porter's best friend Griffin (Shandling) is also having an affair, but it's not what you think it is. Suffice to say, both men aren sent packing, and they are thrown back into the single life. Griffin makes a better adjustment than his buddy, and it's often to comic results. Seeing such an unattractive guy hitting on young beautiful women is funny enough, but his sharp sense to deliver comical lines in such a witty and droll fashion is what makes us like his character. We like Porter, too, but for a different reason: he is constantly remorseful. He realizes the error of his ways, and wants to fix things with his wife, but getting there is not so easy.

While accompanying Griffin's ex-wife (Hawn) to her home in Mississippi, the two "do the act" but swear to never mention it again. However, when Porter's affair with the cello player is exposed, Hawn is more upset than his wife. "You bastard!" she yells at him. Porter's wife takes this to be a scolding for cheating on her with the musician, while we know that Hawn is cursing him for cheating on her too. Comic irony runs throughout Town & Country, and it's continually amusing.

On that same flight to Mississippi, Porter meets the kooky Eugenie (MacDowell). She introduces herself, and when he tries to do the same, she says his name for him. "How do you know my name?" he asks. "Because I love to fuck architects," she explains nonsensically. We know that she is trouble, and so does Beatty, so he smiles and returns to his seat. It's not until a while later chronologically that he again sees her at a ski lodge where she's staying with her par ents. Porter stays that night at the house, but it turns out to resemble a twisted version of Meet the Parents. Not only does Eugenie like to play a game where her stuffed animals engage in sexual intercourse with each other, but her parents are off their rockers. Her mother is confined to a wheelchair where she bangs into anything in sight, thus followed by a number of swears, and her father (Charlton Heston) is a rifle-toting homophobe (we all get the humor here).

When Porter is made aware that the cellist is pregnant, we sympathize with Porter as to the severity of the situation. But we later find out (this is after Porter's already been kicked out of his home) that she isn't pregnant at all...her cello is! Say what? First, you'll need to know that in an earlier conversation with Porter, she says that she is married to her instrument. That said, when her cello is expecting a child, we take it to mean that she is acquiring a new instrument. It doesn't have the same comical effect as it was intended, but the timing is perfect; had her true meaning been discovered earlier, then perhaps Porter wouldn't be in as much trouble as he is.

Warren Beatty and Diane Keaton, stars of several movies your parents have seen.

Despite Town & Country's amusingly ludicrous situations, we discover that there is also a sentimental side to it too. The bittersweet ending makes us realize that people do make mistakes, and sometimes they just can't be forgiven. At the same time, the upside is that mistakes also begin to make us learn more about ourselves. It's been awhile since there has been a comedy (with the exception of Bridget Jones's Diary) where people can actually feel good about themselves afterwards. Town & Country aims to please, and hits its target right on.

Dave Chapelle riotously fun

By Nicholas Pizzolato
Collegian Staff

DAVE CHAPPELE
Fine Arts Center
May 6

In three years of attending UMass events at the Fine Arts Center the Concert Hall had never seemed so crowded. From the front row to the top mezzanine, the venue was booked solid, leaving little room to move or even breath. This capacity turn out was all for one man, actor/comedian Dave Chappelle.

The show began with three opening acts, all of them worth arriving early for. At 8:45 p.m. when Dave Chappelle took the stage, the Fine Art Center's main auditorium exploded in applause and standing ovations. Chappelle's career in comedy had blossomed as early as 1996 when he was featured as the insult-hurling comic Reggie in the Eddie Murphy film The Nutty Professor. But even with that film and his appearance as Achu in Mel Brooks' spoof Robin Hood: Men in Tights under his belt, Chappelle was still a virtual unkown among the American public. However, Chappelle gained national notoriety with the film Half Baked in which he starred in and co-wrote. The film not only gained followers who smoked the five leaved plant, but even those who knew nothing about it. Making the film a cult classic among the latter end of Generation X, despite harsh reviews by critics.

As soon as he strolled onto the stage, people were jumping up from their seats for a handshake. Two fans threw their copies of Half Baked on the stage to be signed by the comedian. "Let me tell you all something," piped in Chappelle as he autographed the films, "never do a film high. . . I didn't even know I was in the damn thing until I saw the poster."

Chappelle's act focused on a number of things as he took the stage for forty-five minutes. He mentioned that picking out good movies is a tough thing to do. He quiped that he received a script to play Bubba in Forrest Gump, and turned it down because, "No one wants to watch a retarded guy succeed in life by accident while their life sucks. . . And we thought no one could be dumber than Forrest, until we met his black friend." He ended his rant stating, "I didn't know it (Forrest Gump) was going to be so big."

He spoke of the roles that black men play in films, focusing on primarily on Vietnam films. He stated the difference between crack-heads and weed-heads; and went own to portray a crack-head, sliding his feet and scratching at the "spiders" that covered his body. He mentioned that crack is a totally different drug than weed. According to Chappelle you can function on weed, but on crack you're a super-hero. "I hit a crack-head while driving my SUV. The guy jumped up and yelled 'CRACK!!'" He ended the set talking about two things, the devil (who turns out to be white) and oral sex.

He was energetic, candid and was very complimentary to the full house. The show was raw, offensive, and possibly one of the funniest shows I have seen. The crowd was very responsive, roaring with laughter whenever it seemed necessary. It's this offensive brand of comedy that makes everyone laugh even if they are the butt of the jokes.

Former Flashdance star talks about making her comeback

By Josh Hamerman
Indiana Daily Student (Indiana U.)

(U-WIRE) BLOOMINGTON, Ind. - Jennifer Beals is perhaps best known for her portrayal of Alex Owens, a welder who moonlights as a barroom dancer, in the immensely popular 1983 film "Flashdance." Her performance netted her a National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Image Award for best actress as well as a Golden Globe nomination.

"I loved school. I loved it so much, and I knew that I was good at school. It was exhilarating; the whole process of formal education is exhilarating."

In the years following her successful debut, the 37-year-old Beals has added a wide range of projects to her resume, including the 1995 movie "Devil in a Blue Dress," in which she co-starred with Denzel Washington. She has also appeared in the Showtime television films "The Twilight of the Golds" and "A House Divided."

Later this year, Beals can be seen opposite Gwyneth Paltrow and Jennifer Jason Leigh in "The Anniversary Party," which will hit movie theaters in June, as well as the miniseries "Feast of all Saints," which will premiere in November on Showtime. Beals and Leigh recenly collaborated on an original screenplay entitled "Inside Job," which will begin production next year.

Now, the beautiful Chicago native speaks about her upcoming projects, the legacy of "Flashdance" and what she learned while a student at Yale University.

Q: Why do you think that "Flashdance" is still an American pop culture icon 18 years after its release?
A: I'm really not entirely sure because there are so many facets to what makes something remain in the public's imagination. For some generations it's about fashion, and for others it's about the underlying story of the movie. Some people like the theme that you should follow your dreams and that you can succeed.
Q: Do you believe "Flashdance" would have been as popular without its soundtrack?
A: I think the music was integral to the movie. The fashion was integral and the dancing was obviously a big part of it, but all of the contributions were equally important.
Q: If Alex Owens was a real person, what do you think her life would be like today?
A: It's been so long, and the fact is I don't really think about the film very often, so I have no idea.
Q: Do people still come up to you and talk about "Flashdance"?
A: No, not really. It's interesting how many people come up to me about "Devil in a Blue Dress" and my other films. When "The Twilight of the Golds" was first on TV, a lot of people came up to me and said how much they liked it. A lot of people come up to me about an Italian film I did called "Dear Diary," which is surprising.
Q: You chose to continue your studies at Yale University instead of pursuing some of your post-"Flashdance" movie offers. What were the reasons behind your decision?
A: I loved school. I loved it so much, and I knew that I was good at school. It was exhilarating; the whole process of formal education is exhilarating. It's very exciting when it becomes clear that all the subjects you're taking are very integral to one another, and I knew that I could go back to Hollywood when it was over.
Q: What was the most important lesson you learned while in college?
A: That everything is related. Every subject is related to every other subject in some way. And we're all connected to one another, even though we don't think we are. I think that on a practical level, it helped me to learn how to learn. It wasn't specific information that was important so much as the ability to be able to learn.
Q: Tell us about your upcoming miniseries "Feast of all Saints."
A: It's based on the Anne Rice book. I play Dolly Rose, who starts out as the belle of ball and then becomes a madam.
Q: What was it like to work with Gwyneth Paltrow in "The Anniversary Party"?
A: I've known Gwyneth since she was 12, and we worked together as a group in the film "Mrs. Parker and the Vicious Circle." Gwyneth is such a delight; she's God's great gift to the planet.
Q: What overall impact has your multiracial status had on you?
A: It's funny because I think I'm allowed to play a lot of different kinds of parts that normally I wouldn't get a chance to play. I always feel that I'm the center of the circle and the circumference of the circle all at the same time. I've always understood what it means to be on both sides.
Q: Which of your projects are you most proud of?
A: Well, I really love "The Anniversary Party." I think it's really a great movie. I loved "The Twilight of the Golds" and "A House Divided." It's not so much that I'm proud of my efforts, but how everything and everyone came together in such a wonderful way.

Penn discusses his experience on both sides of lens

By Jackson Burke
The Dartmouth (Dartmouth College)

Sean Penn continues to have one of Hollywood's most distinguished careers.

(U-WIRE) HANOVER, N.H. – Ask Sean Penn a question, any good question at least, and the first thing that will strike you is how carefully he considers his answer. Rather than simply shoot out a glib, prepared response, he sits still for a moment, ponders the question and then speaks. The second thing that strikes you is the power with which he speaks about the art of filmmaking. He speaks with a measured force, and the confidence of a man who is very good at what he does, and knows it.

Before the interview, I was given the opportunity to follow Mr. Penn and the directors of the Dartmouth Film Society around, taking notes every now and then and generally just observing. The first time I managed to catch up with them was during the first seminar put on by the film studies department.

When one hears about Sean Penn in the press, he is not often described as a talkative man, and certainly not one who is willing to answer a lot of questions. They should try talking to him about film sometime. He was fielding questions from both students and professors, questions about acting in front of the camera, about directing behind it, about writing, producing, getting your foot in the door, hitting the mark, everything. I decided now would be an opportune time to get some quotes down. Little did I know.

While fielding a question about his writing, Penn brought up the subject of jail, a setting used prominently in his film "The Crossing Guard." "I like to write what I know. I have to write what I know, or I try to go out and find out about it." He talked about his own experiences with jail briefly, and why the depiction of the penal system in some other movies has always bothered him. "I have nothing against stylization at all, but if I become aware of the problems in the film, if it becomes so stylized that it pulls me out of the movie, that's a problem."

One student asked him about the pressures of getting a film made as a producer and director. There were several questions like this throughout the day, and I don't think it would be untrue to say that there is no subject closer to Penn's heart than the struggle of getting a movie made. He grinned while formulating his answer.

"There is such great, great energy in creativity. When you're writing, creating, there is such energy in that. But there's also the hustle, talking to people, trying to get them to put money in your movie. Orson Welles once said to making a movie is 98 percent hustle, 2 percent filmmaking. The creation is wonderful, but the hustle takes it out of you."

Since it was an audience of prospective directors and filmmakers, Penn was asked several times what it took to be a director, and what he personally felt were his strong points. This answer came slower than most. "I like to think that I can show my actors what a generally silly person that I am, first of all. I find that if they can look at me and say, 'Well, he's a clown', then it will make them feel less constrained about the choices that they make."

Erin Dignam, a writer/director and a member of the cast of "The Crossing Guard," chimed in. "One thing that I can say about Sean as a director is that he watches extremely well. In one scene, I'm having an argument with another man and in one particular take I felt as though I should touch his face. I didn't do it, it just felt like I should. Sean comes up to me before the next take and says, 'Try touching his face is the next one.' So he has an excellent eye and is very supportive of his actors."

On the subject of mainstream Hollywood, Penn is a little less lighthearted. "It seems as though we're setting up a genre of movies where if you have good ab muscles, you can kill anyone. There's no story. People who make movies like that should die of rectal cancer. Screaming." (When I was introduced to him as a reporter from the D about an hour later, Penn shook my hand and said, "That was rectal cancer, r-e-c-t-a-l ....") Another student asked him flat out what he thought of the Hollywood system. Again, he gave a rather surprising answer. "You know, to me, Hollywood is like a bank. You get together with a couple of friends, decide which door to go in and when, take the money, and hopefully go do something worthwhile with it."

To Sean Penn, making movies seems to be more about personal connections than the expectation of personal success. "If the group of people you're making a movie works, it becomes like a traveling circus, like a family. One of the best things about directing is that you get to choose the people that make up this circus. As an actor, you don't get to choose the people." He pauses, then grins. "Like our electoral process."

Toward the end of the last seminar, I decided to ask a quick pre-interview question. I asked him how he felt about pre-release screenings, which is when a movie is viewed by a private audience before it is released wide, so that changes can be made should the audience prove less than receptive. Unsurprisingly, Penn's take was no different than most directors. "I look at it historically. Historically speaking, for the time they started [public screenings], movies have gotten worse and worse and worse. I mean, it's okay if you're making a flat-out comedy, and you need to know if the laughter from this one scene is going to bury your next bit of dialogue, but for most movies, no. It's more for advertisers than filmmakers."

Penn concluded the seminar by offering a warning to film students. "Censorship is coming back, folks, big. It's coming back and it's the responsibility of the new filmmakers to stop it."

Finally, a half-hour before the presentation of the tribute at 8 p.m., I got to sit down with Penn and ask a few questions of my own.

The D: I know that you have very strong ideas on what makes a movie worthwhile. As a director, or even as an audience member, what makes you say, "Okay, that was worth it. That movie deserved to be made?"

Penn: I suppose that you get caught up in it. That the movie pulls you into its world. I think that audiences don't always know when they're being lied to, but they will always be able to figure out when they're being told the truth. I think that a movie becomes worthwhile when it shows you something new, something with truth and heart.

The D: You have always been called one of the greatest actors of your generation. Do you see anyone now who you like, anyone coming up through the ranks that you've got your eye on?

Penn: Oh yeah, the director of Amores Perros [Alejandro Gonzalez Inarritu].

The D: Why? What specifically about that movie?

Penn: It's great that it's a movie about love. Unapologetically and brutally. And the structure of the film is amazing too. It's very ambitious the way the foreground of one story makes up the background of another story. It's just highly structured and I like that about it.

The D: I read that your second film, "The Crossing Guard," was inspired partially by the birth of your own child, and partially by hearing about the death of Eric Clapton's son. Your third film, "The Pledge," also deals with the subject of the death and protection of children.

Penn: Yeah, "The Crossing Guard" was definitely an exorcism of the fears of parenthood. You think about what you would do if the unthinkable actually happened, and writing this movie was sort of cathartic experience to get rid of those demons. "The Pledge" is not really inspired by the same feelings. It was more just a question of wanting do this movie. It really didn't have that theme.

The D: You've pretty much run the gamut as far as jobs that you can do in Hollywood. Acting, writing, directing, producing, you've pretty much done everything that can be done, and had a lot of success with it. Which job do you feel you are more naturally suited for?

Penn: As far as my life goes, it's definitely more suited to directing. You only have so much time to do the things that you want to do, and right now there are so many projects that I want to work on and direct. So for right now, yeah, my life is much more suited to writing and directing. Acting gets in the way.

For my last question, I wanted to know about the dynamic between him and Jack Nicholson. Both had been lauded as some of the greatest talents of their respective generations, and both also had a reputation for being forceful personalities. I asked if they had ever clashed on the set. Penn's response was possibly the most complimentary I have ever heard a director say about an actor.

Penn: No. No way. It is impossible to clash with Jack Nicholson. The man just doesn't have bad ideas. His ideas either work perfectly, or if they don't work there is a very simple reason why they don't. Jack is one of the most supportive people I've worked with. There's a reason why certain people have made so many classic movies. They're willing to give you everything that they have. They put all their trust in you, and they're willing to go down with the ship if that's what happens.

In the day that I spent around Sean Penn, I found him to be a consummate professional, much more a filmmaker than a "celebrity." He achieves a rarity amongst artists, passion without pretension. His artistry lies in his commitment to the story he is telling. As he put it to a group of acting students, "All that you need to do is tell the story. Today, that will set you apart because nobody is interested in telling stories these days. Martin Sheen told me once that if you have something to say, people would hear it. So make sure that you have something to say."

Talking with an Asian-American author cracks racial barrier

By Bret Harper
Daily Northwestern (Northwestern U.)

(U-WIRE) EVANSTON, Ill. — Children's book author Grace Lin told Northwestern University students on Saturday about the difficulties and rewards of breaking new ground in the publishing industry by writing about Asian-American characters.

"To publish a multicultural book is almost impossible," she said. "(Publishers) felt Taiwanese books were too specific."

Lin, author and illustrator of the children's book "The Ugly Vegetables," was one of the first children's authors to use Asian-American characters in stories.

Lin, who said her stories are based on her experiences as a minority in upstate New York, described the experience of trying to fit in with her mostly white neighbors.

"I had a mixed identity. I tried to fit in, but I felt kind of alienated," she said. "I was hungry for books with Asian characters in them."

Lin set out to create the books she yearned for as a child. After attending the Rhode Island School of Design, she spent three years struggling to publish her first book. She found that the publishing industry generally avoided books that featured minority characters.

She eventually found Charlesbridge Publishing, which published "The Ugly Vegetables." Now her books are available in many bookstores.

"The Ugly Vegetables" is a story from Lin's childhood about her mother's garden. While other families planted flowers, Lin's family grew Chinese vegetables. The brightly illustrated story involves a girl who wanted to grow flowers until she tasted the food prepared from the "ugly vegetables" that her mother grew.

Lin said she thinks the success of multicultural books is an important indicator of tolerance.

"The success of multicultural books is a reflection of our place in society," she said. "If my books are successful, it shows we have a place in society."

Students reacted with enthusiasm to Lin's 45-minute speech, and most stayed around afterward to speak with her. Several students said her story touched them personal personally.

Taiwanese American Student Club President Doreen Lee said she brought Lin to campus because the author was a family friend and TASC thought her speech would fit well with Asian-American Heritage Month.

"When she says what it was like growing up, it was word-for-word like my experience," said Lee, a Weinberg junior.

"You hear about her struggles and it's pretty inspirational," Lee said. "It shows what is possible."

Despite her own struggles, Lin sees progress in the publishing industry. The success of children's books with black characters gives her hope for other cultures.

"For a while there were no African-American books, but now there is a market," she said. "Still, there are nowhere near the amount of (multicultural) books there should be."

Students said that the simple children's books are an important development for minority groups.

"White people books teach about the world around us, but it's also good for kids to identify themselves," said Leon Chang, a McCormick sophomore. "The best is a mix of characters like in (Lin's) books. It unconsciously shows the cooperation."

Lin said she still faces difficulties in getting publishing companies to recognize the intricacies of different cultures.

"I was asked to illustrate a book written about Korean characters," Lin said. "(Publishing companies) don't realize how different cultures are."

But Lin said she's generally pleased with the progress she has made in the industry.

"I think the general public needs changes in small steps," she said.

Information and Instructions for Seniors About the Commencement Ceremony

131st Undergraduate Commencement Ceremony Sunday May 27, 2001

www.umass.edu/commencement

PRE-COMMENCEMENT GENERAL INFORMATION:

- There is no Commencement rehearsal.
- Tickets are not required and there is no limit on the number of guests you may invite. There is no reserved seating. The stadium is uncovered. The ceremony will be held at the stadium, rain or shine.
- Caps, gowns, tassels, and announcements may be picked up at the Textbook Annex weekdays between May 7 and 25, 9:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. Early May pick-up is strongly advised. Please bring your ID card so your eligibility can be confirmed. A friend may pick up the package for you if s/he knows your height, major, and ID number.
  On Commencement day, caps and gowns may be obtained at the Graduate Assembly Area north of the stadium after 8:30a.m.
- Disability Services: For mobility or hearing impaired guests, please call 545-0892.
- The Index (the yearbook) may be ordered by calling 545-0848.
- Commencement Videotapes may be ordered by calling 545-1283. Also, on Commencement day there will be a booth at the stadium where videos may be ordered.
- The University Club on campus will be open to the public and will serve gourmet meals from 12 noon to 4 p.m. To check availability, call 545-2551 before the ceremony begins. (Mastercard, Visa, and Discover are accepted.)
- Diplomas will be mailed after the grades have been received, recorded and processed by the Registrar's Office, and the diplomas have been engrossed. We plan to mail diplomas in late July. Inquiries may be made to the Registrar's Office, 545-6296.

COMMENCEMENT DAY GENERAL INFORMATION:

- Routes to campus/travel assistance: Please advise your guests to plan ahead to allow extra travel time to campus. Traffic is usually very heavy on major routes and in the greater Amherst area as early as 8:00 a.m., and delays are frequently encountered. (Commencementsat Amherst College and Mount Holyoke are the same day at 10:00 a.m.) Encourage your guests to arrive by 8:30 a.m., park in the upper campus lots, and take the shuttle buses to the stadium. Seating at the stadium is "first-come-first-served." See the commencement Web site for detailed travel directions to the campus: www.umass.edu/commencement.
- Parking and shuttle services: Public Safety will direct you to designated parking lots. Beginning at 8:00 a.m., free shuttle buses will circle campus every 5-10 minutes, taking you and your guests to the stadium, and returning you to the lot after the ceremony.
- Snacks and souvenirs: Coffee, soft drinks, bottled water, donuts, bagels, and pastries are available at the refreshment stands on both sides of the stadium. Fresh-cut roses, bouquets of flowers, and balloons will be for sale inside and outside the stadium. Sweatshirts, T-shirts, baseball caps, seat cushions, teddy bears, banners, disposable cameras, and film are available at the tent on the east side. In addition, the University Store in the Campus Center will be open from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. with a complete supply of UMass clothing, gifts, and other merchandise.
- Food Services: Following Commencement, a Food Court adjacent to the stadium, will offer a variety of food for sale, including sandwiches, salads, and hot and cold beverages. Reservations are not required.
- Post-Commencement Photo Area: After the ceremony, you are welcome to use the special photo area at the south end of the field under the scoreboard.

CONGRATULATIONS FROM THE ENTIRE UNIVERSITY COMMUNITY

No flight delays in NBA, just arrivals and departures

The second round of the NBA playoffs has begun and in the first round the trend was unimportant arrivals and departures of teams and players.

Two players that arrived from rival cities were actually teammates last season. Toronto Vince Carter and his cousin, Orlando Magic forward Tracy McGrady, entered the ring under the playoff spotlight. McGrady came to the tourney and ran from the cold up North to the sun down in Florida, showed why he was worth the risk by single-handedly carrying the Magic in its first round series against Milwaukee. T-Mac averaged 33.8 points and 8.2 assists per game. He proved why he is one man wrecking crew as he set the NBA record for consecutive 3-pointers taken during a four-game series with 17.

However, while McGrady has become a star, Vinsanity was moving on. It looked like Carter would cough up a Knickball for the second straight year through the first three games. His field goal percentage was around 30 percent and his defense showed that he had not subscribe to the Tom Thibodeau defensive drills video he could have talked to former Toronto sports superstar Fred McGriff – he endorses the video).

However, the struggles of Carter became an absolute cough when his teammate Charles Oakley called Carter out, saying that he needed to carry the team and put them on his back, something he had not done the first three games. Carter responded, not Vince, but his mom Michelle, as she went on television and questioned Oakley's productivity. This was responded to quickly by Oakley who put in a classic when he said, "I don't want no beef with her, but I guess she's got a beef with me. If she wants to be a coach, Lenny [Wilkins's] contract is up in two or three years."

No need for that now as Carter has responded. He scored 32 points in Game Four versus New York and 27 points in the decisive Game Five win at Madison Square Garden. He has since followed that up with 35 points in the Raptors' shocking Game One victory in Philadelphia on Sunday. Carter has gone from goat to hero again, but it took Oakley and his mom to get into their little squabble to do it.

Another team that has shown up and taken the NBA by storm are the Dallas Mavericks with their lovable (yeah right) owner Mark "smoochies" Cuban. After falling down by two games to Utah and showing little composure in either one of the two games in Salt Lake City, the Mavs showed why they had gone from nobodies to the playoffs in two years. Dirk Nowitzki, Steve Nash and Michael Finley started showing their dominating form. They were at their peak in Game Four, when the trio combined for 80 points in a 107-77 game four win.

The Mavericks showed their maturity in Game Five when they led for the grand total of 28 seconds and still won the game. This time, it wasn't the trio, but a man show. Oddly enough for Jazz fans it was another Michael who did them in. Not Jordan, but Finley as he put on a Jordanesque series-saving performance with 33 points. Utah had a 14-point lead heading into the fourth quarter, but Dallas came back and won the game. Though the hairstyles might need some work, these guys can ball and they proved it with their stirring comeback.

The Jazz were just one of those teams that had disappointing seasons end in the first round. Was this it for John Stockton and Karl Malone's chances of ever garnering that NBA ring? When Malone's last second shot bounced off the rim, was that the ultimate "Iron Unkind" for the Jazz in their franchise history? The Jazz is a team that plays it close to the best and if they are not at their best, then their chances of winning are limited. That showed in the fourth quarter when they scored just 12 points and allowed a Dallas team that seemed out on its feet to become Muhammad Ali and rope-a-dope the Jazz out of the championship chase. The question now is, with Stockton being 39-years old and Malone 37, do the Jazz have another run left in them? If not, then that pair will unquestionably go down as the greatest pair in NBA history not to win the ring.

The Knick-knack paddy whacks got whacked out of the playoffs as well. The growing frustration of which New York team culminated in Game Five when an uninspired team got beat by the young guns in their own back yard. The frustration of one man, Latrell Sprewell, came out after Game Five when his unnerved post-game show resulted in questioning his teammates and whether or not they had left it all on the court or had something in the tank with no games left to use it.

Marcus Camby's effort can't be questioned as his family ordeal led to a reduced impact. However, he gets a pass by just being on the court. The same can't be said of the point guard combination of Charlie Ward and Mark Jackson. The duo got dominated by former Knick Chris Childs and child prodigy Simon, no Theodore, no Alvin Williams. If any one component of that series was a key, it was Williams' emergence and Jackson's disappearance.

As for the biggest bust of the NBA season, the Portland Trail Blazers had a plane crash-like season come to a sweeping end at the hands of the defending champion Los Angeles Lakers. The Technical-Blazers, like the Washington Redskins in the NFL, taught us one thing, you can't buy a chamtpionship unless your team name is the Yankees.

A team that was within nine minutes and a monumental choke from the NBA Finals last season, was within a prayer and a Laker catastrophe from winning a game in this year's playoffs. Rasheed Wallace has gone from dominating to dumbfounding and Scottie Pippen has gone from Robin to Jordan's Batman to a team that turned into the Robin Williams of basketball – a comedy.

It was only fitting that the Lakers, the team that gave them its harshest defeat, gave them the royal beat down that sent them packing, and might have sent that franchise into a tailspin for years to come.

How fitting, the Blazers were in a tailspin after last year's playoffs, got a ton of new players this year, and ended up in more of a tailspin after this year's playoffs. The trail they blazed led to nowhere.

Maryland women earn No. 1 seed

By Brandon Okland
The Diamondback (U. Maryland)

(U-WIRE) COLLEGE PARK, Md. – Suddenly, there is a dark cloud surrounding the top-ranked Maryland women's lacrosse team.

Although the Terps (19-0) won twice this weekend to finish off the sixth undefeated regular season in team history, six players were suspended for unspecified violations of the student-athlete code of conduct.

"There was a violation of the student athlete code of conduct by a number of student-athletes resulting in disciplinary action," Terp coach Cindy Timchal said in a prepared statement released Friday. "There was not a violation of state law."

Senior midfielder Jen Adams, the two-time NCAA Player of the Year, did not play in the Terps' 14-4 victory over Harvard at Chase Field Sunday. A university spokesperson said that Adams' absence in the Terps' lineup was unrelated to the suspensions.

"Jen Adams did not play today because she is dealing with personal issues," the spokesperson said. "She was not one of the six players who was suspended."

The team refused to disclose the names of the six players who were suspended, saying it would be intrusive to the student-athletes involved.

With six players missing from the lineup in the Harvard victory, Terp coach Cindy Timchal was extremely limited in personnel. Junior Meredith Egan made her sixth start of the season and juniors Kaile Robinson and Annie Morris both made their first starts. Egan, who started 45 consecutive games for the Terps before tearing the anterior cruciate ligament in her knee last year, put together a strong effort, scoring two goals and dishing out two assists.

The win came just two days after the Terps narrowly avoided defeat against No. 4 Dartmouth. After trailing by as many as five goals in the second half, senior midfielder Courtney Martincz scored the game-winner with 2:51 remaining to lift the Terps to a 12-11 victory. Martinez's goal capped a huge comeback from the Terps, who trailed by as many as five goals in the second half.

Although the announcement of the suspensions had been made prior to the game, the players did not feel it contributed to the lackluster play through the first 40 minutes. One regular did not play against Dartmouth.

"I don't think it had much to do with it," Comito said. "Really, we prepare for every game the same way. We need to ignore any possible distractions and focus on the opponent at hand and the Dartmouth game was no different."

Yet the Terps were unable to win draws and unable to garner possession in the end of the first half and the beginning of the second. Dartmouth went on a 7-0 run to push their lead to five goals. It was at that point that Terp senior midfielder Quinn Carney was able to win a number of draws in succession and help to spark a Terp 4-0 run highlighted by three goals in four minutes from Adams.

Sunday night, the Terps were awarded the No. 1 seed in the upcoming NCAA tournament. The Terps will face No. 16 seed Monmouth (12-7) in a first-round game Thursday. While questions about the team's focus abound after the announcement of the suspensions, Timchal is hoping to put the situation behind her.

"The matter has been dealt with firmly and fairly," she said in the prepared statement. "The student athletes are regretful and we are putting the matter behind us and we are moving forward as we set out to defend our national title."

Wisconsin grabs Big Ten tourney berth

From Staff Reports
Badger Herald (U. Wisconsin)

(U-WIRE) MINNEAPOLIS – With the bases loaded, the tying run on second, two outs on the board and a 3-2 count in the bottom of the seventh inning, Wisconsin hurler Andrea Kirchberg was still smiling.

Both dugouts were on their feet, the fans that weren't cheering were holding their breath, and the rain kept pouring down. But Kirchberg seemed relaxed. She must have known that last pitch would cross the plate right down the middle and Shelly Nichols wouldn't swing. The pitch came, the umpire called a strike, and the Badgers clinched their second consecutive Big Ten Tournament appearance with a 3-1 win over Minnesota.

The Badgers took the early lead in the second inning with three runs on four hits; they held that lead until the underside of the sixth inning.

Senior Lindy Barth came out swinging in the second and singled to the right side to bring Anna Jones to the plate; Jones batted Barth to second, and Nicki Starry singled up the middle to bring Barth home for the 1-0 lead.

Jen Grill hit into a fielder's choice and rookie Sheena Padovan cranked her third double of her career to bring Grill home from first. The Gophers brought in their ace and Big Ten-strikeout leader, Piper Marten, to end the inning, but Kerry Hagen doubled down the left field line to send Padovan home for the three-run lead.

The excitement began in the sixth when Angel Braden came to the plate and homered over the 215-foot marker in center-field on the 14th pitch to close in on the Badger lead, 3-1. But two fly outs to left field and one of Kirchberg's 11 strikeouts of the game put the Minnesota squad back on defense.

By the time the Gophers came to the plate in the final stanza of the game, the rain was falling so hard that time had to be called after every pitch to dry the ball. Minnesota put runners at first and second with a single and two errors in the first two at-bats. Nicki Starry made a perfect play on a bunt fielder's choice to throw out the lead runner at third and keep the Gophers from advancing.

The next batter struck out and brought Braden to bat again. This time, the ball count fell short of a home run, and Braden reached on a hit by pitch. With the bases loaded, Kirchberg, the Big Ten's strikeout-looking leader, struck again with her 75th strikeout looking of the season, giving the Badgers the 3-1 win and the Big Ten Tournament berth.

"I was very impressed with Andrea today," head coach Karen Gallagher said. "She was the epitome of mental toughness. We made some errors behind her today and put ourselves in a situation we didn't want to be in, but even with that and with the weather, she continued to battle through. She had an awesome attitude on the mound and a great presence, and nobody was going to beat her tonight.

The 31-23 Badgers (9-11 Big Ten) then lost to the Gophers, who converted crafty base running into a 2-1 win Sunday. Minnesota's Tammi Hays and Amy Hafemeyer scored the two runs that were all that was needed; UW only managed one run in the bottom of the fifth. Heather Ostrowski might have tied the game in the seventh but was cut down on a play at the plate for the game's final out.

Hawks next on slate for UMass

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Down the stretch they come.

No, even though the Kentucky Derby just happened this weekend, it's not horses. It is the Massachusetts baseball team that is entering its stretch run.

The Minutemen (20-17, 10-6 Atlantic 10) now stand in third place in the conference – just one and a half games out of first – after taking two of three on their trip to George Washington.

Next up for the Maroon and White is St. Joseph's, who sits in sixth place in the conference. However, in the tight A-10 conference, the Hawks (22-22-1, 9-7 A-10) are just one game behind UMass for the league's third spot.

"It's an important series for [St. Joseph's]," said UMass head coach Mike Stone. "They're in sixth place, but there's not a whole lot of difference between us and them. It's going to be tight, I told the guys it's going to be a battle."

The Minutemen will play a doubleheader against St. Joe's today, with the final game of the set being played tomorrow at Earl Lorden Field. The series was originally scheduled for the weekend of March 31, but was postponed due to rain.

UMass will hand the ball to freshman Anthony Gallo in the first game of the set. He is third on the team with a 5.25 ERA in 24 innings of work. Tuesday's game will be just his second start of the season. After Gallo, however, the starters are yet to be determined, according to Stone.

"We'll have to see how it goes, feel it out and see what happened," he said. "It's coming right down to the wire here for us, so everybody has got to be ready to pitch."

Likely candidates to get the nod include freshmen Brandon White and Eric Chown. White pitched admirably in his first career start last week, pitching seven innings and allowing only three hits to Hartford. Chown is the team leader in ERA at 2.96, but the majority of his innings have come as a short to middle reliever.

The Hawks are coming off a series at Duquesne where they took two out of three from the Dukes. One of the best offensive teams in the A-10, St. Joe's is led by Kevin Kirkby and Tim Gunn. Kirkby's .376 average is among the best in the conference, as is his 34 RBI. Gunn leads the team's power attack with five longballs and 29 RBI.

As for the Minutemen, they too are one of the offensive juggernauts of the A-10. Senior captain Nick Gorneault and sophomore Jeff Altieri lead the UMass batsmen from the three and four slots. Gorneault is tops on the team with his .381 average, and his nine round-trippers and 32 RBI are near the top of the list. Altieri has been outstanding in the cleanup spot, hitting .348 with his 40 RBI being in the upper echelon of A-10 members.

But for the season, it has been a balanced UMass attack that has been pivotal to the team's success. According to Stone, continuing that balance is vital as the team finishes off its conference schedule.

"We're trying to get all nine guys in our batting order going at once," he said. "That way, we can score runs at any time. We're looking to have a solid lineup and have everybody contribute."

The Minutemen had been struggling defensively, but have rallied as of late. Part of this improvement has to do with the insertion of Cullan Maumus at shortstop. Maumus has only started in 10 games this season, but has performed admirably, committing only three errors and posting a .933 fielding percentage

"Cullan has done a really good job defensively," Stone said. "You have to make the plays that should be made. Routine plays have to be made in order for a team to be a good ball club."

Both today's doubleheader and tomorrow's single game start at noon at Lorden Field.

The baseball team has shown improvement defensively over the past few games, an attribute that will be crucial as the A-10 tourney approaches.

seventh and eighth innings, entering the ninth knotted at six apiece, and setting the stage for Clark, who ripped his base hit to hand UMass the win.

Chown picked up the win for the Minutemen, improving to 3-1 on the season. Starter Nick Skirkanich pitched seven innings for UMass, striking out four.

"We had some tough games back and forth," Stone said. "[GW] is a good ball club, and we played very well. For the most part it was just nip and tuck, especially yesterday. We had a lot of people help us out, with a lot of gutsy at bats. We got some good pitching by Skirkanich and Chown yesterday and Gavin Clark gave us a big hit at the end. Overall we played some good defense and did a lot of good things."

UMass is back in action this afternoon, as they prepare to kick off a home series against St. Joseph's at Earl Lorden Field. For more information, see the related story.

Softball seeking revenge against arch-rival UConn

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

Last time it was for history – this time it's personal.

After wrapping up the Atlantic 10 schedule last weekend with an undefeated conference record, the No. 23 Massachusetts softball team (39-11 overall, 21-0 Atlantic 10) will host rival Connecticut (32-20, 14-6 Big East) this afternoon with just one thing in mind – revenge.

While both teams are looking ahead to postseason play in mere days, UMass will try to avenge a heartbreaking 2-1 loss at Storrs, Conn. on April 25. The loss ended the Minutewomen's winning streak at 24, which tied the team record.

In the loss, UMass blew a 1-0 lead in the bottom of the sixth inning behind three singles and an error – one of three charged to the infield on the day.

Showing impressive character, the Minutewomen refused to allow the loss to initiate a freefall. Instead, UMass reacted with a weekend sweep over Fordham and has posted an 8-1 record since the letdown. Overall, the Maroon and White is 32-2 over the last 34 games.

The victory over the Maroon and White was UConn's 15th straight, a streak that was broken, ironically enough, at 22 – good enough to tie the Husky team record.

UMass is coming off another impressive weekend at the UMass Softball Complex. The home team beat up on Rhode Island for three games, outscoring the Rams 16-2 on the weekend.

Each member of the Minutewomen's pitching troika – junior Jen Hadley (15-6), senior Carrie Jeffries (12-4), and sophomore Kaila Holtz (12-1) – posted a victory in the sweep.

Leadoff hitter Emily Robustelli will pace the Minutewoman offense. The sophomore shortstop is batting .323 with 5 triples while placing second on the team in slugging percentage (.506).

The team leader in slugging at .537 is clean-up hitter Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler, and she may win the team's triple crown. The third baseman is first in batting (.324), home runs (6), and runs batted in (38) heading into Tuesday's matchup.

Meanwhile, UConn split an important conference doubleheader against Seton Hall this weekend. The Huskies were shut out in game one, 3-0, but rebounded nicely for the second game, 5-3. Sophomore ace Barb Cook got the decision in both games. The right-hander's record now stands at 15-10.

The Husky offense boasts two batters hitting for extremely high averages. Jessica Yanosy leads the team at .342, while Nicole Dubovik is mere points behind her with a .338 average. Nearly one-third of the UConn RBI have come from just two players, Megan Biddle (25) and Mandy Simjian (25).

In what will be the last game of the regular season for each team, it is expected that both squads to use the matchup as a measuring stick going into the playoffs.

UConn will once again look to measure itself against a nationally ranked team that is back on a roll. UConn has a tough postseason matchup this weekend against Villanova and a win over the Minutewomen will help the Huskies build momentum into the Big East tournament.

The Minutewomen will discover whether they have improved in the last few weeks heading into post-season play. During a portion of the season that team must hit its stride, the Maroon and White can judge exactly where they stand against an opponent that disheartened them just weeks ago while exacting some revenge at the same time.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Co-captain Teri Rooney and the rest of the Minutewomen will try to get some revenge on UConn today.

Jeffries got into a jam in the top of the seventh inning when the bases were loaded and there were two outs. However, she was able to clamp down and get Rams catcher Gabriela Zagami to pop to third and the ball game was over.

Jeffries gave up six hits and struck out seven while only walking one en route to her twelfth victory of the year.

Senior outfielder Debbie Tomoguchi went a combined 3-5 to help the Maroon and White sweep the two games of the doubleheader.

UMass 2, Rhode Island 0

It was Senior Day at the UMass Softball Complex, and although there are only three seniors on this year's squad, the rest of the team made sure that their leaders would go home with a victory.

The recently injured Holtz got the start and put in one of her best performances of the season. With very little run support, Holtz hurled a two-hit shutout, striking out five and walking none.

"I thought she was outstanding," said Sortino. "She pitched a great game.

"It was perfect timing because we rested her and everyone was a little concerned that she would be a little rusty," she added.

UMass was only able to get two runs off of two hits on the day, but defense saved the day for the Minutewomen. There was no bigger defensive play than the one turned in the top of the third inning. With UMass winning 1-0, third baseman Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler robbed Tindall of a hit she hit a scorcher between Wheeler and shortstop Emily Robustelli. The junior dove glove side, snatched the racing ball and made the perfect throw to first from her knees.

When asked if she was surprised by Wheeler's fantastic play, Sortino calmly responded, "we work on those things.

"I think our defense has been one our strong points all year," she continued. "I think this has been one our best defensive teams ever."

Holtz managed a 1-2-3 inning in the top of the seventh giving her the win and improving her team-best record to 12-1.

The A-10 Championships start May 10 but before that the Minutewomen have some unfinished business. Tuesday at the UMass Softball Complex UMass will face off in a single game with long-time rival, the Connetict Huskies (32-20, 14-6 Big East). For more information on Tuesday's match-up see the related story.

Senior Day occurring on Sunday may have had an adverse affect on her squad's play the rest of the weekend.

"It was a very emotional day and when I get emotional I feel very drained," she said. "It was really hard to get them going, but they faired well."

The Minutewomen were able to make it an extra special weekend for Henderson as they swept the Rhode Island Rams in a trio of games en route to a perfect 21-0 Atlantic 10 regular season.

"It was a great day for "Harry"," said Sortino.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20-May 20)- Hide your dark side from people who can't handle it. The group's interests are best served by compromise or a muted message. If someone accuses you, you know nothing.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20)- By identifying and labeling a problem, you give it a life of its own. A fresh start is risky, but it's a risk worth taking. After this point, one of the relationships in your life may be very different.

CANCER (June 21-July 22)- Everyone else has gone home, but you're too busy to care. You appreciate the silence and the chance to relax into your personal rhythm. There's nothing to prevent you from doing your best work.

LEO (July 23-Aug.22)- If you huff and puff every time a friend asks to borrow a quarter try and be a little more generous. Before you start counting pennies, think about how it makes you look. Even if money is tight, it's not nice to be miserly. People will take notice.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22)- You're an emotional mess today. Try to avoid any stressful situations. Even a little TV cheesiness is bound to move you to tears, so play it cool with a little late-night viewing – if you feel daring.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22)- You like things out on the table, but you feel like they're all stuffed in random cupboards and hidden around the house this time. Don't lose your temper if you have to go hunting for the answers.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21)- A mysterious job opportunity will arise... possibly in the news field, or in construction. Maybe sales, or investing. The stars are not clear on what just yet. Call back.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21)- Pivotal decisions need to wait. You don't know what you want, so don't go committing yourself to anything or you'll regret it soon.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19)- Work is on your mind. You haven't been feeling entirely productive lately, and it might have nothing to do with whether or not you're making money. The last thing you need in your life is a deep and abiding sense of emptiness, so figure out what changes you need to make and make them.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18)- Now that you're moving in the right direction, take a little time to notice the scenery. Keep in mind that somebody might be able to point out road signs you hadn't even noticed.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20)- If you let people push you around, you're a self-made punching bag. Stop trying to accommodate everyone else and start taking care of yourself! Otherwise, you'll end up with a bunch of unsightly battle-scars.

ARIES (March 21-April 19)- Nobody likes feeling stifled and you're making the people in your life feel downright suffocated these days. Try to remember that trust is the foundation of all healthy relationships.

Women take A-10 title again

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

Led by strong performances in almost all the field events, the University of Massachusetts women's track team captured the 2001 Verizon Atlantic 10 Outdoor Championship last weekend.

The Minutemen amassed 76 of their 191 total points in the shotput, discus throw, javelin throw, hammer throw and pole vault events to finish 23 points ahead of the second place URI Rams.

"We're psyched. It's our third [A-10] title in four years," said senior Carole LaPlante. "It meant a huge deal to us. In indoor [season], It was kind of a let down that we didn't win. So we went into this with the mindset that we were going to win and it was great that we did."

LaPlante is part of the core group of seniors who have led the team all year and continued to lead it this past weekend.

"I think our senior leadership is a really strong group of people with nine seniors," said LaPlante. "A lot of us lead by example. We're a tightly-knit group because we start in September and we're together all the way through May."

The Gardner, Maine native came up big for the Minutewomen on Sunday, placing second in the shotput with a mark of 39' 11.25" and third in the discus throw with a mark of 128' 05.00". LaPlante also made her debut in the hammer throw and managed to place seventh, earning two points for the team.

"Our coach told me two weeks ago that I was going to pick up the hammer," said LaPlante. "I thought I was going to kill somebody, but you just have to focus on what you're doing and do what's best for the team."

LaPlante certainly had help in bolstering the team's strong field performance. Junior Shannon Hamilton placed third in the hammer throw, fourth in the shot put and fifth in the discus throw, earning 15 points overall. Rhianna DaCruz, a junior hailing from Pawtucket, R.I., placed first in both the javelin throw, with a mark of 139' 00.00", and the pole vault, clearing 10' 11.75".

A pair of Melissas also provided strong senior leadership over the weekend. Melissa Ward stepped outside her usual event, the heptathlon, and earned points in the high jump, the triple jump and the long jump. Ward, who won last year's A-10 heptathlon event, placed second in that event this year. Still, all told, Ward had a hand in a team-high 27 points.

"It was nice to win this year. I was kind of curious to see how we would have done against Virginia Tech since they left the Atlantic 10," said Ward. "This would have been a good year to beat Virginia Tech. It was important that the freshmen got the experience this year. They had heard stories about winning the A-10 and it was good for them to see it."

Senior Melissa Henderson was also all over the track for the Minutewomen. Henderson placed in two individual events and was also part of the 4x100 meter relay team, which took third.

"I've just worked hard and I was really pleased with the way I ran," said Henderson. "I couldn't have done it without my teammates."

UMass coach Julie LaFreniere successfully used the stacking strategy – placing many competitors in the same event – all weekend long to earn the team valuable points.

"It was very good coaching strategy throughout the meet. She pretty much stacked every event," said Ward.

The A-10 title was the third for the Minutewoman track team in the last four years and their fourth in the last six years. The last time the team captured the outdoor title was during the 1998-1999 season.

"This is just a great way to go out. We had a rough beginning of the season and we just came together as a team," said Henderson.

The Minutewomen won yet another A-10 title this weekend, as the outdoor squad brought home first place in the tournament. It was the team's third title in four years.

Baseball takes crucial series from A-10 foe GW

By Matt Despres
Collegian Staff

Two wins out of a possible three against Atlantic 10 rival George Washington University?

That'll do just fine, thanks.

The Massachusetts baseball team [20-17, 10-6 A-10] was able to congratulate itself this weekend after heading to Washington D.C. and taking two crucial games from conference rival GW, splitting Saturday's doubleheader (a 12-10 victory in game one; a 7-2 loss in game two) and closing out the series on Sunday with a close 7-6 win.

"It was great for us, we really rose to the occasion," said head coach Mike Stone. "We knew it was going to be a challenge going in, because it's always tough beating GW at home. It's definitely a home field advantage there – it's a strange place, almost like a Little League field with everything in close. It was a real good team effort all weekend."

UMass 12, George Washington 10

That team effort got Stone's club rolling in game one as, offensively, it continued the strong output of last week, when they handed Hartford a resounding 13-1 loss to pick up some lost momentum.

The Minutemen jumped out to a 3-0 lead in the second on a GW error and a two-run double by freshman shortstop Cullan Maumus. The Colonials would rally to tie the game in the bottom of the third, and would stay tight through the fifth, as UMass held onto a one-run lead.

Junior outfielder Mike Kulak would change that, though, hitting a grand slam in the top of the fifth inning, his second homerun of the year, to give the Minutemen a five run cushion. Senior Gavin Clark, who has been swinging the bat remarkably well in the second half of the season, chipped in with a three-run homer, his eleventh longball of the year, in the seventh that helped pave the way to the 12-10 victory.

Despite the 12 runs offered up the by the offense, the game was still a battle, according to Stone, and a hard-fought victory that should be accredited to a welcome command of simple fundamentals.

"[Strong defense] makes a huge difference because the pitchers need to be confident in the fielders making the plays," Stone said. "We've been doing pretty well as of late; we're making the plays that should be made."

Senior lefty Craig Szado earned the win for UMass, improving to 4-3 on the season, while freshman righty Eric Chown picked up the save.

George Washington 7, UMass 2

Game Two yielded different results, however, as the offense was quieted by a strong pitching performance from Colonials sophomore Greg Linden.

The Minutemen managed to jump ahead early, going up 1-0 on a leadoff homerun by designated hitter Tim Klett. The Colonials quickly responded, however, notching four runs in the bottom of the third to take a three-run lead.

Seniors Ross Smirne and Tony Brown singled, and were followed by junior tri-captain Matt Krimmel, who singled to left to put the Colonials up 2-1. Senior Dan Rouhier followed Krimmel with his ninth home run of the season to make it 4-1.

UMass cut the lead to 4-2 in the fifth, but would again sit and watch as GW pulled away. Junior Mike Bassett doubled off of the left field wall to score sophomore Tony Dokoupil and make it 5-2. Sophomore Chris Barry followed Bassett with a two-run single and the Colonials extended their lead to 7-2 and round out the afternoon's scoring.

UMass 7, George Washington 6

In the rubber game, things again bounced favorably for UMass, as it held on to steal a close one, 7-6, and the series.

Clark was again an offensive spark, singling in senior Nick Corneault in the top of the ninth to snap a 6-6 tie and hand UMass the victory.

After two scoreless innings, the Minutemen got on the board in the third, as Corneault doubled in catcher Tom Hilerbrook to grab the 1-0 lead. GW would charge back, however, putting two runs up in the bottom of the third for the one-run lead.

UMass would respond, knotting things in the fourth and then jumping ahead as first baseman Jeff Altieri ripped a double to bring home Kulak.

The two teams traded runs back and forth through the Perfect weekend for softball

Retirement of number adds to pitcher's legacy

Along the outfield wall of the UMass Softball Complex there are mounted banners commemorating all the Atlantic 10 championships, NCAA appearances and Women's College World Series appearances that the 27-year old Massachusetts softball program has produced.

The one thing that has not been nailed up to that wall is a retired number – until now.

Saturday, the Minutewomen retired Danielle "Harry" Henderson's number 44 and attached it to the outfield wall for everyone attending a game at the complex to see forever.

With a capacity crowd on hand consisting of alumni, family and avid fans, Henderson watched fellow assistant coach Michelle Iunod tear off the maroon sheet and unveil the plaque that reads "Henderson" across the top and a bold "44" under it.

GLEN STRAUB

Henderson – now an assistant coach under Elaine Sortino – pitched four of the most dominating years UMass softball has ever witnessed. She is arguably the greatest athlete in the distinguished history of Maroon and White athletics.

While in a UMass uniform, Henderson posted a 108-35 record with an astonishing 0.70 ERA. The Commack, NY native was a three-time All-American, a three-time Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year and the 1999 Honda Award winner, given annually to the nation's top player. She also ranks third all-time in the NCAA in strikeouts with 1,343.

The accolades continue.

She recently was a member of the gold medal-winning 2000 United States Olympic softball team in Sydney, Australia.

"On this wall are the accomplishments of three generations of softball players," Sortino said at the ceremony in centerfield between the first and second games of the doubleheader. "There is no more fitting place to put that No. 44 jersey than on this wall."

Rather than reminiscing on her personal accomplishments, Henderson was very thankful for the many people who came to her aid along the journey towards success. She thanked everyone from the school, her teammates, the athletic department and most of all her coach of all four years, Sortino.

"She is the one who believed in me before I came here," said Henderson. "She was here everyday working with me and I don't know anybody else who has put so much into this program as she has."

"She is the reason I reached all those accomplishments," she added.

Henderson's remarks left her former coach and current boss, absolutely speechless.

"I don't think there are words to describe it," said Sortino.

According to Sortino, the combination of the Henderson ceremony and

Softball sweeps URI to end conference play 21-0

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team (39-11, 21-0 A-10) had two goals before the beginning of the 2001 campaign. The initial one was to come back from its Arizona trip at the start of the season with a winning record.

Mission accomplished.

The second one was to go undefeated in Atlantic 10 play.

This weekend, the No. 23 Minutewomen swept a trio of games over the Rhode Island Rams (28-28, 10-11 A-10) at the UMass Softball Complex so – like the first goal – this mission has been accomplished.

"It's a great testimony to a great team," said coach Elaine Sortino.

The name of the game all weekend for the Maroon and White was defense. In three games, the dynamic pitching combination of Jen Hadley, Carrie Jeffries and Kaila Holtz let up only three Rhode Island runs.

"I think it's very good to have them feeling this good at this time of the year," said Sortino.

UMass 11, Rhode Island 1

UMass had its way all game with the Rams on the defensive and offensive sides of the field. Junior Jen Hadley was on the mound, and with the win she improved her record to 15-6. She allowed three hits while fanning three and walking one.

The Minutewomen broke the game open early. In the bottom of the second inning, UMass scored five runs to make the game out of reach for the Rams.

The contest was then put away for good when Holtz hit a bomb over the centerfield wall in the bottom of the sixth inning. With women on first and second and one out, the sophomore from North Vancouver, B.C., Canada hit her fourth homerun of the year – making the score 11-1.

Due to the 8-run mercy rule, the victory officially went to the Minutewomen.

UMass 3, Rhode Island 1

In the second game of the twin bill, senior Carrie Jeffries got the start and right off the bat she was in some trouble.

The Rams got on the board first when URI pitcher Gwen Rack drove home right fielder Christine Tindall from third in the first inning. Tindall had hit a triple to right-center that junior centerfielder Teri Rooney could not get her hands on.

However, Jeffries and the rest of the UMass squad found their composure as the game continued. In the third inning UMass tied the score when sophomore Anna Percy stole home after reaching on a fielder's choice.

Massachusetts grabbed the lead in the fourth inning when freshman Aisha Franke scored from third on a passed ball. UMass added an insurance run in the sixth inning to make the score 3-1.

Bowl Day gone bad: Sexual assault reported

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

There was a report of an acquaintance rape in the Orchard Hill residential area on Saturday as well as a number of arrests that kept the University of Massachusetts Police Department busy this weekend.

The sexual assault, which occurred on Saturday at approximately 5:30 p.m., was reported to have happened inside of a living area. The victim was a woman who did not attend UMass but knew her attacker.

Shamus Downey, 19 of Dedham was arrested in lot 22 for disorderly conduct, a false liquor identification card, the use of a false license, possession of marijuana and possession of alcohol by an individual under 21 years of age. Jim Lyons, spokesman for the UMPD explained, "An individual was observed jumping on the hood of a parked car." He was subsequently arrested following the incident.

A string of incidents occurred outside of Brown Dormitory on Saturday night when the police were called because of a noise complaint. Sean Michael-Barret Natinsky was arrested at the scene for malicious destruction of property valued at over $250, disorderly conduct, possession of a class D substance and resisting arrest. He destroyed the window and passenger's side of a police car as well as doing some damage to the radio in the vehicle.

"The officer observed an individual throwing a piece of concrete through the window of a police car," Lyons said. "He actively resisted arrest as well."

Problems continued outside of Brown Dormitory when police were called out several times to deal with continual bonfires in the living area.

Nineteen-year-old James Masi was arrested for disorderly conduct following a second call regarding an incident of a bonfire.

Lyons explained that Masi was instigating the crowd, and shouting profanities while the Amherst Fire Department attempted to put out the blaze.

The final arrest occurred in the Sylvan living area, near Brown, at approximately 4 a.m. Police were called about four more fires that were lit around the dormitory. Police arrested William Manning, 19 of Dedham on the charges of resisting arrest and disorderly conduct. Lyons explained that Manning was so violent when resisting arrest that he managed to rip an officer's pants.

"The arrest resulted from previous contact with the same group," Lyons said. "[Manning] was basically loud and confrontational and resisted arrest."

An individual reported being assaulted in Coolidge Dormitory on Thursday night, explaining to police that someone who lived on another floor of his dormitory came at him with a basketball (the individual threw a basketball in his face). Officers tracked down the individual who was having some personal problems and was escorted to Mental Health Services.

There was the report of a fight in Pierpont Dormitory on early Friday morning when police received a call that 12 people outside of the dormitory were seen pushing and shoving. The parties were separated and everyone declined pressing charges.

A report of an assault in lot 64 left police to investigate an incident on Thursday night at approximately 9 p.m. during which a student walking to his car was punched in the face by an unknown individual who then drove away in a dark vehicle. The incident is under investigation.

Salsa spices up Herbfest

SCOTT ELDRIDGE II/COLLEGIAN

Herbal remedies, foods, and body decorating were all part of the scent filled Herbfest held in the Student Union Ballroom.

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Herbal medicine, homemade foods and beauty products were just some of the products featured in this year's 15th annual Herbfest. The event, which highlighted a variety of different products made directly from herbs, was sponsored by the Plant and Soil Science Department and included projects created by students in the class, "Herbs, Spices and Medicinal Plants."

The event filled the Student Union Ballroom with the fragrant smell of herbs and allowed a steady stream of onlookers the opportunity to visit colorfully decorated tables full of herbal products. Students manning the tables explained the preparation that went into making their products and offered advice to novices interested in learning more about plants.

Freshman pre-journalism major Jessica Yu explained the process of making Chinese teas to interested onlookers while offering samples of her product.

"[Herbal tea] was something that I was interested in and didn't really know anything about," Yu explained while trying to infuse others with her enthusiasm. "At first people aren't sure if they want to try something new, but I try to tell them to smell the herbs first and then decide whether or not they want to try the tea."

Some students who were less inclined to explain their products simply left detailed descriptions of their items in take home pamphlets that detailed how to go about reproducing specific projects. Students who were interested in herbal medicine produced such things as herbal lozenges for Laryngitis, recipes to aid with memory, oils to soothe Asthma sufferers and even recipes featuring Basil and Chamomile oil that claim to be a sure-fire cure for hiccups.

Some of the most popular and most tasty projects of the event-featured herbal based cooking. Some students made their own vegetable dip complete with dill, garlic and parsley that tasted similar to store bought vegetables dips, while others chose more sweet dessert types foods with homemade vanilla mint milk shakes, and gingerbread cookies.

Jonathan Kelly, a senior Biology major and one of the presenters at the event, presented his homemade spicy salsa for his project, with ingredients such as jalapeno peppers, onion and tomatoes. He explained that the salsa is a popular party treat that he enjoys making.

"It is easy to make and it tastes good," Kelly said. "I haven't had any complaints about the salsa yet. Everyone has been nice."

Groundhog screenwriter talks about Nietzsche, Hollywood

Danny Rubin, screenwriter of Groundhog Day, spoke in the Campus Center on Sunday night.

By Karen Madsen
Collegian Staff

Screenwriter Danny Rubin, best known as the author of the screenplay for Groundhog Day, answered questions and discussed screenwriting Sunday night, at 6:00 p.m. in Room 163 of the Campus Center.

Rubin earned a B.A. in Biology from Brown University and an M.A. in Radio and Film from Northwestern University. He has taught screenwriting extensively, and currently is the Board President of Warehouse 21, Santa Fe's Teen Arts Center. His other screen credits include Hear No Evil and S.F.W.

The movie Groundhog Day has received the British Academy Award for Best Screenplay, and has been called by mrshowbiz.go.com, "One of the smartest comedies in decades."

Rubin spent the entire lecture fielding queries from students curious about the creation of the film and the nature of screen writing in Hollywood. Along with many other students, Andy Seaberg, a graduate student studying Food Science, claimed that it was one of his favorite movies.

"I thought it was really interesting. I saw the movie two or three years ago and I thought it was really good," Benjamin Melancon, an undeclared junior, said.

Rubin discussed the process his screenplay underwent between its conception and the release of the final product. His choice of a name for the film was fairly arbitrary.

"If I chose a holiday no one had ever used before, they could play it on TV every year. The studio tried to change the name," said Rubin. "They thought 'hog' sounded somehow adolescent. I've always liked Groundhog Day, even though it's pretty much meaningless to me."

The script itself went through many drafts, he explained.

"The original was smaller, more of an indy kind of a film. The first version had no setup. I preferred that because I thought the set up was boring," Rubin said.

Selling the script took Rubin a number of years, with no studios initially receptive.

"I got a message on my machine from my agent. [It said] 'Danny, two things: that's the best screenplay I've ever read,

Southwest Week off to great start

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

The annual Southwest Week is well underway. After some very strong attendance showings at the week's earlier events, there are no signs of its popularity slowing down.

"Southwest Week has been amazingly awesome," Southwest Area Governor Kerry Mulcahy said.

Southwest Week is takes place each year in the Southwest residential area, which houses over 5,500 students. The Southwest Area Government (SWAG) puts it on in conjunction with the residential halls' house councils.

This year's seven-day long event began Saturday with a barbecue in the Southwest horseshoe, and will culminate this Friday night with a dance and battle of the DJ's in the same place. Other events that Southwest has displayed included a carnival, a movie night and Monday's sold out performance by Frank Santos, the X-Rated Hypnotist who has become a traditional part of the occasion.

The highlight of Southwest week is always the final round of the Battle of the Bands competition in the horseshoe. The winner of this event gets the privilege of opening for Lil' Kim, Uncle Kracker and the Dropkick Murphy's at this weekend's Spring Concert in the Mullins Center.

The Battle of the Bands will feature five UMass acts in a competition that begins today at 4 p.m. A panel of music critics from the Collegian and WMUA radio will judge the winner.

Student bands that wished to be a part of the Battle of the Bands submitted demo tapes and CDs, and five acts were selected by SWAG to contend.

"Everyone who's playing is really excited," Mulcahy explained.

During the concert, Berkshire Dining Commons and Hampshire Dining Commons, the two dining halls in Southwest will be closed and a barbecue will be provided for students on the meal plan.

The Battle of the Bands is one of two concerts SWAG is presenting during Southwest Week. Tomorrow night, up and coming local band DISPATCH will take the stage at 9 p.m.

On Friday night, the battle of the DJs will light up what is being called "Dance Club Southwest." The club is a brand new addition to Southwest Week. It begins at 10 p.m.

Southwest Week took a massive amount of work from many people to prepare for and put on. Students are constantly being recruited to help with every aspect of the festivities. All of the work has been very appreciated by SWAG.

"Everything's been going amazingly well," Mulcahy said. "We have amazing people helping us out."

The following is the list of performance times for today's Battle of the Bands.

Long Lost Other – 4:30 p.m.
Almost Speechless – 5:05 p.m.
Odd One Out – 5:40 p.m.
Two West – 6:15 p.m.
The Missing Lance Project – 6:50 p.m.
Southwest Week is free and open to all UMass students.

UMass participates in Walk For Hunger

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

Project Bread, a nonprofit community organization dedicated to alleviating, preventing, and ending hunger in Massachusetts, held its annual Walk for Hunger on Sunday, in Boston, raising over $3 million for nearly 400 soup kitchens and food pantries, banks and salvage programs in 129 communities.

Representatives from two University of Massachusetts Registered Student Organizations (RSO), the Golden Key Honor Society and Students Helping Area Reach-Out Efforts (SHARE), traveled to the Boston Common early Sunday morning to join over 40,000 walkers in the nation's largest annual one-day fundraiser to alleviate local hunger.

The 20-mile loop around the Charles River took people of a wide range of ages and races through Boston, Newton, Watertown, Cambridge, and back to the Boston Common.

"The Walk was a big success," Kathryn Dixon, a junior English major, said. Dixon is also an intern this semester at Project Bread, and added "The number of participants went beyond our goal (40,000 people), which was pleasantly surprising."

Sophomore Spanish major Allison Cella-Mowatt from SHARE, an outreach group committed to connecting students with community members who have similar service interests, explained how SHARE's participation in the Walk for Hunger was her idea.

"I had done it for the past 14 years, so I wanted to get SHARE involved," she noted, "[We started by asking] the Student Government Association (SGA) for emergency funding for the bus to Boston. They gave us $300.00, and we were able to get a bus from Project Bread."

SHARE opened the invitation to all students by setting up a table in Campus Center. By the end of their efforts, they had attracted 25 students who raised around $13,000.

Cella-Mowatt hopes to host a bigger advertising campaign to draw even more students next year, providing SHARE decides to continue participating in the Walk.

Five UMass members of the Golden Key Honor Society also ventured to the city to participate as they had done the year before, and rose between $400-500.

"[Golden Key is] a service-based organization," Junior Biology major Mohammed Reza explained. "So this was a way to give back to the community, and it was a nice way to spend a day in Boston."

He described how the members originally intending on meeting up with the Golden Key chapter at Northeastern University in Boston but were unable to caught up with them along the Walk.

However, he was pleased that almost everyone the members asked for donations was willing to sponsor them in the Walk and Project Bread.

"Even though it's the end of the semester and no one has any money, people were very generous in contributing a dollar or two," said Reza.

The money was certainly appreciated, for Project Bread's figures show that last year, 74 percent of their funded emergency food agencies reported an increase in requests for food aid.

"Hunger is not just an urban problem," they reported. "It exists in nearly every community throughout the state."

Their statistics also showed nearly half a million Massachusetts people go hungry or do not have consistent access to adequate food, including one out of every five children under the age of 12.

"Many low-income families and individuals on fixed incomes often have to decide between paying their rent, obtaining medical care, or buying food," read the Project Bread Fact Sheet. "Sadly, the food budget is usually the first thing to be cut when times are tough."

The Walk for Hunger's registration lasted from 7:00 a.m. until 9:00 a.m. Cella-Mowatt explained how groups, such as SHARE, engaged in an express registration (in which the group's money was lumped together in one envelope) in order to speed up the process and allow them to get walking as soon as possible.

Both Cella-Mowatt and Reza agreed the day's weather was perfect for the Walk.

"It's usually pretty hot," said Cella-Mowatt recalling her past experiences with the Walk, "but [Sunday] was cool. There was a nice breeze coming off of the Charles River."

Along the participant's path, upbeat music was consistently playing to keep the Walkers on pace, and a lunch stop was served at Mile 10.5, sponsored by companies including Au Bon Pain, Fleet, Raytheon and Stop & Shop.

"The streets were cut off for the Walkers, so you couldn't see the end or the beginning. You really feel like you're helping," Cella-Mowatt commented. "All along the walk, there were cardboard signs with facts about hunger in Massachusetts, so you feel like you're learning something too."

Besides being for "a good cause," Reza had some personal connection in participating, explaining how going through Newton was most memorable for him.

"I grew up in there, so it was nice seeing the old town again," he said, adding that he was extremely familiar with all of the blocked off paths for the Walkers, for they were the same paths he ran when he was in high school track.

He also noted that the crowds were primarily walking on the right hand side of the path, and to maintain their pace of 5 miles per hour, the Golden Key members stayed to the left hand side, only slowing down to eat.

Upon completion of the Walk, participants strode underneath a large balloon arch where they were given servings of Ben and Jerry's ice cream and heavily congratulated for their efforts.

but I don't think I can sell it,'" said Rubin. "That's very Hollywood. They always say it's the best they've ever read. But it still made me feel happy [to hear it]."

When Groundhog Day was sold to the studio, Rubin claimed he had to fit it to a Hollywood "formula" and add the first act; the director, Harold Ramis, did a rewrite.

"When Bill Murray was cast there was a bit of a change," said Rubin. "The original character was in his 20s, but Bill was in his 40s. They had trouble with the new script and Harold [Ramis] hired me again to fix it."

When Ramis asked Rubin whom he envisioned in the lead, Rubin said "a young Jimmy Stewart." Ramis replied, "I don't think he's available." The choice initially worried Rubin, because, he said, "I didn't want a comedian. I wanted an actor. But Harold said, 'Trust me, Bill would be good' and he was right."

Rubin was pleased with the final result, even though it differs in several regards from his original.

"The way it came out – all the good stuff – worked. Harold and Bill are very used to improvisational work. So some of the lines changed," the writer explained.

Rubin remains critical of the more "Hollywood" aspects of the screenwriting industry.

"Hollywood is a con game," he said. "It is a confidence game. They take you into their confidence to manipulate you and get what they want."

While he agreed that writers are poorly treated in Hollywood, he said he didn't really mind being out of the spotlight.

"I did go to the [movie's] premiere in LA, which was really, really awful. I wasn't introduced," said Rubin.

"[However], it was very well received, and it was nice to hear everybody laughing. But it was the first time I'd ever seen it. It was like someone came into my memory and messed around with it. I hugged [actress] Andie Macdowell, who I had spent some time with and who clearly didn't recognize me."

At the premier he was also pushed out of the way by a photographer, taking a picture of Ramis, and finally, left the reception early. Rubin also offered advice for aspiring screenwriters among the student body.

"Getting feed back is always helpful," he said. He encouraged writers to show their work to a lot of people before trying to sell it.

"If you don't like what they're saying, they're probably right. Usually they can't tell you how to fix it – just that it's not working," he said. He also encourages "putting it away for a few weeks," in order to return to the script with a more objective perspective.

When conversing a movie plot Rubin said he asks himself: "Is this movie I would want to see? Under no circumstances can I guess what other people feel or what they want. Hollywood is famous for trying to guess what people want."

But Rubin believes it's important for the audience to be able to accept the premise of a film.

"If it's believable, it works in a movie," he explained. "It doesn't matter if it's true. It doesn't matter that it happened. It has to be believable." He also suggested: "Things that are too plotty don't work that well as drama, because it is an emotional genre."

But he encourages authors not to be too concerned with methods. "So far as following the formulas or rules, I try to ignore them," he said.

However, Rubin pointed out that screenwriters have a much lower salary than other position in the industry.

While working on Groundhog Day he was told, "Don't worry, you'll make your money on the next one."

However, Rubin feels he has been well compensated for the movies success.

"I make a couple of thousand in residuals every year," Rubin explained. "And it does get me a lot of work. 'Oh, I know,' they say, 'let's get the guy who did Groundhog Day.'"

Since its release, Groundhog Day has been called "a philosophical movie." Constantly, but especially around the holidays of the film's namesake, Rubin receives letters from people asking about philosophy behind the movie.

"I was aware of the kind of Buddhist slant. It feels kind of reincarnationish. I wasn't blind to this," Rubin said, "but after having written it, I saw how different people responded to it in different ways. A guy thought that I worked Nietzsche into it. He was wrong, but I find that fascinating. I came up with the same stuff as Nietzsche did. He jokingly added: "That's pretty good."

Rubin said he was comfortable with the feel-good ending of the film, despite some of the film's darker moments.

"The fact that it was an optimistic movie is very interesting," he said. "If you find that you can live a life with no consequences, it means you can really go to the dark side. But my daughter had just been born, and I was in a happy happy mood. I just wasn't interested in writing a pessimistic film."

When asked how much influence being Jewish has had on his writing, Rubin commented: "Who knows how much influence it's had? I wasn't into parody kinds of humor or shtick kinds, which is what almost all Jewish comedians are into. I don't really write jokes. I write dramas that happen to be funny."

Emily Davis, a freshman Plant and Soil Science major made both a fruit dish and several herbal teas for her project. She also felt that the response had been good with a number of people expressing interest in the project.

"I make the teas all the time so it was the easiest thing for me to do," she explained enthusiastically. "Tea is my area of expertise."

Other things that were showcased at the event were more beauty related and often times were similar to products that could be purchased in a store. Some students chose to make herbal lip balms, a fairly easy process that combines such things as oils, beeswax, and flavors such as vanilla and mint. Other enterprising students made products like herbal scented candles, herbal baths and handmade body lotion.

Professor Lyle Craker, the founder of Herbfest, explained that the event had overall been successful with many enthusiastic students attending the fest. He explained that before the event had been opened to the public that around 160 school-aged children had the first opportunity to see the event and even participated in a scavenger hunt in the Ballroom.

"It has been wonderful. We have had a lot of enthusiastic students come though here," Craker said.

The UMass Horticulture Club was also in attendance selling starter plants to anyone interested in creating their own herb garden. The group also had a small list of plants and an identification sheet for each one so that plant aficionados could test their knowledge of the various plants displayed at the event.

Boston:
It's more than an accent

Boston.com, the Boston Globe's Internet incarnation, has a poll to name your favorite Bostonian landmark. It gives only four choices: The Green Monster, the Swan boats, the belfry of the Old North Church, and "tourists trying to park their cars in Harvard yard."

The sad thing is the Harvard Yard thing beat out the Old North Church.

For one thing, nobody can park in Harvard Yard. Your car will be towed. Secondly, the Old North Church is one of the most photographed landmarks in Boston, and was the scene of a historical event that every schoolchild knows.

The Green Monster we can understand. People in Sweatstain, Texas, while watching baseball on the town's one television, will get to see the infamous left field wall of the famous Fenway Park. They know it, and must hate it. The 37-foot high steel wall, green since 1947, is Fenway's (and a Red Sox) signature feature.

The swan boats are also the picture perfect postcard, a throwback from a simpler time, when a quiet spin round the public garden's waterways was a fine way to spend a Sunday. The boats, immortalized in "Make Way for Ducklings" have existed since 1877.

But the Harvard Yard comment? Why?

Boston is the "hub of the universe", and contains so many notable landmarks that it is ridiculous to think that the Commonwealth's unique accent can be rated higher on a scale than the Old North Church, Boston is home to the Boston Massacre, the Boston Tea Party, and to complete the triple threat, the Great Boston Molasses Flood.

Okay, maybe that last one isn't exactly well known. But the point is, Paul Revere's ride is one of the central themes of Boston's revolutionary history. The Old North Church looms large in that tale, and to say that the place where "one if by land, two if by sea" is ingrained on every surface is less important than a speech impediment.

Any other landmark in Boston is ultimately more important than the way we Bay Staters speak. Faneuil Hall, the Custom's House Tower, the Old Granary Burying Ground, "Charlie on the MBTA", people! The golden dome of the State House, in front of the picturesque rolling green of the Boston Common is the nation's oldest public park.

The statue of Paul Revere, just past the Old North Church, is one of the most photographed sites in Boston. It adorns nearly every tourist book's cover. And yet, public ya cah in Harvahd Yahd beats it out.

The big red line that flows through the heart of the city, the Freedom Trail, leads many the tourist hither and yon to discover some of Boston's history.

The Big Dig is synonymous with Boston. The fact that the state's taxpayers throw enough money into a hole near South Station into the largest public works project in the nation is a very well known one. Boston drivers are famous for their driving "skills." There's clam chowder, cod cakes and Boston Cream pie. All of them are inherently Massachusetts and especially "Boston."

The Bay State's jewel on the Charles River, the Hatch Shell, is home to the Boston Pops on July 4 and is known to millions, yet, the curious way we drop our Rs it number three on the list.

Taxing the six-pack

"In a fiscal year when expected economic surpluses have disappeared, legislators now scramble to fund popular programs. Eager to ensure their re-election, assemblymen seek funding measures least offensive to their Beacon Hill peers and the voting majority."

BILL LARKIN

In a republic, moral principle should remain separate from politics; no government, whether local, state or federal, should impose external values on the citizens they represent.

Every individual surrenders personal freedoms in exchange for the securities provided by government. In order to preserve the rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness guaranteed by the Declaration of Independence, Americans sacrifice the liberty to infringe on the securities of their neighbors.

For example, a homeless youth cannot murder a grocery store clerk, no matter how loudly his stomach may rumble. An overextended bartender cannot propagandize the value of his shares to repay his offensive creditors. Nor can an inspired artist untrained in aviation fly a Cessna into the Colorado skies to paint a panorama of the Rocky Mountains.

However, as government grows by infusing morality into politics, the range of personal freedoms enjoyed by citizens shrinks. Enforcing personal principles on dissenting individuals robs them of the very rights they entered into society to protect.

The Massachusetts government should not tax cigarette smokers to relieve struggling community hospitals and reduce the number of uninsured citizens. Neither should they impose a tax on the sale of alcohol to fund abuse prevention and rehabilitation programs.

On Sunday, Senate President Thomas F. Birmingham announced his support for a 50-cent per pack tax increase on the sale of cigarettes, giving Massachusetts the highest tobacco tax in the nation. Should Birmingham rally the two-thirds vote required to override Governor Jane Swift's certain veto of the bill, the Massachusetts tobacco excise tax would rise to $1.26 per pack, 14 cents more than N.Y.

Advocates claim the tax would raise $130 million per year, expanding health insurance to 75,000 citizens. According to a December study released by the Massachusetts Division of Health Care Finance and Policy, 365,000 Massachusetts residents lack health care insurance.

Yet last year, Mass. voters approved a proposal to reduce the state's income taxes from 5.5 to 5 percent. In addition, Congress and President George W. Bush agreed last week to lower federal taxes by $1.25 trillion over the next ten years, including an immediate $100 billion cut intended to excite the floundering economy.

In March, State Senator Marion Walsh, a West Roxbury Democrat, and Join Together, a coalition of social service groups, proposed a 5 percent retail sales tax on liquor purchases, doubling the state's current alcohol tax. The Senate chairwoman of the Joint Committee on taxation pledged that the $57 million in new revenues would fund a state program for the treatment and prevention of substance abuse.

However, Mass. voters rejected last year's Proposition 8, a resolution which would have shifted money from drug enforcement to prevention and treatment programs. Before voters relieved the resolution, a national study ranked Massachusetts second in the nation in spending on abuse programs as a percentage of the total state budget.

In a fiscal year when expected economic surpluses have disappeared, legislators now scramble to fund popular programs. Eager to ensure their re-election, assemblymen seek funding measures least offensive to their Beacon Hill peers and the voting majority.

The House of Representatives voted last week to cut appropriations for Clean Elections by approving an amendment calling for voluntary donations to statewide contests. Although the Clean Elections law was approved by popular resolution in 1998, many legislators believed funding challenger with public funds may threaten their incumbency.

Massachusetts' legislators hope they can rally support for regionally popular health programs by increasing taxes on two products perceived as cumbersome to the health care industry. According to the New York-based National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse, Massachusetts' courts, the Department of Corrections, the Department of Social Services, and other agencies spent 17 percent of the 1998 state budget on drug, alcohol, and tobacco abuse programs.

However, Beacon Hill plans to exceed the bounds of their authority by meddling with the potential of Massachusetts' residents to consume the products of a free enterprise market. If the state wants to provide health care services for all its citizens, then those citizens should be prepared for a tax increase on every resident, not just the smokers and drinkers.

The taxes of the few should not finance the services given to all. As Swift said, when government taxes taboo items like cigarettes and liquor to support the entire community, they exhibit "a big-government, liberal mentality that we'll decide what's good and bad for you and whatever we decide is bad for you, we'll tax heavily."

"We will defend Taiwan"

SIMON PONGRATZ

The events of the past month have left us with some important lessons, the first of which is to never let President George W. Bush speak off-the-cuff again. Even those who seem very eager to praise the first 100 days can't get past Dubya's failure to express himself coherently on any subject.

And what exactly are both Democrats and Republicans so eager to praise about the Bush Administration's handling of things so far? Is it the appointment of an extremely right-wing Attorney General (John Ashcroft) or the scrapping of the Kyoto Protocol?

The administration has successfully swept away any dissent regarding the foolish decision not to honor Kyoto with their favorite argument against everything – they're going to "wait until all the facts are in" concerning global warming. But almost everyone agrees that it's happening and we're the majority of the problem, and when, as in the past few days, wildfires start breaking out randomly in Massachusetts and Connecticut, I think the verdict is clear. This summer should be interesting.

Even the crisis regarding the spy plane incident with China was handled poorly, and relations between our two countries remain strained, not the least owing to a series of Clintonesque blunders following the April 1 collision. The first was President Bush's decision to get a little feisty and proclaim our commitment to defend Taiwan in case of a Chinese attack. This fact has always been implied but never actually stated, which is a good thing. The blooper greatly angered the Chinese and forced the administration to explain itself.

The second incident involved 'the memo' within the Defense Department, which stated that military cooperation with China would be reviewed on a case-by-case basis (another administration favorite), and the appropriate cuts made when the activity was not mutually beneficial. Somehow, apparently through the blunder of an aide, that turned into flash headlines like "U.S. cuts military ties with China," another faux pas that produced noticeably embarrassed officials explaining themselves away.

The China situation is quickly deteriorating, not the least because of President Bush's insistence on moving forward with some sort of National Missile Defense. Despite what other countries try to do to delay or prevent the deployment of such a system, the administration should not give in. If the technology had permitted it, we would have begun deployment of such a thing years ago (Star Wars?), for its necessity is obvious.

United Kingdom Prime Minister Tony Blair last week seemed to support U.S. plans for such a system, only to retract himself in the face of an angry backlash in his own country and throughout Europe. But world opinion seems to be coming closer to ambivalence and even support – perhaps because it's clear that National Missile Defense (NMD) must, and will, be developed and implemented. The International Herald Tribune reported that India, for so long a master of non-alignment among Third World nations, praised the plans for development of the system, saying it was "a strategic and technological inevitability."

Those who are against NMD, such as Jiang, Kim and Putin, are not doing anything to curb the flow of nuclear technology to such countries as Egypt, Iran, Iraq and Syria, and their insistence to continue that practice only helps the administration argue for the necessity of missile defense.

In response to the cooling relations, many see war looming between China and the United States – but they needn't worry... yet. The Pentagon knows that the U.S. military can't, at this time and for a while into the future, fight a land war in Asia, especially against the Chinese. On Friday, the Wall Street Journal reported that the Bush Administration was killing the development of the next-generation self-propelled howitzer, which was scheduled to replace the current, Vietnam-era force. It was killed because of the lack of bases close to our next 'likely adversary' (China, North Korea) and it's inability to be airlifted – which means that any armored forces would be at a disadvantage too. That, combined with the lack of any tried and true doctrine for combat in such conditions as exist in Asia, should preclude any fighting for a while.

Far more important than the military considerations are the economic ones. The Far Eastern Economic Review reports that "From 1995 to last year, U.S. annual investment in China rose 50 percent to $4.5 billion, making it the largest source of foreign investment in the mainland after Hong Kong. Over the same period, bilateral trade doubled to $116 billion."

Also, "China's leaders are desperate to maintain rapid growth –targeted at eight percent this year – in order to stave off social unrest and undertake much-needed reforms." War with Taiwan and the United States would definitely disrupt all of the above figures and certainly produce the feared unrest. It is understood that the dollar, not the flag, controls the relationship between the two countries.

In a related matter, it seems the United States has found itself snubbed – thrown off the Human Rights Commission and replaced by Sudan, of all countries. A scathing editorial in the New York Times condemns the decision, but I think it's justified. We don't really have much authority to run around condemning other countries' human rights records, especially with the performances of police forces and bureaus (Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms [ATF], Federal Bureau of Investigation [FBI]) all over the country, which are becoming increasingly militaristic in both their tactics and arsenals.

Those who are quick to point out the savagery with which the Chinese Government used tanks to crush dissent at Tiananmen Square should see the exact same motives and methods in the FBI's use of tanks at Waco. And with the current quest by the Left for the banning of guns makes me think that in twenty years the only people that will be allowed to own guns will be those same out-of-control police forces. Then the debate will be over, and the Second Amendment will take on a literal meaning.

Some polite feedback

SAM WILKINSON

After writing some of the things I do, people sometimes send me their response. Generally it involves a huge congratulations followed by a bouquet of flowers and a kiss on the cheek.

Errr, wait. That has never happened.

In fact, it's generally quite the opposite and while I didn't get any threats this year (as opposed to last), I still did all right for myself. Or at least, with one article I did all right for myself. The University of Massachusetts Marching Band tends to be ultra-sensitive as I discovered, so when I dared to criticize the apparently infallible marchers, the ground beneath me opened up and I was sucked into the swirling vortex of pain. Except it didn't hurt – it was funny.

"You have no right to put down such a great organization such as the UMMB. I'm sure you will get a TON of responses to this ridiculous article." Steve Pollino.

How right you were Steve, how right you were. Read on.

"Instead of belittling the UMass band for not pushing your "agenda," how about appreciating them for what they truly are... one of the finest marching bands in the United States." Liz Mahoney, who marched for UMass from 1977-1981.

She hasn't marched for twenty years – this woman is 40 years old and still cares about the band. Good lord.

"Your opinions are weak and pathetic and damaging to the morale of this University. Please refrain from spreading your seething negativity to the greater campus community." Jennifer Walton, Former Marcher.

I don't really think enough people read this column for their morale to precipitously drop when they read that the band marched before George W. Bush and I think the morale killer might have instead been his election...

"While I have always been unpleasantly surprised each year with an obnoxious, ill-faceted editorial about the UMMB, this goes far beyond my expectations. This even far surpasses the ridiculous editorial about the UMMB "practicing too much" from a couple of years ago." Amy Witcher, Former Marcher.

Thanks. I appreciate your 'ill-facted' compliment.

"...to channel your anger towards the Marching Band does not prove any point to your readers except that you are a complete idiot." Jeff Lizotte, Former Marcher.

I don't think the band is beyond criticism, nor do I think that criticizing your favorite club on campus makes me an idiot.

"It was disturbing, to say the least, to read your article describing the UMMB as an "embarrassment" to UMASS and to the state of Massachusetts. Had you done any research whatsoever, you would find that the UMMB has always brought honor and dignity to both the University and the State by delivering high-energy and superb quality performances." Jillian Blackadar, Former Marcher.

Dignity? Honor? Do you really believe the marching band is that important, that people might change their opinion of Massachusetts based on their performance of the "When The Saints Come Marching In?"

"To Sam Wilkinson, I graduated from UMASS in 1976 and of course I am a band alumni. I cannot believe the article that you wrote in the school newspaper concerning the UMMB." Nancy Phillips, Obvious Former Marcher.

Ok, that's 24 years ago. Why are these people still defending the band? Why do they still care?

"I am very honor for the UMASS band to be selected for this event, not an EMBARASSMENT as you so kindly put it. People have look up to our band more so than before." Steve C., Still Marching.

Nobody looks up to the band Steve – welcome to the real world, where few people other than your peers will ever idolize you, if they ever even do that.

"To have the tenacity to attempt and humiliate 350 of your fellow peers has dug you into a deep hole. Your expression of disapproval seems to have an underlying hint of jealously." Steve T. Unknown Quantity.

That's right Steve, I secretly wish I played a sousaphone.

"For you to write such a blazingly hateful piece just shows how ignorant and immature you are." Mary Ann Ogsbury, Former Marcher.

Critique is not immature, Mary Ann.

"As you are the Managing Editor of the Collegian and a political science major, I find it surprising that you could print, let alone write an article that is so insulting." Nicole Guttenberg, Former Marcher.

What about being either means I can't be insulting?

So here's what I've learned, pot-shots not withstanding.

First of all, this wasn't everything I got. Not by a long shot, but I gather that what response I did get was tempered by Band Director George Parks, who ordered that nobody currently in the band respond to me, so I only got mail from pissed off Alumni. My thoughts are like this: if, in twenty years, someone writes something negative about the Collegian, I sure as sh't won't be writing that critic any email to explain how far up his ass his head must be.

As for the band: please shut the hell up. If there's one thing I've learned, nobody is ever as important as they think they are. Do people wake up raring to read my column? No. Do people wake up raring to read the Collegian? No. Do people wake up raring to see that University of Massachusetts Marching Band? No. People around here are too cynical to care or appreciate or approve. Nobody looks up to the band – nobody derives his or her school spirit, morale, faith or any other sort of well being from the Marching Band. Assuming otherwise isn't just stupid, it's arrogant. The fact of the matter is that the band marches around and some people like it and some people don't. I still don't care about the band. I simply care that they supported, simply by being in attendance, a president who doesn't agree with the majority of our campus and I find that hypocritical. God forbid any of you understand that.

And finally, take that Sudler trophy out of your ass. You won it once, you can't win it again, and the majority of the people marching now weren't marching when UMass won the damn thing. That you would continually hold that thing in the air and put it on your t-shirts is just plain excessive. Win a contest year after year after year and brag about that; nobody wants to hear about what you did three years ago and cannot possibly do again.

That said, far be it from the band to be the only sensitive group on campus; the SGA continues to amaze.

"I found your article ridiculous and found you as one of the problems why the SGA has a hard time getting things done." Zach Morello

A popular complaint. The SGA would believe that negative coverage leads students to believe that they are a negative organization. If the organization did not behave negatively, the coverage wouldn't be negative. Stick that in your pipe and smoke it. Our job isn't to praise an organization that frequently behaves like a bunch of wild monkeys. Then again, probably the nicest thing anybody said this year was Student Government Association (SGA) Trustee Seth Avakian who said that he was happiest to be done with his job because he wouldn't have to deal with "that motherf*cker Sam Wilkinson" anymore. Feeling's mutual, chief.

There were other critiques, other people who expressed indignant complaint about a few of the things I wrote. And I'd probably agree with those people about a lot of the same issues too. Strange.

Yet in all of this, there were a few people were actually downright nice. The guy at Mystery Train, the gal at the Hangar, Dawn Quirk, whom I never emailed back, the woman who came in out of the clear damn blue and said she wanted to make my day by offering me a compliment (she did!), and the various people who actually told me they liked my columns. So to all seven of you who like the things I write, thanks. I'll catch you next year.

And UMMB, kiss it one more time, just to make sure it shines.

BRYAN MCALLISTER

Okay, so my knowledge of architecture extends to Lincoln Logs and Legos.

Oh yeah – I was the premier Lego architect of my time in like, third grade. I was one of those kids – and you probably were, too – who had like a big cardboard box filled with Legos. They were totally mixed up, disorganized, and sometimes they even had other toys mixed up in there, too. But it didn't matter. If you turned over that box and dumped them all on the floor, I could make a whole Lego city in like 10 minutes, tops. I was just that good.

But now I suck.

I don't know any "architecture terms," or, for that matter, any "math" – which makes figuring out architecture kind of hard.

But they say architecture is the highest form of art. It is all encompassing, it is three-dimensional, and it's science and art combined. Plus, if you create great architecture, usually the building is named after you, like the Eiffel Tower or Pizza Hut.

We all WISH we were architects, in another life – George in "Seinfeld" secretly pretended he was one, and as little kids, we all were constantly building stuff, and then, subsequently, destroying it by stepping on it or bashing it with our right fist.

Which is why everyone has an opinion on the architecture at UMass.

I know – you've read like, a million of these columns... "Woooo!! UMass architecture sucks!! So does the food!! And the classes!" For once, though, I actually have some valid information to provide in this column that many of you probably don't know, and I'm taking an Art History class, called Walter Denny & Pals, and now we're doing architecture. May 4 in discussion, we talked about some UMass architecture and how it got made. And get this. Apparently, Whitmore was designed around the late 60's/early 70's, right around the time when students were rioting more than ever – right around the time some students got shot at Kent State by the National Guard for rioting. At UMass, rioters had just recently taken over the old administration building, making school administrators more worried than ever. So UMass officials had the absolutely stupid, paranoid idea to make Whitmore into a mini-fortress, to try and prevent any future takeovers.

That's why it looks like a prison – it's actually SUPPOSED to look that way. Also, Whitmore's large windows and bunker-like design were intended so that school officials could spy on you – or anyone – when they're approaching. That's just plain creepy. And the ramp in front was designed – and I'm not making this up – so that if students rioted, administrators could roll things down the ramp – like hot oil, or giant elephants. Okay, I made the elephants thing up.

It doesn't end there. Going through Whitmore, you'll notice its labyrinth-like design – it's pretty much impossible to find anything in there except the line to the Bursar. That was done on purpose, so that rioting students would have to walk a long way to get anywhere they wanted to go.

Man, I'm so glad I go to a student-friendly university.

I mean, sure, I can see their point. I don't know what it was like in the 60's and 70's, but I'm sure it was pretty chaotic. My mom and dad attest to that all the time when they tell me that put is good for me and I should smoke it a lot. But still – couldn't the administrators and designers have thought about the future a little? Didn't they realize that students are inherently lazy and would never have the attention span to take over anything for more than four days?

The idiotic thinking here extends to most of the UMass campus. The library, for instance, was never meant to be here. It was instead supposed to be a part of UMass-Boston, where it would have made a lot of sense being housed among the other insanely tall skyscrapers in the city. But UMass, as we know, is nothing if not filthy cheap. When it didn't work in Boston, UMass bought the plans for the library for very little money and randomly constructed this huge... thing... right on our campus. That's why it is so frickin' windy there. It was supposed to be a wind buffer in the city – instead, it COLLECTS wind. Real smart. I love walking past the library in the winter, loving the fact that a big brick could fly off and hit me at any time. Ahh, memories.

Cheapness, in fact, is a common theme here. The Fine Arts Center? Bought cheaply from a guy who originally designed this horrible mass of stone to be in Arizona, where the constant sun would produce cool-looking glint and shadow effects. Unfortunately, this is New England, meaning it could possibly snow tomorrow.

I think it's time, UMass, to change and really update your campus. I know you have no money, and you have a lot of other things to deal with, and you have these great ideas like distance learning. Oh yeah. That should do wonders to improve student-to-administrator alienation.

Letters to the Editor
House of Wives and Adam Prentice

The production of the "House of Wives" by Fatima Gallaire last semester at UMass once again demonstrated that decades after the publication of "Orientalism" by Edward Said, Westerners are still obsessed by the same stereotypes and cliches about Muslim people's lives that have haunted the orientalists in the last two centuries. The only difference, however, is that now they are using the people from the area as their mouthpiece to prove the "authenticity" of their views.

The play was about the lives of women in a polygamous household in Algeria. So once again it was "polygamy" and "harem," the old tones of the orientalists that got to be played in the portrayal of Muslim women's lives. And as usual it was not, as one would have hoped, a play about the role of women in the resistance movement against the French occupation in Algeria, or the lives of many professional women who work in the public sector. Such plays of course would have presented an entirely different picture of Muslim women. Could the reproduction of the "otherness" of the people of the region unwittingly serve other purposes? Ann Norton, writing about the portrayal of Iraqis in the United States maintains, "The release of the feature film Not Without My Daughter during the Gulf crisis reiterated the construction of Muslims as those who confine and oppress women and children, and introduced a fictional occasion for condemnation into the debates surrounding the war with Iraq."

Choosing plays such the "House of Wives" in which the polygamy and the harem are the dominant themes also creates misunderstanding about the Muslim people in general and women's lives in particular. By continuously referring to these themes, Westerners assume that polygamy is a widespread practice among Muslims. The reality, however, is that it is only practiced by a small number of the elites, and even then it is not polygamy but monogamy that is idealized among people from other classes. Another aspect of the portrayal of the harem in the Western world is its emphasis on men's sexual access to more than one woman. Leila Ahmed, Harvard University professor and the former professor at UMass, writes that one aspect of the harem that is usually unknown in the West is that it is a "system whereby the female relatives of a man – wives, sisters, mothers, aunts, daughters – share much of their time and their living space, and further, which enables women to have frequent and easy access to other women in their community." She adds "indeed, thinking about Arabian women, who have been practicing for centuries what feminist communes in America are now just beginning to explore and rediscover, we surely should recognize that Arabian women have been practicing a form of women's communes for several centuries, and have from within that exclusively female space developed strengths and skills and analytical and imaginative resources that it would perhaps take centuries to develop again." She emphasizes that Westerners by continuously referring to the topics of harem, polygamy and veil "assume and imply" the "inferiority" of Muslim women despite the fact that many (Western women) "tolerate much more, isolated in the nuclear family."

The playwright's other work, "The Princess," has been criticized severely by Muslims in the United States. Gallaire has acknowledged that the writing and the production of "Princess" had added to an already charged atmosphere against Muslims in the Western world, and has stated that she would not have produced that work if she knew that it would have created more biases against Muslims all over the world. It is also ironic that Gallaire herself has mentioned that she has never met a man who has practiced polygamy.

Despite this, and despite Arab people's opposition to that play, other works by Gallaire continue to be translated and produced. This is even more unfortunate in a university setting, which should promote understanding among students who come from various backgrounds and different religions. We raised these concerns when we were asked to read the play (when it was already under production). We told the producer and the translators, that we believed the play was another stereotypical representation of Muslim women, which was bound to create misunderstandings about the lives of these women. Failing to convince them of the negative effect of the play, we made some suggestions to mitigate some scenes or language, but with the exception of few minor things, everything remained intact.

Showing the film "Orientalism" in the activities, which surrounded the production of "House of Wives," could not remedy the negative effects of the play since the film is against the orientalist notions that the play propagates. And the film, "Stories of Honor and Shame, Palestinian Women," shown in conjunction with "House of Wives" outside the theater, was done without any debriefing or discussion despite our emphasis on its importance. Such discussion could have prevented generalization about Palestinian women's lives. The film, which portrayed the lives of women from Gaza Strip, is conservative part of the country that has undergone political, economic and demographic crises in the last few decades, was not representative of the lives of the majority of the Palestinian women. The film, in addition, was void of any political background and the reality of these women's lives under the Israeli occupation and presented the same biased views about their lives.

"House of Wives" not only failed to create an understanding about the lives of Muslim women, but created more misunderstanding. Like other orientalist works it accentuated the old stereotypes and created a false picture of the lives of the majority of Muslim people. This of course is an old story. According to Ann Norton, by accentuating the "inferiority" of the Muslim women, women of the West feel superior towards them. "It (the veil) attracts our gaze to Arab domination of women, it distract it from an examination of the domination of women in the West," "The House of Wives," we believe, has achieved this, in the end.

To the editor:

As a journalist who has investigated the death of Adam G. Prentice for the past three years – I am also writing a book about Adam's death and the deaths of other college students for MacGregor Publishing Co. – I wanted to correct a statement made about Adam in the May 3 story, "Student still recovering from fall" by Melissa Hammel. Hammel states that, "Prentice was found dead after falling through the glass roof of Morrill Science Center and losing massive amounts of blood."

First – Adam was not found dead at the greenhouses: he bled to death – he had been impaled by an eight-inch shard of glass – three hours later en route to Bay State Medical Center. Second – there is absolutely no evidence that conclusively proves that Adam was ever in the greenhouse. He was found on the grass outside one of the Morrill greenhouses. UMass police merely speculated that Adam had fallen through the greenhouse roof and smashed out a side window. They cleaned up the scene 90 minutes later without ever having preserved any physical evidence that might have proven beyond any doubt that Adam had been inside the greenhouse. And finally, although Adam may have been drinking before he died, the cause of death had nothing to do with alcohol. He died from massive bleeding, not alcohol. And what difference does it make that his blood-alcohol level was 0.12, higher than the legal limit for driving – he wasn't driving.

Archipeligo lacks a real story

Islands of imagination
But thin plot in Archipelago

By Julie Burrell
Collegian Staff

Cool puppets.

After seeing Archipelago of Delight, that's all I can say about it.

But these ain't your mama's sock puppets. The recent production of this original musical employed the puppetry style of the current Broadway production of The Lion King. That is, the actors-cum-puppeteers wear the figures on their persons, in lieu of manipulating them from outside or above. This allows for large puppets, obviously ideal for a stage setting, and the fluidity that human movement brings with it.

Archipelago chronicles the journey of a girl, who calls herself Kid, to three islands: Greed, Gluttony and Lust. What follows is a fairly typical journey story. Girl sets out on said journey, girl experiences hardships and conflict and a touch of romance, girl returns home. Girl has learned a thing or two along the way.

Then, allegory is thrown into this particular mix. The three sinful islands that she visits are, of course, part of the big Deadly Seven. The visual realization of the islands was exceptional.

The first island Kid visits is Greed. Here she discovers the lure of money and riches, and her resolve to get it leads to stealing. What results is petty arguing between her and the puppet creatures she has met on the island, more stealing, and finally, murder.

The second island is Gluttony. Kid meets up with pig-like creatures that operate a giant food machine, which kills, chops, and cooks. Again, to satiate their ever-growing appetite, Kid and her puppet acquaintances steal, argue, and kill. This time the killing ends with a gruesome and cannibalistic result.

Thirdly, Kids ends up on the Island of Lust. The landscape here is full of lush vegetation and populated with rabbits – I don't think I need to go into the sexual significance here. Kid experiences a sexual awakening, right along with her island/creature/puppet buddies. And then the inevitable pettiness and arguing ensue. This dissolves into chaos, with phallic imagery abounding, and procreation getting out of hand.

All of this action is done with puppets. But, before and after each of these island visits, singer Jenny Conley lends a human face to the show with a relevant song, composed by Christopher Haynes with lyrics by Harley Erdman.

Except for a sultry number concerning lust, the songs are generally unentertaining, and sometimes downright unpleasant. Though, the music itself is interesting, at least, and helps along the ethereal mood of the show. But, the interlude songs are slowed by clumsy lyrics and Conley's awkward stage presence.

It makes one crave the reemergence of the puppets.

When they do reappear, watching how they move around is just as interesting as what they're actually doing when they move around. Some puppeteers have the puppets attached to their heads, some hold their puppets on wires, and some have the creatures attached to the front of their bodies, while sitting on rolling boxes. It's notable that all of the main action is done with puppets, or in the case of Kid, with a mask that appears to be floating. The whole puppet experience is charmingly supernatural. The costumes, sets and lighting are similarly appealing. The elements combine to make the show visually marvelous.

But when all is said and done, all this production has is some cool puppets. The story isn't terribly exciting. There's no innovative reinvention of the familiar allegory. This isn't even an interesting rehash.

We travel with Kid through all of her journey, and what we are left with is exactly what she is left with: greed is bad, gluttony is bad, lust is bad.

What's wrong with a simple story? Nothing. But there's no real story here, no character development, no exciting climax and barely any resolution. From the opening number we're expected to feel for Kid without any explanation or connection. She's off on a journey and we have to emotionally invest in it immediately, no questions asked.

This didactic moralizing is off-putting instead of engaging. Though if this show is, as I suspect, just an imaginative justification to use puppets, Archipelago did a fine job.

End your semester in style

THIS WEEK'S TREND TRIP: DECORATING DOS AND DON'TS

This week's column, in light of the end of a long semester, is an attempt to wrap up for you the fundamentals of this year's trendiest decorating tips. While you are home over the summer, take the opportunity to collect things to pamper your pad with. Take a trip to New York City, if you can, and shop for ideas in the world's biggest trend factory. Then take your ideas and use them to guide you while shopping more frugal setups like thrift stores, garage sales, yard sales and discount markets. These dos and don'ts will help you to achieve the most stylish and most inexpensively crafted household.

DO: Be original
DON'T: Follow this list religiously

The most important thing in decorating your place is to make it "you" and to be as original as possible. Everyone is sick of two chairs and a table here, lamp on the table there...be inventive and daring. Be creative.

DO: Buy what you like
DON'T: Give yourself a headache trying to match prints, patterns and shapes throughout your entire apartment

Matching is out... to an extent. Let me give you an example – pink and purple spreads, pillows, wallpaper, clothes, dishes, couches and paintings is going a little overboard. However, mismatching patterns with similar colors or feelings is in. Mismatching shapes like a boxy couch and square chairs with an oval table and funky shaped vase is in. Bringing the room to life with diverse shapes, colors and patterns is in – and it conveniently allows you to shop more freely. Paint will always fix a to-die-for end table and a little decoupage session will always turn a frumpy but perfect sized lamp up a notch.

by maggie lyons

DO: Shop the bargains instead of Prada Home
DON'T: Pilfer

I hope by now everyone has realized that when we use the phrase "what a steal" it is figurative. However, when you are driving along a residential street and you see a pile of garbage out front with the coolest porch furniture you have seen hung on top – feel free to snag it. That's not stealing. That's shopping through someone's trash. Respectable, believe it or not, in the decorating world.

DO: Paint your walls if your landlord permits it
DON'T: Wallpaper your walls... even if your landlord permits it

In college – wallpaper is a no-no for more than one reason. First of all, it's expensive, hard to put up correctly, and virtually the worst thing ever to take down. Second of all, it is SO for your place of retirement, not for your dip crib in college. Paint, on the other hand, comes in great colors that will instantly transform a room. It is very easy to paint over, it can be inexpensive, and it is easier for a novice to handle. However, don't go that extra mile if you (a) will be evicted or (b) will be moving out in less than a year anyhow.

DO: Choose a look for your place
DON'T: Choose flamingos and palm trees

Amherst, Mass. is nowhere close to Florida or any place where palm trees grow. The lime and the coconut may make you feel better, but they are not grown anywhere around here. Embrace your northeastern environment – if you are going for an outdoorsy look in your home, it is imperative that you stay in the general vicinity of your dwelling, i.e., native plants and mountainous motifs. It's cool to pick a certain look for your place, however, like country, antique, studio, artsy, art deco, bohemian or funky and modern. Again, matching is not a big deal, but a united "feel" is a big plus. If you really need to escape from Mass and are stuck on the tropical look, keep it contained – a plastic flamingo in the garden is original and funky, a beach scene mural hanging on your bedroom wall is cool – but "everything beach" or "everything southwestern" is barf.

DO: Hang things on the walls
DON'T: Go for biblical needlepoints yet

Wall hangings are a must in college apartments. We all know how often our landlords paint our walls – and I believe the consensus is... only after a major earthquake – here in Mass., most likely never. So they obviously beg to be covered up. However, save your grandmother's treasured needlepoints for your guestroom ten years from now. Don't throw them out, of course, just wait for the appropriate time to reveal them. Instead, hang large framed mirrors, cool shopping bags, shelves, stylish posters, numerous pictures and postcards or old book covers.

DO: Reuse and recycle
DON'T: Become a pack rat

Before you throw out everything in your closet from last season, or trash a box of photos or junk an old dresser – think of ways that your old treasures can be transformed into something new and cool. Don't go crazy on this, some things are destined for the garbage truck, and with limited space in your place, storage space is a luxury you want to make good use of. For example, don't throw out your beloved Grateful Dead shirt from their last concert – even though its an XXL and you are an XXS, and even though there are holes emerging that are large enough to fit your head through – you can keep it! Just do a little snip here, stitch there – and transform it into a tiny tank or a pillow for your favorite recliner – or even a shoulder tote.

DO: Buy tapestries
DON'T: Tack them up on the wall and call it a day

Tapestries are a great commodity for college students. But really, the wall tap is getting boring. Try to think of ways to use them in other forms or in other parts of the house. Try covering your ugliest couch or using it as a tablecloth. Hang it from open shelves to create your own closet or sew it up as a table skirt. Use it as a bedspread or make it into ten pillows. Make curtains from it, or... if you have a huge wall that is looking lonely or a room without windows, hang it as curtains on that wall, creating a pseudo window.

DO: Love your place
DON'T: Let anyone tell you theirs is cooler

Take pride in your place. Make it reflect who you are. Have fun with it and take advantage of your unmarried, young lifestyle and take leaps your future family won't let you. Use this time in your life as a prep course in decorating with style and flare.

New Crash Test Dummies album is Mmm, Mmm, Mmm good

Crash Test Dummies
I Don't Care That You Don't Mind
V2 Records

Let's be honest here: The Crash Test Dummies are most widely known for the haunting and bizarre song, "Mmm Mmm Mmm Mmm" off of their second album God Shuffled His Feet. With the song's constant radio airplay and a gigantic tour schedule, the band added onto their cult following from their first CD The Ghosts That Haunt Me and finally entered the mainstream, pop rock scene.

So what happened?

Call it Hootie & The Blowfish Syndrome, but the band has not been able to recapture the amount of success from their 1993 breakthrough, quickly disappearing from the music scene. In the meantime, they have released two diametrically opposed CDs (A Worm's Life and Give Yourself A Hand), and their latest is no exception. Steeped in a somber, melancholy feel, I Don't Care That You Don't Mind shows that the band still has its edgy ambiance, while at the same time presenting new musical horizons.

Without the penetrating vocals of lead singer Brad Robertson, the songs (and especially the lyrics) wouldn't be as catchy as they are. Consider how different the title track would sound if, say, Michael Bolton sang, "I said let's do the nasty/I like it when it's rough," and so on and so forth. You get the idea, though. Those unfamiliar with Robertson's voice should know that he has one of the most recognizable voices in the industry, thanks to his sonorous, bass vocal styling. Spooky

Hip hop theme songs for your favorite politician

Over the years hip hop and politics have gone together about as well as tooth paste and orange juice. From Bob Dole to Joe Lieberman to Tipper Gore, most politicians have absolutely no love for blunts, forties and hos. Since our current president is a "uniter not a divider," what if hip hop and politics came together and political figures used hip hop songs for their own personal theme music? Who would use what? Who will be east coast, and who will represent the west side? Well, here is a partial list.

Bill Clinton – Ludicris. "What's Your Fantasy." No doubt, it will be a hard choice for the ex-president between this song and "Ho" by the same artist. The whole theme of having sex is what will clinch this is as the choice. "I wanna lick lick lick you from head to your toes, I wanna move from the bed down to the down to the floor," truly is a fitting anthem for Clinton, who has had it with all the playa haters. When in a mood for some old school, "Doin it" by L.L. Cool J will be sufficient as well. Still, being from Arkansas and all, Clinton prefers to hold it down dirty south style.

George W. Bush – Eminem. "Drug Ballad." This is an obvious choice for our current President. This song represents Bush's lifestyle during his days at Yale, where he majored in fuzzy math. Plus, much like Eminem, Bush is an angry white boy who can't stand gays and women.

George Bush, Sr. – Outkast. "Bombs Over Baghdad." Not only did Bush, Sr. love to bomb the bejeezus out of Baghdad during his days as President, but he lived his life by the credo "Don't pull your thing out unless you plan to bang."

George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, John F. Kennedy – Anything by Dead Prez.

Monica Lewinsky – Lil Kim. "How Many Licks?" The queen bee of interns and the queen bee of rap together at last. Much like a DC-3 and a Mountain Dew, a perfect combo.

Any Member of The Kennedy Family – Project Pat, "Chickenheadz." The Kennedy's are notorious womanizers, as is Project Pat. I can just imagine a drunken Ted Kennedy saying "SWACK SWACK, your breath like some thunder," to a prospective mate. "Back that Azz Up" is a close second.

Al Gore – Dr. Dre. "Still G.O.R.E" (remix) or "Forgot About Gore" (remix). Even though Al Gore is out of politics currenly and has put on 30 pounds in the process, he is still keepin' it real. And much like Dre, you best not forget about him. These tracks will be Dre remixes where Gore freestyles over the beats of "Still D.R.E" and "Forgot About Dre". In one of tracks Gore busts out the rhyme "This is the Millennium of aftermath, so give me one platinum election, and fk politics you can have it back."

and passionate, his resonant voice helps the lyrics remain in your memory long after they have been sung, even if you can't recall the melody from which the words came.

Robertson knows, though, that it takes more than him to cultivate a good album. In the past, band member Ellen Reid has taken the lead vocals on a handful of songs, but here she is notably absent. Now, most of the work she is doing is on backup, as in the jazzy, nightclub feel of "Never Comin' Back," where she echoes Robertson's lead. This is not, however, a sleight at the album.

The band is obviously going for a morose, downtrodden feel, and they are wise enough to know that Reid would be out of place in conveying such an effort. Robertson's voice is more apt in communicating sarcasm and acrimony, and Reid's contributions keep the songs she sang blithe and playful.

There really are no upbeat, pleasant songs on this album, which I assume was the intent. The most cheerful the songs get are with the title track's bluegrass feel, and the album's first single, "Every Morning." But even these songs are pretty mellow, with lyrics that reflect sadness and bitter sweetness.

In the latter example, the refrain is made up of "And I need to get away/And you need to get away from me/And you see that it's the right thing/And that is why you're right for me."

Nowadays, music listeners need more than lyrics that last, they also require likable melodies. In addition to the appealing manner of the title track and "Every Morning," the trend continues with "On And On." It's among the best on the CD, and among the easiest to like right away. It builds and swells, and the listener may too begin to feel the frustration that Robertson is singing about in the song. Leave them wanting more, is this song's philosophy, and when it ends, that is just the feeling that arises. The next song, "The Day We Never Met" does not meet the same driven quality of the former, but it too is appealing and effectively continues to hold our attention.

It is clear that the album is the most heartfelt effort from The Crash Test Dummies. It's made apparent by the songs seeming reflection of personal experiences, but also because of how they are recorded. Before a few tracks, there is audible interaction between band members, which leads one to believe that the album was made on a smaller budget than others (maybe in one of their basements). The skin-and-bones feel of the recording also shows the band's keen ability to improvise in some cases, and adhere to a professional sound as well.

For the most part, it's only an acoustic guitar accompanying Robertson, with the occasional inclusion of soft drum patter and synthesizers. A CD like this would seem like the perfect addition to the commonly dubbed "college music" genre: whether it is meant for background atmosphere during study sessions, or for romantic tendencies. While most of the album is low-key,

The Crash Test Dummies don't shirk their fans either. No CD of theirs would be complete without a hokey and simple song. One of the most amusing selections of this sort is "Sittin' On A Tree Stump," about country bumpkin life (how appropriate for Amherst).

With their latest album, The Crash Test Dummies put forth a worthy and agreeable album. I Don't Care That You Don't Mind might not be able to evoke the same huge following they once had, but it will make their dedicated fans proud.

UNH orchestra to travel to England

By Karin Dubreuil
The New Hampshire (U. New Hampshire)

(U-WIRE) DURHAM, N.H. – The University of New Hampshire Symphonic Orchestra will be traveling to England to perform this May.

"It just kind of came up, someone said, 'Why don't we do it?' and I replied 'well why not?'" chuckled Robert Eshbach, conductor of the UNH Symphony Orchestra, when asked how the orchestra got the idea to travel to England. The symphony orchestra has been performing for 105 years and has never traveled abroad or performed outside of the United States.

This year Eshbach decided that his orchestra was just too talented to be constrained to New Hampshire, or even to America for that matter. Eshbach said he decided that a trip to England just might do the trick. He said that traveling to England to perform would help to "build the orchestra's reputation and provide a focus point for the orchestra members."

The group, consisting of 50 musicians, the majority being UNH orchestra members along with a few talented members of the community, will be touring England May 21 through May 29. The orchestra is scheduled to host two performances: the first being in Huddessfield in its esteemed concert hall and the second to be in London. The program is part of an exchange with an orchestra in Yorkshire, England, who came to UNH and the surrounding community this past October to perform. Students were hosted by our own symphony orchestra who in exchange will enjoy home visits from their counterparts in England.

Now in a few weeks UNHSO will finish their part of the exchange by bringing a taste of American music to England. They will be performing an American-related music theme with selections from composer George Chadwick (a New Hampshire native and director of the New England Conservatory in Boston), the New World Symphony by Antonin Dvorak (former director of the American Conservatory in New York City), old American songs by Aaron Copeland whose lyrics will be sung by UNH's own professor of voice, and David Ripley who will be accompanying the orchestra on the trip.

The funds for the trip could never have been incurred without the very generous grants from the university. The Elliot Fund, Parent's Fund and Fuller Foundation helped out tremendously, Eshbach said.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the president of the university and all that contributed," he said.

As the conductor of the symphony orchestra, Eshbach is delighted that he'll be able to demonstrate the talent of his musicians overseas. "I'm very proud of the orchestra this year; [It is] very talented. UNH should be proud as well. We have an excellent music department. It's one of the university's best kept secrets."

Crew finishes regular season on sour note with loss to Syracuse on Saturday

By Katie Landers
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's crew team closed out its 2001 spring campaign with a loss against Syracuse on Saturday.

The Minutewomen headed to Syracuse on Friday to prepare for its last race of the year. The Maroon and White were competing against the Orangewomen and Villanova on Ondadonga Lake. Syracuse rowed a strong race beating out UMass who pulled a time of 7:11.8, 13 seconds behind the winners.

"I'm tremendously disappointed," coach Jim Dietz said.

The second varsity 8 boat was able to row the only first place finish for the weekend with a time of 7:20.4, with Syracuse behind at 7:28.2 and Villanova at 8:07.9.

The Minutewomen have packed up their boats for the season except for the smaller boats and returning rowers. The varsity 8 boat has had a rough season scrapping for wins, and this weekend it was made definite that the Minutewomen will not be competing in the NCAA tournament.

"No one is willing to step up and be an elite athlete," Dietz said. "People are happy just to be here."

The 2001 season was a stretch from just a year ago. Last year the Minutewomen had one of their best seasons rowing to first place finishes in several races, a goal that the team was unable to reach this year. The Minutewomen competed in the Verizon Atlantic 10 Championship last weekend beating George Washington, a team that outraced them twice this season. The team was still able to bring back the championship cup thanks to three of 10 races won by the second varsity 8 boat, the quad boat and lightweight 8 boat.

"We almost lost the A-10 Championship to GW. The women have to step up, they're not training," Dietz said.

The novice crew team will continue to race this weekend as they head to Philadelphia for the Dad Vails Regatta. The Minutewomen lightweight boat and novice boats will compete. As the teams continue to practice this week, four varsity towers will be pulled down to race in Philadelphia. Coach Greg Kruczynski said his team has worked this season and will have a shot at medalling this weekend.

"The season is winding down. It's been a learning experience. We've got a good group of women to move up," Kruczynski said.

The heavyweight novice 8 will have one of its toughest races of the season.

"It's anyone's game," the assistant coach said.

The Minutewomen novice team will head down to Philadelphia on Friday for the closing race of the season.

BOB SCHULTZ/COLLEGIAN

The women's crew team wrapped up its regular season by losing to Syracuse on Saturday.

ond baseman Ashley Bakken. In fact all of the defense in the top of the fifth inning can be credited to the junior from Phoenix, Ariz. With a woman on second and no outs she snatched a liner from UConn second baseman Lisa Girolamo and doubled off the runner at second.

The next batter hit a racing grounder in the hole but Bakken dove opposite her glove side, controlled the ball, and from her knees made the throw over to first. The ball game was over.

"She really can time picking off a line drive well," Sortino said. "She is one the greatest second basemen I have ever seen."

According to Sortino, the squad has been working on those kinds of plays all year long. However she still gets a thrill out of seeing her players make such dazzling plays and getting the job done.

"I am their tactful manager but I enjoy watching them this time of the year because they are what they are and I feel pretty good about where they are now," she said.

Now that the regular season is over, the focus shifts to the post-season. The Minutewomen will travel to Dayton, Ohio today for the A-10 Championships. They will face-off with Rhode Island on Friday.

"We were a heads up softball team today," Sortino said. "We did a lot of good things today and it's a great place to be going into the kind of weekend that we have coming up."

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

The Minutewomen had a lot to celebrate after grabbing the school's fourth 40-win regular season. All have come under coach Elaine Sortino.

A-10 tournament looms near with visions of NCAAs on the horizon

GLEN STRAUB

Two weeks ago in Storrs, Conn, the Massachusetts softball team was playing their regional rival, Connecticut, for a place in the UMass softball record books.

Going into the contest, the Minutewomen were riding a 24-game winning streak. With one more victory, they could have broken the school record for consecutive wins at 25.

However, it wasn't UMass' day to shine in the sun and the Minutewomen succumbed to the Huskies, 2-1, in a tight battle. Instantly the incredible winning streak was over.

There wasn't much worse of a feeling than having their w ning streak snapped by their long-time rival. However, UMass knew they had one more shot at collaring the Huskies.

The Maroon and White took full advantage of that second chance in last night's convincing 10-0 victory over UConn to put the cap on an excellent regular season. Not only did they beat them, but they plummeted them, sending them home at least an hour early due to the eight-run mercy rule.

"It's like a coaches fantasy to play that well against UConn," coach Elaine Sortino said.

"We did not expect the score to be like this, but it feels really good," junior pitcher Jen Hadley said.

It could be said that the blowout victory over Connecticut was sweet revenge from the game before. However according to Sortino there wasn't any revenge factor involved in yesterday's game.

"What we really talked about before the game was trying to do all the little things right," she said.

The win not only gave UMass the season series over UConn, 2-1, but it gave the Minutewomen an extra boost of confidence going into the post-season.

"We have a great relationship with Connecticut," Sortino said. "They are an incredible opponent and it was good for us to play them before we go to the conference championships."

"It was great test for us and we succeeded," she added.

With an impressive out-of-conference record at 18-11, the Maroon and White have made a comfortable situation for themselves for the post season.

If they happen to not do so well in the Atlantic 10 tournament, they still will have a very good chance of making the NCAA tournament. The victory over UConn made that comfortable situation even more comfy.

"They are a top team and it really helps our at-large credibility," Sortino said. "It gives us the possibility to trip and not fall."

Returning the favor in such a fashion that the UMass squad did to UConn last night was a great example of how this team has no boundaries. When they want something to be done they will find a way to accomplish the goal.

The next goal to accomplish is to advance in the post season.

"Hard work and a lot of games have put us in a great situation," Hadley said.

Horoscopes

Aries March 21 - April 19
You may feel like a young puppy who has just been let outside for the first time. The air is warm and delicious, and the sun is shining brightly.

Taurus April 20 – May 20
You may feel a strange tension where by it seems that nothing you say or do is quite right. As much as you may try to do the correct thing, it seems that you are not able to make things click the way you'd like.

Gemini May 21 – June 21
Today's opposition between Moon and Saturn will make it hard for you to maintain your self-discipline. Your willpower is low, and your child-like nature wants to come out and play.

Cancer June 22 – July 22
If you are unclear about what is being discussed, feel free to say so. Asking questions is an important part of learning, and you should not be ashamed to do so.

Leo July 23 – August 22
Today's opposition between Moon and Saturn, will most likely make you shy and hesitant when it comes to expressing your emotions. This may be a rare thing for you, and other people may wonder if something is wrong.

Virgo August 23 – September 22
You may be experiencing an incredible fear about not knowing which way to turn. In one direction you may find yourself getting emotional, and you end up weighed down by sentimental feelings.

Libra September 23 – October 23
Your mind may be going off in many different directions, and you are likely to have fantastic ideas about how things should be done.

Scorpio October 24 – November 21
If a philosophical or political conversation erupts, you are likely to offer your two cents without hesitation. Your examples may be extreme, but your principles are sound.

Sagittarius Nov 22 – Dec 21 You should find yourself in a fairly good mood, although you might have a hard time fully expressing yourself completely. Perhaps you feel as if there is someone looming over your shoulder and keeping an eye on your every move.

Capricorn Dec 22 – Jan 19 You are so cool. Everyone loves you. And you're doing a damn fine job on this comics page.

Aquarius Jan 20 – Feb 18 Freedom is likely to be a big theme for you, because Saturn is currently in opposition with the Moon, triggering issues like that. Now you are beginning to question: what it is you are trying to free yourself from?

Pisces Feb 19 – March 20
You are the liquid that takes the form of whatever container it is in. Even though this may seem like the most non-confrontational way of doing things, you may find that it is actually the cause of great frustration for you and for others.

Baseball coach Mike Stone passed Dick Bergquist for No. 1 on the UMass win list with No. 393.

Stone atop record books with win

For most coaches, setting a career wins mark at a school is occasion for a massive celebration. But for Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone, it was simply a few handshakes and back to business as usual.

"A conference win is much more important [than getting the record]," Stone said. "I didn't really know that I was breaking the record. I'm much more concerned about winning games in the conference and getting in to the tournament."

By taking both games of yesterday's doubleheader against St. Joseph's, Stone registered win 393 in 14 seasons, at the helm for the Maroon and White tying and passing the previous school record held by former coach and Stone mentor Dick Bergquist, who coached from 1967-87. Stone's record of 393-255-2 at the school gives him the second highest win percentage among those who coached for the Minutemen. His .606 mark stands behind only William Fitzmaurice, who coached from 1911-1916.

"It's much more special for [Bergquist] to be here," Stone said, who played football at UMass after pursuing a professional baseball career. "He and I are good friends. He gave me my start at Vermont and really supported me when I applied here.

"It's really nice to keep the UMass tradition going – we've always had good teams and classy people," he continued. "Hopefully I can keep that going."

In 1996, Stone led the Maroon and White to its best season in the school's history. He guided his troops to an A-10 Tournament crown and reached the NCAA East Regional Finals – the school's first NCAA tourney win since 1969. That year, he led his squad to a nation-best 18 game win streak, posting 40 wins for the only time in school history.

Stone is the third consecutive coach to set the school's career win mark, following in the footsteps of Bergquist and the legendary Earl Lorden. Those three have combined to hold the position of head coach since Lorden, for whom UMass' home field is named, took the reins as head coach in 1947.

"It's really an honor for me to be mentioned in the same phrase as those two," Stone said. "It's great to have the opportunity to say here so long and win so many games."

Stone has been at the helm of the Minutemen since 1988, when he returned to his alma mater after coaching for five years at the Vermont. In his career, he has posted a 447-345-4 record in his 18 years between the two Universities.

When he took over the team at age 32, he improved on Bergquist's final season, a 22-16 campaign, to bring UMass its best season in 15 years with a 36-16 record.

"I'm still a young guy, you know," Stone quipped. "I have two young kids to take care of."

Despite his long tenure of success at the helm of the Maroon and White, the 46-year-old Stone gave no signs of thinking about stopping anytime soon.

"As long as I can throw batting practice, I'm going to keep coaching."

UMass shoots down Hawks

Offense comes alive in crucial A-10 victories

By Matt Brady

In the logjam that is the race for spots in the Atlantic 10 playoffs, any win that a team can pick up is huge.

The Massachusetts baseball team (22-17, 12-6 A-10) went one better yesterday, dropping sixth-place St. Joseph's in both ends of a doubleheader, 13-8 and 9-5 to move within a half game of first-place Temple. The second win was a record-breaking one, as coach Mike Stone won his 393rd game at UMass, a new school record.

Sophomore catcher Tom Ellerbrook went three-for-four with four RBI in the first half of the twin-bill, including an RBI-single in the bottom of the fifth that put the Maroon and White ahead for good. In the second half of the double dip, senior Nick Gorneault's three-run homer in the bottom of the sixth iced the win for last week's A-10 Rookie of the Week Eric Chown, who improved his record to 4-1 on the season.

"[Chown] shows something different than our starters, so he's had great success as a reliever," coach Mike Stone said. "Eventually he's going to have to be a starter, and down the road this year, if we keep playing, then everybody's going to be a starter."

UMass 13, St. Joseph's 8

UMass got out to an early 1-0 lead in the bottom of the first when Gorneault hit a towering fly ball that cleared the left field fence for his 10th round-tripper of the year.

But the Maroon and White would not enjoy the lead for long. In the top of the second, the Hawks got to starter Anthony Gallo, chasing him from the game after just one and one-third innings. Shortstop Pace Bradshaw and third baseman Tom Gibson led off the inning with back-to-back walks. A Gallo wild pitch allowed the runners to move up a base, and they scampered home as Rich Caloiero singled to deep right-center field.

Caloiero promptly stole second, and after Gallo retired leadoff hitter Eric Wyatt grounded out to short, Justin Godusky launched a dinger to deep left center to put SJU up 4-1 and Gallo was relieved by Paul Washenko. Washenko got through some shakiness to finish off the inning with no further damage.

But the Hawks came hard again in the top of the fourth, when Wyatt hit a leadoff double down the first base line. He moved up on a wild pitch and scored two batters later on a single by second baseman Kevin Kirkby. Kirkby then stole second and was brought home when catcher Mike DeVincentis singled him in. Tim Gunn hit a two-out infield single, and was followed onto the bases when Bradshaw walked. Gibson then laced a single to right field that scored DeVincentis, but Gavin Clark came through with a strong throw to gun down Gunn at the plate.

The last of the fourth saw the Minutemen make a comeback. Cleanup hitter Jeff Altieri and Clark drew consecutive walks, and advanced when senior hurler Ryan Woods balked. Junior Aaron Senez hit a hard grounder to short that was bobbled by Bradshaw to score Altieri and move Clark to third. Designated hitter Tim Klett then brought Clark home with a sac fly to left field, and shortstop Cullan Maumus hit a single to put runners at the corners with one out. Ellerbrook then hit a single through the gap on the right side to bring Senez home and chase Woods from the game.

Reliever Doug Sieger came in for St. Joe's, but had similar trouble as Sean Sarmo singled in Maumus with a base hit to right. Junior Mike Kulak delivered the second sacrifice fly of the inning by way of a deep fly to center that sent Ellerbrook home, and Gorneault followed with a one-out single. But Altieri hit a soft liner to third to end the rally with the Maroon and White trailing 7-6.

It would not have to wait long to get even in the game, as Clark led off the bottom of the fifth with his 12th dinger of the season. Maumus came up with two away in the frame and roped a double to the gap in right-center. He would come home when Ellerbrook smacked his second hit of the game on a hard liner that could not be handled by Gibson at third to give the Minutemen an 8-7 edge.

"It was huge to come back like that," head coach Mike Stone said. "We never give up offensively, but we need good pitching and solid hitting to compete. We really don't have too many guys who can go out there and give us good innings."

Washenko retired the side in the top of the sixth and UMass added to its lead in the bottom half of the frame. Kulak and Gorneault led off the inning with back-to-back singles, and Altieri dropped down a bunt that was thrown away by the Hawks' John Kokol to score Kulak and move the captain to third. The Minutemen went on to total five runs in the inning to ice the win for Washenko, who went five and one-third innings in relief to garner his first collegiate win.

UMass 9, St. Joseph's 5

Game Two brought similar fortunes for the Maroon and White, though they did not have to play catch up for long in the second game.

The Hawks got on the board in the first as Godusky walked with one away. A Kirkby single advanced him to third, and DeVincenti followed with another single to bring Godusky all the way around.

After UMass went down in order in the bottom of the first, St. Joe's brought another successful inning. Gibson was hit with a Chown offering and advanced when Jason Tarewicz drew a walk. Gibson then came home when Wyatt singled to give the Hawks a 2-0 lead.

The Maroon and White tied things up in the last of the second as Altieri led things off with a double, and Clark joined him on the bases via walk. The two runners advanced on a Senez sacrifice bunt, and moved up once more when starter Mike Minerva threw wild. Clark then scored when Adam Stojanowski hit a fly deep enough to bring him home.

The Maroon and White put up a single run in the third, as Ellerbrook led off the inning with a chop single thru the middle. Minerva's pick off attempt was wild, and Ellerbrook scampered around to third and scored on Kulak's sacrifice to right field.

"Tom [Ellerbrook] has done a great job all year," Stone said. "He's been an iron man behind the plate, come through with some crucial hits and dropped down some good sac bunts from time to time."

Both teams were quiet until the bottom of the fourth, when the Minutemen got things rolling with two outs. Stojanowski ripped a stand-up double to the right-center gap, and Maumus followed that up by singling through the middle to bring him home. Ellerbrook came up next, and hit a lazy pop fly that was lost in the sun by DeVincentis. As Maumus scored, the throw to second was wild, moving Ellerbrook around to third. But Stone waved him homeward, and he was gunned down by Gibson to end the inning.

Chown continued cruising through the sixth, when he retired the bottom third of the Hawks order in order. The bottom of the sixth was the icing on the cake for the Maroon and White, as they tacked on another four runs. Maumus reached on an infield single with one out, and Ellerbrook poked a single over the second baseman and into right field. Kulak made it three hits in a row by singling through the right side to score Maumus. After a fielder's choice, Gorneault hit his second longball of the day and 11th of the season by launching one over the scoreboard in left.

Chown ran into some trouble in the top of the last inning, when he allowed a one-out homer to Goduski in left. Next up was Kirkby, who Chown drilled in the face with a fastball. He was visibly shaken, and served up another gopher, this one to DeVincentis. Craig Szado was called on to retire the final two batters on ground balls.

The Minutemen will finish their series with the Hawks today at noon at Lorden Field. Brandon White will get the call for the Maroon and White after having a strong outing against Hartford last week.

"White had a good outing last Thursday, so hopefully he'll give us a few solid innings, and we'll of course have the weekend guys in relief," Stone said. "I think going into tomorrow, we're definitely in good shape."

One of the hardest mountains to climb in collegiate softball is reaching the 40-win plateau.

Well for the fourth time in the program's history the Massachusetts softball team put on the hiking boots and reached the top of that mountain.

Last night at the UMass Softball Complex – in their regular season finale – No. 23 Minutewomen demolished their bitter inter-state rival, Connecticut (32-21 14-6 Big East), 10-0 in five innings. The victory over the Huskies improved UMass' record to 40-11.

The Maroon and White put the game out of reach in the first inning when it scored six runs on six hits and two Husky errors. The rally of hitting started when junior outfielder Teri Rooney – UMass' number two hitter – doubled off the right-centerfield wall. Then junior third baseman Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler drove her home with a double of her own.

Senior left fielder Debbie Tomoguchi and sophomore right fielder Anna Petey each made major contributions in that first inning pour on by producing RBI-singles.

"We hit the ball well today," coach Elaine Sortino said. "We got some big hits, some small hits, we bunted well and we ran the bases well."

The UMass hitting attack was highlighted by the play of sophomore first baseman Brandi Cross. Last year's Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year hit a towering shot over the wall in left-centerfield to lead off the bottom of the second inning, making the score 7-0. It was her second home run of the season.

The Diamond Bar, Calif. native also hit a double off the wall in centerfield and finished the day 2-3 with three RBI and one run scored.

"This is a team where everyday different players rise up to the occasion," Sortino said. "There hasn't been a day that all of them stepped up on the same day."

Cross had been having rough stretch. Last year she was consistently ranked in the top-three in team batting average for UMass. This season she has moved down to number seven with a .273 BA.

"Brandi hit the ball very well today," Sortino said. "It was very timely."

For Massachusetts, the dominating performances did not only occur on the offensive side of the field.

Junior co-captain Jen Hadley pitched her second no-hitter of the season en route to her victory 16 on the year. She struck out one and walked one. However both she and her coach attest yesterday's no-no to the defense that backs her up.

"It wasn't one of my best games but our defense did a great job of getting outs," Hadley said.

"The no-hitter was excellent, but our defense saved two hits," Sortino said.

One of those people in the field who turned hits into outs was sec-

Saunders wins speakership

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Goodbyes and thank-yous begun last night's final Student Government Association Senate meeting as members expressed their thoughts to the Senate.

The meeting also held elections for Speaker and Associate Speaker of the Senate, two positions, which define the future of the Senates order.

Chancellor Scott and State Representative Ellen Story were also present at last night's meeting. Story spoke about Senators getting involved with their state representatives and making them aware of what the University of Massachusetts is about. She encouraged members to write letters expressing concerns whether they are personal or those revolving around the University.

"Do some lobbying and try to meet your state representatives, let them know about UMass and your thoughts about state funding and issues of concern to you," Story said.

Scott was presented a gift on behalf of Student Trustee Seth Avakian, and spoke briefly expressing the encouragement of students to get involved with the administration.

"I think it's a good idea to get administrators to attend Senate meetings so that they will have the opportunity to understand what is being presented to them," Scott said. "I know that they would like to interact with the Senate, because you are an important voice on this University."

Last night's Speaker elections were headed by the nominations of Senator Michel Whitehouse, Senator Jennifer Teixeira and Senator Aaron Saunders for the position. Nominations for Associate Speaker were Senator Chris Carlozzi, Associate Speaker Andy Boncoddo and Senator Bill Powers.

Some issues take up by all the candidates were getting new student involvement within the Senate for the fall semester. Candidates expressed many thoughts as well as ideas on the topic as to how to draw new students into the SGA.

"I think that we really need to work on recruitment for next year," Teixeira said. "For every seat that is vacant here tonight, there are 250 students not being represened."

Teixeira furthered explained that by drawing more students into the SGA and making more students aware, voter turnout would then increase.

"We need to have information available for students and tables set up in the Campus Center to inform commuter students of the SGA," Teixeira said. "We need to keep senators here. A strong senator is the key to having a strong Senate."

Saunders and Whitehouse agreed expressing similar concerns and ideas. Whitehouse expressed the needs for more social events as well as task forces to get student involvement on campus and with what is going on around them.

Saunders expressed his ideas to get the SGA more involved with the administration as well as work more closely with the SGA's Executive Cabinet.

"There will never be a lack of good ideas, and the job of Speaker is to make this a reality," Saunders said. "We need to work with the SGA president, we need to get to the administration."

Candidates for Associate Speaker continued to speak on similar topics. All candidates expressed the need for more student involvement as one of their top priorities if elected. An effort to make people more informed within the Senate and what is going on was also an issue presented.

"I want to make it easy for senators to get the information that they need and have information prior to Senate meetings," Carlozzie said. "I think that we should have information sessions prior to next years first meeting and show new senators how to be affective and let them know what is going on."

Boncoddo expressed similar thoughts by explaining that he would like to go to various dorms on touched in order to increase diversity within the Senate.

"People don't talk to one another, but we all have common interests we just need to communicate," Boncoddo said. "We need to go to the Political Science TAP floors, go to the international dorms and just talk to students and let them know how they can get involved."

Powers agreed and added that he would like to increase communication within the Senate and its members by making senators aware of motions and ideas prior to each meeting.

The Senate elected both Speaker Aaron Saunders and Associate Speaker Bill Powers with 25 out of the 45 votes as their new leaders.

Saunders and Powers both expressed their excitement over their victories and both had the opportunity to take on their new jobs for two motions. One motion called for paving the yellow lots and the second motion called for consistency with door alarms within the resident halls.

"I can't wait to get working on issues for next year," Saunders said. "Next year is going to be huge for us and we have to prove that were worth the power the students have given us."

UMass student establishes MADD

By Jamie Betesh
Collegian Correspondent

At sixteen years old, Erica Hidalgo experienced the horror of losing a close friend in a drunk driving accident. "She was my little brother's girlfriend... and only fifteen years old," Hidalgo said. "She got into a car with a drunk driver, and got killed. My family and I haven't been the same since."

Erica's grief motivated her to launch a Mothers Against Drunk Driving chapter here at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, which is the second chapter established on a college campus. She is currently the president.

After deciding she wanted to get involved in working with MADD last semester, she got in touch with Lorie Virsard from the Pioneer Valley MADD branch and conducted a Greek-wide workshop on drunk driving. Over four hundred members of the Greek system attended to hear the stories and experiences of Pioneer Valley MADD associates.

"I think hearing the stories of actual survivors certainly effected the people who attended," Hidalgo said. She was then urged by Pioneer Valley to begin a university- based chapter.

"We want to make drunk driving a cause for concern for UMASS students," said Erica at an interview with Springfield's channel 40 news on May 2, 2001. UMASS' MADD chapter reached its goal of becoming a registered student organization in March. When asked how far their chapter has come, the executive board said, "At this point we have already begun outlining a draft plan for next semester. We've attended Pioneer Valley board meetings to follow how it is run, and we have kept in contact with Corrie Barnett, the founder of the Boston University MADD chapter, which is the first to exist on a college campus." The executive board of this chapter was elected last week at their first meeting in the campus center. It consists of President- Erica Hidalgo, Vice President- Allison Small, Treasurer- Eric Diamond, and Secretary- Alli Berry.

Working to create a safer transport system, implementing programs in elementary and high schools in the community and working with the Amherst and UMASS police departments are some of the activities included in their outline of committees. They will also participate in the "Tie One on for Safety" program, a nationwide project which distributes red ribbons to tie on cars to remind people of the drunk driving accidents when they get in their cars.

One of their goals is to increase the service hours and range of the PVTA and the escort service. They would also like to put a designated driver system into action.

"It's more than students themselves knowing not to drink and drive, it's knowing not to get into a car with someone who has been drinking," Secretary Allison Small said. "And if someone gives up one or two nights to be the sober driver for their friends, it can help avoid danger."

They plan on educating youths in the community about the repercussions of drunk driving. "Our goal is to promote responsibility among our peers... And if we can save one person from being involved in a drunk driving accident, then all of our time and effort will be worth it," said Hidalgo.

Lil' concert, big names

A look at this year's Spring Concert lineup

Lil' Kim

University of Massachusetts students look forward to three things once spring has appeared in the Pioneer Valley. All students look forward to their living area festivals, whether it is Bowl Day, Fill the Hill, Southwest Weekend, or the Northeast/Sylvan barbeque. Students come out in droves to experience, arguably, the best events that bring the population of the campus together. Students also know that once May hits, they are in the homestretch, streaking toward the finish line like thoroughbreds during a long race.

Finally, a sure sign that spring is here is the UMass Spring Concert. Held usually the third Sunday before finals, giving the students one more semester memory before they blow off the dust from their books and sharpen the pencils for finals.

After being MIA, three years ago the Spring Concert exploded back on the UMass campus with an energetic concert featuring the legendary KRS-1, Boston's own Mighty Mighty Bosstones, and the rhyming style of Cypress Hill. In 2000 the concert brought one of the largest grossing rap duos to campus in the form of Redman and Method Man, who were preceded by the reggae/punk influenced Long Beach Dub All-Stars and reggae legend Beenie-Man. The spring concert is built with the conception of being a diverse event for a diverse campus and these last two shows showed the difference between old-school hip-hop, the sound of pop ska, fast tempo reggae, and the hard driving sounds of today's rap music.

This year's show promises to be just as or even more diverse than previous shows, appealing to rock, ska/punk, and more rap. Just remember that this spring concert is for the students. Take advantage of it, not only is it free (the best word in the college language) but also it gives the University a sense of unity.

Nicholas Pizzolato

Entertainment galore for concert goers

The doors to the Mullins Center will open up at 5 p.m. on Saturday, May 12th for this year's musical potluck. As everyone has probably heard by now, Lil Kim is featured in the spring concert. She is planned to dominate the crowd at 9:45 p.m., and she is bringing along with her Junior Mafia and Lil Cease.

The winner of the Southwest Battle of the Bands will open up the concert at 5:30 p.m. The show will continue with Dropkick Murphys, followed at 8:15 p.m. by "Uncle Kracker." The night will be concluded local DJ's, Hush and BonBons, at 11 p.m. If they sound familiar it may be because they spin Friday nights at Atlantis with "House on the Rocks" and own the Growroom.

The man in charge of emceeing for the estimated crowd of twenty thousand people on Saturday night will be DJ Big Phil. Last April, he also worked the Funk and Fashion Show for UMass.

Amanda Paolella, Production Manger for University Productions and Concerts (UPC), expressed her enthusiasm for the event.

"I'm really excited for it. Uncle Kracker is hitting it really big right now. Before people were just coming for Lil Kim, but now it's becoming pretty equal. It's fifty/fifty," she said. "Lil Kim is more of a stage show."

Uncle Kracker has opened for his buddy, Kid Rock, in the past. In Rolling Stone, Kid Rock had this to say about Matt "Uncle Kracker" Shafer: "He's a solid individual. He doesn't [mess] around on his wife or indulge in stuff on the road. He just sits back and laughs at me."

Dropkick Murphys, the Irish punk band from the Boston, MA will take over the stage at 6:45 p.m. The band, which first formed in 1996, will play its first of only two remaining shows for the month of May. On their web site, Dropkickmurpys.com, they recalled, "We started playing in the basement of a friends barbershop and our goal was to blend the musical influences we had grown up with (Punk Rock, Irish Folk, Rock and Hardcore) into one loud, raucous, chaotic and often out of tune mix we could call our own."

The concert is brought to us by the UPC and Student Government Association (SGA), with the help of Metropolitan Entertainment. UPC will be giving out key-chains, stickers and a limited amount of t-shirts. It is, of course, free for all UMass students. Tickets are available to the public for a twenty dollar fee.

Unlike in year's past, students cannot just go onto the floor at free will. Attendees will need a specific floor pass to gain a wrist band for entrance to the floor.

The Collegian's "Notorious T.I.X." promotion is one way of seizing floor passes. It will be giving away five pairs of floor passes to a handful of lucky Collegian readers. If you open up the paper and find a blank Ticketmaster envelope inside, with a winning letter, bring it down to the Collegian newsroom in the basement of the Campus Center between 2:30 p.m. and 3:45 p.m. to receive your free floor passes.

There are a couple of upcoming promotions from the UPC being setup. Tonight and Friday night, they will be giving out floor passes as part of their bar promotions at Delano's, McMurphy's, Atlantis and Club Kai.

Also on Friday, right outside the Student Union, they will be giving out Coolatas (sponsored by Dunkin Donuts) and floor passes. There are only 2,000 floor passes in total, but the first four hundred at the doors will receive passes. So, if you don't plan on getting there when the doors open, either head out to the bars or the student union, or go through as many Collegian's as you can!

Lil Kim

How many licks does it take to you get the center of a... uh uh? This pressing question as well as others will be answered at the 2001 Spring Concert, as the queen bee of hip hop: Lil Kim will be in the house live and in person, spitting her unique brand of sexual and defiant rhymes, as she headlines this years concert.

While plenty of rappers subscribe to the theory of "style over substance," Lil Kim epitomizes it to the fullest. Not that she doesn't have talent...she does, but for the most part, the image that springs to one's mind when thinking of Lil Kim is her explicit sexuality first, and her actual music second.

In accordance with this image, the most noteworthy part of Lil Kim's live show over the years has been what she is wearing (or not wearing) during her performance. Whether it's being rolled out on a bed and performing in a bikini, as she did in the 1997 "Puff Daddy and in The Family Tour," or having her breasts covered only by pasties like she did at the 1999 MTV Music Video Awards, Lil Kim always dresses to impress. Well, impress all the fellas in the house that is. No doubt, some in the audience on Saturday might think they took a wrong turn and ended up in South Hadley's "Anthony's" establishment when they feast their eyes on whatever scantily clad number Lil Kim performs in.

COURTESY UNIVERSAL RECORDS

Uncle Kracker

Oh yea, and then there's the actual music, which Lil Kim has been at since making her debut in 1995 on a Junior Mafia record. Kim teamed with Puff Daddy and Bad Boy Records (forgive me, P-Diddy) in 1996 on her platinum selling solo debut album Hardcore, which she was showered with critical praise for. Not only did she cross the previous established line of what female rappers could talk about; she might as well have blown the entire thing up. Her overtly sexual and brash lyrics explored territory that had previously been off limits to female rappers. Whether it was rapping about the pleasure of having oral sex performed on her, or rapping over a beat of female orgasmic moans, nothing was too extreme for The Queen

Bee.

Kim became key part of mainstream hip hop due to her allegiance with Puff Daddy and Bad Boy Records, and a ultra-hip color coordinated Hype Williams directed video for her hit song "Crush On You." The track featured a posthumous sample of Kim's labelmate the Notorious B.I.G. who Kim was also romantically linked with despite Biggie's marriage to R&B recording artist Faith Evans. Additionally, she scored a second major hit on her debut album teaming with Angie Martinez, Left Eye of TLC, and Missy Elliot on the song "Not Tonight," which featured a retro "Ladies Night" sample.

Although it didn't gain the critical acclaim of her first album, the follow-up to Hardcore, last years Notorious K.I.M. continued the trend Kim began on her first album of mainstreaming sexual smut. She achieved radio hits with the aforementioned "How Many Licks" featuring Thong Song crooner Sysco, and "No Matter What They Say." No doubt these tracks will be featured during Saturday's set.

FOURTEEN HELLCAT RECORDS

The Dropkick Murphys will bring their blend of bagpipes and punk to the Spring Concert.

As she heads to Amherst this weekend, Kim has been in the news lately and not entirely because of her music. Currently, she is featured in the song "Lady Marmalade," along with Pink, Mya, Christina Aguilera and Missy Elliot on the soundtrack to the forthcoming film "Moulan Rouge." The track has gained heavy radio airplay nationwide, while the sultry video for the song is on the TRL top ten daily. Also, Kim's entourage was recently involved in a shooting outside of a New York City Radio station with a group affiliated with the rap group Capone -N- Noreaga. The incident is still under investigation by authorities. Knowing Lil Kim, if she feels she needs alittle extra protection this weekend due to the Incident and decides to wear a bullet-proof vest, it will be a see through one.

Spring Concert 2001 is an opportunity to see live and in person one perhaps the most influential female rapper in the game over the past five years. Likely, Lil Kim's set on Saturday will be a display to the Mullins Center crowd of what has made her such a popular figure in the rap game over the past five years: her tight rhymes, gaudy wardrobes and most of all her in your face sexuality.

Kurt Polesky

Uncle Kracker

Music seems to be dominated by versatility. Artists try as hard as they can to avoid being transcended into one particular genre because, simply put, the phrase "one genre" has become Interchangeable with "one-dimensional."

Therefore, we see artists trying new things more now than they ever have in the past. No longer is the music world dominated by one superband or one flavor of rap. Instead we see acts that really don't know how to describe themselves, or what demographic they are targeting. We see Eminem, a self proclaimed rapper popping up on rock stations. We see Limp Bizkit, a self-depicted metal act showing up on hip-hop stations. The list of adaptable artists is endless: Marilyn Manson, Shaggy, Korn, Incubus, OutKast, Moby; all of these acts plus more, are simply too difficult to categorize.

This begins to explain the musical origin of the workhorse Matt Shafer, aka Uncle Kracker. For a man who has spent the better half of the last decade as a supporting act behind the mixed-genre giant, Kid Rock, Uncle Kracker has developed an enormous fan following. Oddly enough, the following began after he split away from Kid Rock.

Uncle Kracker was the DJ in Kid Rock's Twisted Brown Trucker band. The Detroit native endured most of the success that Kid Rock experienced from his two most popular albums, The History of Rock, and 1998's seven-time platinum, Devil Without a Cause. As Kid Rock's popularity grew, Uncle Kracker's did not. Uncle Kracker was still a behind the scenes man, and that was the role he nobly accepted.

Finally, in 2000, Uncle Kracker released his first solo album, Double Wide. He did it subtly though, not wanting to break off from Kid Rock now-a-days

paying for his crime

Few probably remember when Nathaniel Brazill, a 13 year old in Florida, shot his teacher point-blank, between the eyes.

It was just another story in the news, another school shooting, and in the American grand scheme of things, not sensational enough to warrant that much attention.

Brazill, now 14, is currently on trial for first degree murder and faces life in prison, and his story is suddenly a major news headline. Yesterday, he told a jury that he after he was sent home from school for throwing water balloons, he returned with a gun, trying to speak with his classmates. When Cruzeow refused, Brazill cocked the gun and pointed it straight in his teacher's face. But he also testified that he never meant to pull the trigger, and he wept on the witness stand while telling his story.

This is a tough case, just a couple of weeks ago, after all, we were all reminded of Columbine. It was that massacre's two year anniversary — although it's ridiculous to use the word "anniversary." Fortunately, for once in their pallid history, CBS did Americans a service and gave us one of the best exhibitions of TV journalism ever when they presented a mammoth, impeccably researched feature story on Columbine on their "60 Minutes II" program. It was thought-provoking, efficient, and interesting. It also raised some very good questions: Could the school have done a better job in stopping it from happening? Could the police have done a better job? In both cases, the answer is probably yes.

But, as much as those angles are important, we still aren't facing the main angle: Why this is happening. Blame the media, blame parents, blame guns – something must be the answer behind a 13 year old going up to his teacher and shooting him between the eyes.

The Nathaniel Brazill case has raised this question again. Brazill says he is sorry for what he did. In fact, he LIKED the teacher he killed. He said he didn't mean to kill Barnow. But on the other hand, he reportedly told friends, before the killing, that "he would be all over the news," and he has – he's spoken to numerous major magazines and newspapers wanting to interview him.

Something is psychologically wrong here. There is something deeply psychologically wrong with a kid getting mad that he was told to go home for throwing water balloons, then coming back with a gun. And is Brazill lying? Did he really mean to shoot the teacher?

The fact is, though, that it doesn't matter. Even having a gun in your hands, coming to school, is basically already a murder, just waiting to happen. Brazill pointed a loaded gun directly in the eyes of a teacher. It doesn't matter if he meant to pull the trigger or not.

A life in jail is an incredibly harsh penalty for a 14 year old who may never have meant to kill, but we'll never really know, will we? In any case, a lesson needs to be sent to the rest of America. 13 and 14 year olds need to put the idea of bringing a gun to school out of their minds. And the media had the right idea in the beginning – don't make this another dramatic story so kids can watch and do what they've probably been doing for a couple of years now – watching these shooting stories, guiltily liking the drama and sensation of it, completely desensitized to the reality of sitting on a witness stand, weeping when you tell the story about how you shot your teacher.

Last goodbye…really

SETH KONIG

Last year, toward the end of March, I claimed boisterously that I was leaving the Collegian to take another job and that I'd probably never ever in a million years have a column in the paper.

While I did, in fact, take that job, I continued to write biweekly columns for the Collegian, making me an evil, horrible liar according to my column the spring before. I didn't anticipate being an evil, horrible liar when I said what I said, but it turned out I missed writing ny pointless, but quasi humorous stories. And so I came back.

Now, over a year after claiming that I was leaving the Collegian for good, I'm leaving the Collegian for good. Last time, I was a junior that had a great job opportunity. This time, I'm graduating and leaving this great place we call UMass. For those of you who have been here for three, four or five years and have been reading me since 1997, I appreciate your time, and this is my shout-out to all of you. The folks whose names I don't know, but who have stopped me on campus to say, "I liked your column" have absolutely made my day.

Those of you who stopped me to say, "Hey, your column wasn't the best this time," thanks for reading anyway, and thanks for the constructive criticism.

So often nowadays are Collegian farewells on the Ed/Op page reduced to glorified high school yearbook entries, filled with line after line of the columnist's unknown friends and obscure references to inside jokes no reader could hope to understand (TF, JT and BD, BYOB ASAP and PDQ to the BBQ, OK?).

I pledge to you now that I won't do that. I've named many of my closest friends by name in this column time and time again in the past four years, and I don't need to do it again.

I do want to give you readers a glimpse of the people that I've come across in my time here at the school, though – still, I promise you that I don't live with or spend any significant time with any of these people. Some of these people might not even know me.

These are people I think more people should get to know.

Justin Wong – I met Justin as a freshman, and now, with Those Crazy Kids Productions, Justin organizes more turntable spectacles than there are syllables in the song "Informer." The Peking Garden is bound to be bumping every other Friday or so thanks to Justin's dedication to the Pioneer Valley DJ scene. I regret that most of the time when Justin throws a show, I'm too exhausted from work to go, but I love the guy to death and am pretty sure whatever part of the pop culture scene I don't take over, he will.

I can now retire, as I have managed to find a way to incorporate a Snow single into one of my columns.

Seth Avakian – For those of you out there that don't pay attention to student politics, Seth spent the last two years as the Student Trustee here, and, despite what has previously been printed on this page about him, I've always thought he was a decent guy. Now, my exposure to the dude was limited at best, but any time our paths crossed, he was extremely cordial and respectful, willing to answer any question I might have had about the Student Government Association. Seth was always quite approachable, despite the fact that often times I was speaking to him as the Editor-in-Chief of a paper that didn't have anything nice to say about him.

Art Keene – Anybody that has gone through this University and hasn't met Prof. Art Keene hasn't gotten the full experience of UMass. Prof. Keene is not only one of the more prominent names in the school's anthropology department, but he's basically the school's guidance counselor. He's possibly the most overworked professor on campus – heading school trips to low income corners of the United States to help the poor in addition to teaching, researching and coaching the Amherst High School cross country team – but he always has an open door and is willing to listen to students' problems. I'm not even in the Anthro department, but Prof. Keene is the first faculty member on this campus I'd turn to if I were in need.

Kole Ayi – A linebacker for the UMass football team for the past four years, Kole was always quite reliable. While eating with the team at an Outback Steakhouse somewhere near Chattanooga, Tenn., a day or two before they faced top-ranked and undefeated Georgia Southern for the 1998 Division I-AA National Championship, I said to Kole: "Hey, hit somebody for me tomorrow, will ya?"

After he hit so many people in that game fans started mistaking him for a dealer at a blackjack table. Kole was one of the main reasons the Minutemen overcame a 2-9 season the year before and upset Georgia Southern, 55-43, for the title. Another big reason was running back Marcel Shipp – another class act everybody should get to know.

The staff at Applebee's in Hadley – Some people that know me better might debate that the staff at Applebee's constitutes a group I live with and spend significant time with, but I disagree. While it's true that there have been stretches of time in the past four years in which I've attended this restaurant five days a week, in the past two months I've only been there twice. I believe my recent Applebee's drought means that I can mention them in my column. If you get bad service at Applebee's, you're a dick. They're the coolest group of kids, provided you're not a schmuck, so tip well and prepare for down-to-earth conversation and good service. If you're a group of 50 coming in 10 minutes before they close, the kind people at Applebee's will probably hate you – as would anybody trying to close a restaurant. I recommend you all go visit the people there at least an hour before close, and tell them Seth sent you. Oh yeah, and I'm getting pretty fond of Wings, too, where Brendan, who used to work at Applebee's, now tends the bar.

Lars Ulrich – I love Metallica. I could pump "Master of Puppets" with my stereo cranked and sleep in peaceful bliss because Metallica courses through my veins like blood. Napster users? Get over it. Music isn't free, and hasn't been since the days of scop and gleaman tale-telling in medieval Europe. You just got used to an illegal luxury (the courts agree) and now you're spoiled and don't want to let it go.

You probably also think it's unfair when you get pulled over for driving 75 miles-per-hour in a 30-zone. The law shouldn't apply to you, right?

Phil Barnes – He'd be the first person to defer credit for last spring's Atlantic 10 Women's Lacrosse Championship, and there's plenty of credit to go around, but the coach of one of the most sharply-run teams on the campus has had a lot to do with the Minutewomen's historic turnaround. Phil is humble, frank and a pleasure to work with, as was his predecessor Francesca McClellan.

I think that about does it for me. Have a good life.

Getting by with a little help

SHARON STIMPFLE

"I hadn't noticed what a beautiful night it was – lit by starlight. The world smelled clean and clear. For a minute I didn't feel like a kid anymore. But for the first time in a long time…I felt young" –The Wonder Years

In the stir of springtime, as the uninhibited winds dance upon magenta Zinnias and purple Hyacinths, tickle Orange Blossoms and forget Me Nots, and whisper sweet hymns to the Gardenias and white Lilies - the world smells clean and clear.

Last night, engaged in an intimate chat with two of my friends on the Southwest pyramid, a full moon hung from the night sky like a crystal chandelier illuminating a decadent 1920s ballroom. Gathered stars interrupted the darkness above with pockets of light. I didn't feel like a kid anymore, but for the first time in a long time, I felt young.

The starlight could have very well served as our spotlight on this night, for it was quite a dramatic performance. We talked for hours. We talked about nothing and everything all at once. We remembered. We laughed. We laughed until we uncovered the deep belly chuckles of our younger days. We cried. We prophesized. We took turns telling each other where we saw each other in five years.

It was great. It was silly. It was just what I needed.

This is a confusing time of year. It is the winding down of another school year. As we hand in our last papers and sharpen our #2s one last time before finals, it is only natural that we feel a bit lost. Sure, we are all excited to sell back our books for that whooping $2.75 and surrender to the laziness of summer days. As lazy as summers can be. I mean, of course there is always the backbreaking waitressing jobs and 9-5 cubicle positions that demand our time, as we do their money. All in all, however, summers are reserved for gulping down excessive amounts of seawater after your friend dunks you in a surprise attack, and for practicing your latest dance moves on your leather-interior car seat as you drive to your third Fourth of July barbecue, alternating hands on the scorching wheel. Am I right?

So then why do we feel so emotional this time of year?

Sitting on the rocky steps with my friends the other night, we came to realize how powerless we are against time. Our college years are halfway over. Two years captured now only within the pages of our scrapbooks and perimeters of our picture frames. Lest we not forget the storage of our memories. Two more, waiting for the crisp dawn of September until they too will begin their rapid unfolding.

And so it is that now we are swamped down with exams and at a point in time where we are feeling pressure to tie together loose ends, both socially and academically. However, is there really a need to be so stressed? Our time here at UMass is precious. Perhaps we cannot feel like kids in the midst of this workload and chaotic transition from one home to another, but who says we can't feel young? Even if it is in the sense of venting out our fears and frustrations in the most childish of manners – on the stony steps of Southwest.

For the graduating seniors, ok, so you won't have the foundation of the Southwest pyramid to rest upon next year and recapture your youth in a pastime distinct to UMass. But look at it this way: Instead, you will be gathering around the coffee table of your New York studio or walking alongside the Seine River in Paris or backpacking through Europe as you catch up on your college days.

It is not so much the places where we have been, but the ones who have journeyed beside us that have made all the difference. Recount your favorite memory, make a scene change, and you will see exactly what I mean.

And in another five years, seniors, you may be exchanging the same, crazy stories at your first house-warming party or wedding reception. But, nonetheless, the important thing is that you are with those who have helped shape them.

I know this is a busy time. The deadline crunch always is. But I guess what I am trying to say here in my end-of-the-semester brain drain writing style is this: don't lose sight of your friends during this time. And I am addressing this to all of you underclassmen, not just the seniors.

Go out this weekend, UMass, and make sure it's with the ones you love most. P.S. – Don't forget the camera!

Ditch any plans you may have had of staying in and catching up on reading or prepping for your final paper. I'm not saying don't get your work done. Not at all. But I am begging you to do it on your own time. This last weekend should be reserved for your friends. After all, do you think you could have gotten this far without at least a little help from your friends?

Think again.

"I saw friends and family struggling to lead decent, productive lives and I felt an everyday kind of heroism in this. Still do." – Bruce Springsteen

I have a problem taking this whole college thing seriously. It's hard for me not to deprecate what it is that I do here at this institution; it's also hard for me not to deprecate what any of you who also attend UMass do here. I just don't think that what we do is hard. I don't think that it's work. It's a joyride, and I think that many of my peers take it for granted. I think we give ourselves way too much credit for going to college.

I come from a very mixed background. My mom was one of eight from a poor Irish-Catholic family in the bad parts of Natick. One of the eight went to Four Cs (Cape Cod Community College); the rest of them made it out of high school and left it at that. All the women married working-class Irish guys with big muscles and names like Sullivan and Mahoney and McDonough, all except for my mom, who'd met a sweetheart in middle school named Bob Schulze. (Yeah, my parents met in middle school. Probably why I never take a relationship lightly.) Even after he went prematurely bald at an insanely young age, she still decided that she liked him around, enough to marry him when he got out of college.

My dad came from a wealthy old Protestant Yankee family long ingrained in Quincy, Massachusetts. Not liking the direction that the city was taking after the T moved in, they relocated to the town of Marshfield on the South Shore of Massachusetts. His father had gone to Harvard and had a taste for buying new cars every two years, his favorite being Aston-Martin roadsters, while his mother was an RN at Quincy General. Avilda, my grandmother, was an extraordinary woman in her time: one of the few females to attend college in the Depression and a truly educated and caring nurse, she was an independent and willful anachronism in her time.

Dad didn't quite have Harvard in him (we was more interested in basketball and fights than class in high school) and finally ended up at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst in the middle 70s. He later would tell me that he learned two things in college (how to drink and listen to loud music) and graduated with a degree in Food Science. He and my mom got married and settled in to make their way in life together.

Dad and mom made their way through a couple of jobs, finally getting enough security to buy a house in Plymouth, Massachusetts, in which to five and raise their two young children, me and my little sister. In 1986, Dad's company, Dragone Cheese, got bought by Garelick Farms. He was laid off along with almost all the staff at his plant, but they gave him an option: transfer to the Garelick plant and work the night shift. The other option was unemployment. He had a wife and two small children.

Dad's still working that same night shift at that same plant. It's been fifteen years. My mom's gone through a variety of jobs – at a drycleaners, as a dental secretary – before finding her current job working the phones for Dr. Farber, a very nice dermatologist with possibly the neatest-trimmed beard I've ever laid eyes on. Dad works either six or seven days a week, leaving before nine at night and not getting in until after eight in the morning. Mom works five days a week, mostly eight to six, but pulling a couple of five a.m. shifts each week depending on everyone else's schedule in the office.

This is my background. My mother's side of the family is working-class to the bone. My uncles do things like carpentry, truck driving and garage doors. Last month my uncle Dennis got his arm caught in a chainsaw, a couple weeks before his fourth child was born. Day in the life, really. My aunts (amazingly talented and resourceful, all of them) do whatever their talents are – dental assistants, substitute teaching, waitressing. My father's side is old-crust Yankee. My only aunt and uncle on that side are a middle-school principle and former physics teacher; they own horses, which their children ride.

My own family? We're towards the middle. My parents both work their asses off tirelessly at manual jobs, but we've got our own house and I'm in college. We don't ride horses; we drink beer out of a can and watch the Patriots. My sister and I were more or less raised Catholic, but neither of us really does it anymore. The predominant form of music in my home is country, with some of my mom's Irish folk music. It's a hodgepodge of meeting cultures and classes. The fact, however, is that we're basically a lower-middle-class family; there isn't really any Harvard left. I feel right at home with the carpenters and the Bud Lite; being around the horses intimidates me.

Which leaves me in an awkward position. I've always been a little different from most of my family; I'm more of my father's side than anyone else in the family, I think, for both the good and bad. When all the cousins of my age were experimenting with drugs and booze and girls, I was reading books. I was at the top of my class in high school, National Honor Society, all that other bullsh.t. My cousins all skipped class and played football. I went to college; many of them went to work.

College was obviously right for me. I like manual labor to an extent, but I'm far better at working with my mind. I'm simply better at writing papers than hammering nails. The problem, however, is that its just too easy.

When compared with what the rest of my family and many of my friends are doing with their lives, this college crap is cake. We sleep in classes that most of our parents pay for. We worry about what our internship is going to be for the summer so we can get that sweet grad school scholarship. We worry about hunger in Africa and matching funds for Ralph Nader. We have no responsibility; we drink and f.ck and run around like fools because its OK for us to do so. Our actions have no repercussions. It's like living in perpetual day care; a facility where to care for our every need. All we have to do to earn this wonderful bounty is fill in little circles on a white sheet four times a year and occasionally fill ten pages with words.

Compare that to someone who wasn't quite so privileged as we are. People, people our age now, not our parents, but us, people we went to high school with, who have real life to deal with. Who have to get up and go to work. Who have to support their children. Who have to worry about hunger in their own house and matching funds to pay the damned rent. People whose every action has repercussions on themselves and their futures. I am friends with these people, I am related to these people, these people are, to a very real extent, my people. But I can't look them in the eye.

What am I to these people? My uncles do nothing but congratulate me, tell me that I'm making the family proud, that I'm making something of myself. My parents always took it for granted that I'd go to school. But what am I? What are we?

We're children, of course. We will run the world, but we are children. I just can't take our concerns that seriously. We don't deal with real life. It makes me laugh when RAs try to unionize and these GEO whiners cry about their ARD contracts and whatever – do they realize how ridiculous they are? Are they blind to reality, to their own privilege? Can't they see the maintainers in their own buildings?

As finals hit, and the whining and complaining and tearing of hair begins, take a moment to realize just how foolish we all are. Literally foolish. From time to time we need to open our eyes, look around, and deflate our enormous egos and sense of self-pity and persecution. I'm no less guilty, but I have certain safety valves, like my friend Huggies from back in my Boy Scout days, who lives in his girlfriend's parents' house, works 50 hours at Wal-Mart, and looks after his little boy. Talking to him brings me back down quick.

College is a joke, a vacation, an extended infantile state. Quit your bitching and get over it. We are the people with no problems. Superior in privilege and in wealth, full of our own potential and perceived greatness, we are nothing to people who actually have to make their own way in life.

My father gave his life away to put me here. I don't plan on forgetting it.

HOT MOVIES FOR HOT DAYS
ARTS AND LIVING

At dawn they slept

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Director Michael Bay (Armageddon, The Rock) teams up with Ben Affleck (Armageddon, Good Will Hunting) again in Pearl Harbor, the latest Hollywood take World War Two. The film is about the surprise Japanese attack on the United States Navy base on Oahu on December 7, 1941. The film, set to be released on Memorial Day, was filmed all over the world, from the United Kingdom to Mexico, and utilizes several decommissioned naval vessels to recreate the packed harbor and naval battle scenes.

While his 140 million dollar budget was pared down to 130 million dollars, Bay spared no expense, combining miniatures, computer generated effects, and actual ships and planes to portray the devastating Sunday morning attack known as "the day that will live in infamy." Some veterans' groups protested the use of the USS Lexington, a decommissioned aircraft carrier, to portray the Japanese carrier Akagi, although the flat top has portrayed other Japanese warships in other films.

The story follows two characters, Rafe McCawley and Danny Walker, played by Affleck and Josh Hartnett (Virgin Suicides, Town and Country) respectively, and their love lives against the backdrop of falling bombs, capsizing ships, and screaming Zeros.

The trailers for this film, while slightly anachronous (the formation of Japanese torpedo planes flying by a children's baseball game at eight in the morning) are so dramatic and that one can easily see this picture rising to the blockbuster ranks of Independence Day and Armageddon, other Memorial Day openers.

Stars Cuba Gooding, Jr. and Alec Baldwin lend their talents to the film, and a team of codebreakers in real life is condensed into one character played by Dan Akroyd. The film must hold special meaning to James King, (Blow, Slackers), as her cousin was killed in the attack 60 years ago.

It seems like most of the stars took a pay cut to perform in this film, because so much of the budget went to the special effects. The largest gimble ever built was used in the capsizing scene off the USS Oklahoma, which took 8 weeks to rebuild. WWII era battleship USS Missouri, upon whose deck the treaty that ended the war with Japan was signed, portrays the USS West Virginia. Six ships were ignited to simulate the destruction of the attack, using 700 sticks of dynamite and 4,000 gallons of gasoline. For all the effects, and all the budgetary arguments, the filming was completed in 106 days- just one day over schedule.

Hopefully, the gamble (and the gimble) will pay off with Memorial Day success.

Jurassic Park 3? Why bother?

On July 18, 2001, Steven Spielberg presents…no wait. Jeff Goldblum stars in…no wait. Michael Crichton's newest novel becomes…no wait. What the hell is going on?

Well, apparently Jurassic Park III is all set for release. Unfortunately, since almost no one involved with the first two films had anything to do with what will probably be the final chapter in the most successful full-length series about dinosaurs cloned from tree amber that run rampant in a theme park, ever created, it will probably look about as cohesive as the body structure of Frankenstein's monster. But do we really care?

It's Jurassic Park! Sort of. The dinosaurs will still be there. The weird mystique of creation derived from adolescent fantasies will still be exploited, and of course souvenir cups will be sold by the millions. But, sadly, there will just be way too much absent from the third Jurassic Park film to make it remotely similar to the masterpiece released in 1993.

First of all, when Steven Spielberg expressed no interest to direct JP3 it should have died right there. Spielberg WAS Jurassic Park. Financially, the first two Jurassic Park films are Spielberg's most prestigious achievement, and without him, the essence of everything that made Jurassic Park so brilliantly directed is completely gone. Let alone that new director Joe Johnston is a terrible choice for a replacement. His previous works are Jumanji, October Sky, The Pagemaster, The Rocketeer and Honey, I Shrunk the Kids. That is a very scary pattern of films to use as judgment on which direction Johnston will be taking JP3. All of those films are fantasy children's movies. Though some of them were not bad, they are kid's films. Tame ones at that.

Jurassic Park is not a children's movie. Though it was targeted to a younger generation, there was carnage. Nothing beats being fourteen years old, and watching the "blood sucking lawyer" get yanked off of the port-o-potty by the T-rex, and devoured from head to toe. You may have been disgusted, but it was so cool!

Judging from his previous films, what Johnston will probably bring to Jurassic Park is a much calmer, less violent version of the vicious world of dinosaurs. Sure there will be extravagant chase scenes, and nail biting close calls, like in all of his previous films, but we won't be seeing dinosaurs administering slaughter upon the human beings who deserve to be killed for messing with sweet, sweet mother nature. It's just not going to happen. Replacing Steven Spielberg with Joe Johnston in Jurassic Park is like replacing cheesecake with cheese and crackers. Sure it's still a snack, but that cheesecake set such a terrific standard of taste that the cheese and crackers will simply not live up to.

Spielberg will not be the only major player from the first Jurassic Park film left out of the third installment. Michael Crichton, the writer of the novels, the creator of Jurassic Park, the inventor of the idea will no longer be involved. This is a shame. There was something substantial about the first story that truly sold its worth as a quality film as opposed to a special effects gem with little plot. Though the second film, The Lost World had much less devised story structure and was pretty much a dumbified version of the first, Crichton still tried hard to throw his personal touch to it. Not only will his personal touch be left out of JP3, but the brilliance that started the hype will be gone as well. Unlike the first two films, JP3 did not even begin as a novel. It's straight to the big screen!

Like him or not, Jeff Goldblum, the only cast member to play a major role in both of the first films, will not be involved in JP3 either. Instead, we see the return of Sam Neil

Animated excellence

SHREK
Directed by Andrew Adamson and Vicky Jenson
with Mike Myers, Cameron Diaz Eddie Murphy
Advanced Screening: Boston, MA

Shrek will not make waves because of its animatronics. Visually, the movie offers nothing that we haven't seen from Disney or even from Dream Works before. It will not be renown for intricate plot structure nor its compelling characters. However, what Shrek may be remembered for, years from now, is burying the Disney prototype which has dominated, and in some ways, encumbered animated film since basically the beginning of time.

Shrek is everything that typical Disney animation is not. It's funny, clever, witty and, at times, outrageous. It takes typical assumptions about animated film and either crushes them or completely ignores them altogether. In a sense, Shrek the movie is an embodiment of the ungainly, rude green ogre that is its main character.

That ogre (Mike Myers) has had his home, an isolated swamp in the middle of nowhere, invaded: first by a talking donkey (Eddie Murphy), then by other exiled fairly tale characters of note. He's not happy, so he and the donkey take off to appeal to the ruler of the land, Lord Farquaad (John Lithgow). Fortunately for Shrek, the undersized Farquaad has needs of his own.

First, the Lord is very un-lordly: he's a midget. Second, his kingdom is comprised of these fairy tale characters, so it's not really a kingdom at all. Lastly, he's not really a king because he has no queen to marry. And that's where Shrek comes in. Farquaad sends Shrek off to rescue a princess (Cameron Diaz) who is being held captive by a dragon in some far away castle.

It all sounds very "story-book-ish" and it is. Shrek makes abundant use of fairy tale characters and plotlines for comedic purposes. Even the princess is disappointed by her rescuer, because he does not fit the typical mold of the heroic knight. And indeed, Shrek does not fit the mold that the audience would expect. The Gingerbread Man is held legless and captive by Farquaad in one scene and the wannabe king taunts, "Run, run as fast as you can, now." Farquaad's "size" inadequacies make ample material for sexual innuendo from Shrek and his donkey companion.

That's the kind of adult appeal that Shrek has. I can definitely see it becoming a crossover hit. It's animated so the kids will likely come. And the humor definitely skews adult in some cases, like Toy Story. For good measure, Shrek even tosses in an absolutely hilarious parody of The Matrix. In the scene, the princess kicks the butt of potential forest attackers in Keanu Reeves style.

Summer of sequels – run and hide

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

Every year for the past four or five, you could have started a "summer preview" article the same way. An early May release has kick-started the summer box office season with a huge opening weekend. In 1996, it was Twister ($41.1 million opening), in 1998, Deep Impact ($41.2M), 1999 brought The Mummy ($43.4 M), and last year saw Gladiator open to $34.8M.

A new millennium rolls around and the story is no different. Last weekend, The Mummy Returns officially launched Hollywood's largest box office season. Bringing in $68.1 million, the Mummy sequel broke The Phantom Menace's record for the largest non-holiday opening weekend ever. So, what do we have to look forward to this summer? Well, that's what I've set out to discover. Here's my take on Summer 2001's biggest (and not so big) movies.

A Knight's Tale: Opening tomorrow, the medieval flick is reportedly based on Chaucer's story in the Canterbury Tales. Not exactly box office gold. I get an Ever After vibe from the trailer. Still, I think the film will benefit from Mummy spillover and do fairly well. Should help further star Heath Ledger's career (10 Things I Hate About You, The Patriot).

Angel Eyes: Jennifer Lopez is a tour de force?! She had the number one album and the number one movie in America earlier this year. She managed to open an enjoyable, but fairly mediocre film, The Cell, last summer. Now, she returns in another crime/thriller type film. I like James Caviezel, but don't expect much. People will show up.

Shrek: One of my picks as the breakout movies of the summer (see review on cover). The movie not only goes beyond the standard Disney prototype, it rips it apart, stomps on it and makes it look pathetic. The animated fare is funny, smart, witty and even daring. Eddie Murphy really is a tour de force. It goes places Disney simply wouldn't dare. Dream Works has a hit here.

Pearl Harbor: Hands down, this will be the biggest movie of the summer. The trailer is admittedly, spectacular, and the movie's plush Memorial Day weekend opening almost guarantees box office success. I have heard nothing but anticipation for this. In fact, the only factor which might hurt it is TV's inability to capture the spectacle of the movie. And a spectacle it will be; the Michael Bay and Jerry Bruckheimer team guarantee that. Give me scenic vistas, fast cuts, heavy-handed melodrama, and historical inaccuracies. I think it's Armageddon part two. I think I'll hate it. No way I won't be there opening day.

Moulin Rouge: Big names. Big ad campaign. Big bomb? If I had to pick one, I'd look no further than this June 1 release. Set at the turn of the century (the 19th century), the movie is akin to a musical. Worse yet, the music is all modern day pop. The trailer, which basically is Nicole Kidman is underwear, appeals to the same crowd as Eyes Wide Shut. That's not many. Interesting fact: Directed by the guy who wrote "The Sunscreen Song" (remember that?). He also directed Leo's Romeo and Juliet.

What's the Worst that Could Happen?: Martin Lawerence could become a star after such fine cinematic achievements as Blue Streak and Big Momma's House. This opens up almost a year to date after the latter.

Evolution: When I first saw the trailer, I was thinking X-Files 2. X-Files 2. X-Files 2. Then Julianne Moore appears, farce develops and it becomes really, really dumb. I was digging the alien dincosaurs and David Duchovny, but the movie seems to have this ridiculous farce aspect to it. Also stars "that 7-Up guy" aka Orlando Jones. Could be big. Could bomb. Interesting fact: Directed by Ivan Reitman (Ghostbusters), the movie was moved up to June 17 to coincide with the 17th anniversary of the 80's classic.

Swordfish: To start with: dumb name. I'm reluctant to say that I want to see anything with John Travolta after Battlefield Earth, but the TV ads for this are at least interesting. In the spy/hacking/computer genre from the team that helped with The Matrix special effects. By the way, did anyone see Antitrust? Didn't think so.

Atlantis: The Lost Empire: Can Disney survive outside its typical musical, romance genre? We'll see with this underwater action/adventure which has reportedly been in the works since 1994. Think Jules Verne (20,000 Leagues Under the Sea) here. The teaser trailer was thoroughly unimpressive. Screenwriter Tab Murphy (Tarzan, Hunchback of Notre Dame) also penned this film. Michael J. Fox, who also did Stuart Little, provides the main character's voice. Interesting fact: This will be the first Disney movie produced in 70mm since 1985's Black Cauldron (whatever that means).

Tomb Raider: The best-selling video game of all time (inevitably) hits the big screen. They couldn't have gotten a better Lara Croft than Angelina Jolie (though I didn't mind the Denise Richards rumors). Who really cares about the plot? Have you seen the theater posters? The Fast and the Furious: If a trailer could be onomatopoetic, then this is it. The teaser gives no hint of any plot, just that the movie is, well, "fast and furious." It does have Vin Diesel and people will likely have forgotten (if they already haven't) Driven by mid-June. Call me crazy, but I think this is big. Interesting fact (and sad): It took five guys to write this. Of the five, their best film: Rollerball. Their worst: Hollow Man.

A.I.: This was supposed to be one of renowned director Stanley Kubrick's last films. Luckily, long-time friend Steven Spielberg agreed to take on the project (writing and directing) after Kubrick's unexpected death two years ago. Haley Joel Osment and Jude Law are part of a strong cast. Due to the nature of the film (which deals with the creation of an artificial child), an abundance of Internet buzz has erupted around the movie. There are reportedly at least 20 sites already devoted to it, so expect big things. The trailer is very effective in a Sixth Sense way. And remember, the last time Spielberg directed a movie with a two-letter

Dr. Doolittle 2: A sequel to a remake. Those clever Hollywood execs. Expect about as much from this as Murphy's The Nutty Professor 2. The only thing I've seen is a clip with TV's The Crocodile Hunter; it was funny.

Fast and the Furious: If a trailer could be onomatopoetic, then this is it. The teaser gives no hint of any plot, just that the movie is, well, "fast and furious." It does have Vin Diesel and people will likely have forgotten (if they already haven't) Driven by mid-June. Call me crazy, but I think this is big. "Dawson's Creek" ignored no longer

Well this is it, the last "Tubenotes" of the semester. I thought that this would be a good time to answer the one question I get asked most since starting this column.

Why don't you review "Dawson's Creek?"

This is the question I have feared the most. But in honor of the seniors leaving who won't be able to read "Tubenotes" ever again, I thought I would review the show to the best of my ability. Don't get me wrong – I recognize that "Dawson's Creek" is extremely popular. The teen soap opera for the past five years has captivated audiences of both sexes and is popular among the ages of 16 and an old 27. It's become a teen institution and an incredible success.

However, "Dawson's Creek" represents the reason why some television shows should never be made. The entire point of the show is to put three or four pretty faces in an hour-long drama. Then they surround the show with music from popular artists and commercials for products ranging from zit cream to KIA's. Then at the end of the show they tell the viewer where they can buy the music from that night's show, and they always end by showing the compilation cd for that show (which is nothing more than top twenty hits put on a cd). And of course let's not forget the rampant product placement: Rolling Rock bottles pointing outward as the character takes a swig and then looks out at the bay and say things like, "Now that's a sunset." Talk about obvious. The entire hour is a commercial for one product or another, and that's just the first problem I have with it.

Now I don't mind that they have 25-year-olds trying to pass for high-school students. Pacey's five o'clock shadow during lunch doesn't bother me at all. What bothers me is that they don't give the characters anything to build off of. The basic outline for any episode is this: (Show Begins) Pacey pouts, Dawson smiles, Joey looks confused/angry, and Jack remains stone-faced. (Quarter hour mark) Pacey looks upset, Dawson is sad, Joey is confused, Jack disappears. (Half hour mark) Pacey is angry. Dawson is angry. Joey is sad/confused. (Three quarter mark) Pacey is angry but he understands, Joey is confused but happy that she doesn't understand, and Dawson stands in that damn boat. (Fifty-minute mark) Pacey (or Dawson) kisses Joey, Joey is confused, Dawson (whether he kisses Joey or not) sighs and goes to bed staring at Close Encounters of the Third Kind, and Jack comes back to call his sister in the nut house.

Look, I just wrote an episode of "Dawson's Creek." Hand me my check and get my e-mail address out on the air, so I can get e-mail from teenage girls telling me how I changed their life, how I should be nominated for an Emmy, and guys can tell me how they scored with their girlfriend after that episode.

And it's nothing I have against the actors in the show. I think that James Van Der Beek is a fine actor. I think that Varsity Blues is one the better MTV films out there (second best only to Election). I think that this summers Texas Rangers is going to be huge just for the fact that he is one of the young stars in it (despite the fact that I've already seen this movie before, when it was called Young Guns). Josh Jackson was Charlie in the Mighty Ducks trilogy and I think if he ever were able to convince people that he was more than just Pacey, it would have a very good career. Katie Holmes has done just that, after appearing in the hideous Teaching Mrs. Tingle and Disturbing Behavior, she has appeared in the critically acclaimed film Wonderboys and I don't doubt that she will be an even better actress once she gets out of this rut.

The biggest problem I have with the show is that the writing is unbelievable bad. Some would say so was the dialogue in "SportsNight," but those were grown middle-aged professionals, and these are high school students. Allegedly, all 16, 17, and 18 year olds use words like "apocalyptical," "inference," and "serious relationship" in everyday conversation. And don't forget about the Joey monologues about how nobody really loves her. All of her speeches are the same and sound like they came from a pile of discarded lines from Casablanca. The writers don't even let the characters grow an inch. Every week, Dawson does something adorable, which Pacey loathes and Joey wonders if they should get back together because of it. Joey is not strong for going to Dawson; she's just a moron. Obviously she loves him, but let's make this storyline drag out for five years, because it will never get stale. Pacey isn't cynical, he's just the only one who knows what the hell is actually going on. Face it; if you were the only sane person in a group full of morons, you would be cynical too. Dawson is the worst of them. If something doesn't go his way he sulks, he becomes surly and upset, and if we are really lucky he may cry.

Plus, the show is too predictable. The first time I watched the show I predicted four out of the five resolutions for the conflicts that appear right before the commercials. The last predication was achieved two weeks later. Needless to say I was banned from watching "Dawson" in that room after that.

And now when the gang graduates in the upcoming weeks, they are all going to go to school in Boston. Isn't that wonderful? So we can meet Dawson's alcoholic roommate and Joey's slutty roommate. And this way Pacey can come up everyday and visit them both. Maybe Jack will start playing football again and go to BC. What will they call it? "Dawson and the Charles River?" "Dawson's Dorm?" I only have one thing to say: "Saved by the Bell: The College Years."

So there you go, the long awaited review of "Dawson's Creek." I hope it was everything you hoped it to be. Keep this in mind shows like "Dawson's Creek" go on for eternity until everyone gets fed up with the fad, and the only person still watching is Van Der Beek's grandmother. On the flipside of the coin, shows like "SportsNight," "The Job," and "Action" get cancelled or shut down. What's wrong with this picture? My official prediction, the show is terrible, soon everyone will see that and it will be off the WB (which is already a quality network with shows like "Nikki") within the next two years. Trust me, there are better things to watch on Wednesday night.

abbreviation as its title, it was a little something called E.T.

Scary Movie II: The first one was so bad that I will not reduce myself to talking about the second. Thankfully, Marlon Brando will no longer being appearing due to "health reasons."

Final Fantasy: See Tomb Raider. I can remember visiting the website for this film daily, just itching to get stills from the production. I will say this: it looks absolutely stunning. Has remained relatively anonymous amid the slew of summer sequels, but I expect that to change. I'm not sure if audiences will buy the completely CGI characters, but if they do, there's no reason why this can't be one of the top five grossing films of the summer.

The Score: My pick for the best movie of the summer. A great cast: Robert DeNiro, Edward Norton and the aforementioned Brando. A trailer to die for. I get a Usual Suspects vibe when watching the previews and that's a good thing.

American Sweethearts: Only Julia Roberts could star in a film by that name. And it could only be romantic comedy. Her on-screen counterpart this time? John Cusak. Now I'm intrigued. The film written by (and starring) Billy Crystal is about a Hollywood couple who must promote their movie even after they've broken up. Kind of a cross between Notting Hill and Runaway Bride to use Julia's summer romantic comedies of two years ago.

Jurassic Park III: The Lost World was perhaps the worst sequel of all-time (okay, so Caddyshack 2 didn't set any cinematic standards) and that's coming from someone who enjoyed the original. This time around, there's no Spielberg and no Goldblum. The trailer shows what's to be expected: dinosaurs chomping on people. I have no desire to see it. Still, the last movie of the series holds the record for the largest opening weekend ever.

Planet of the Apes: The good: Tim Burton directs a film that is visually interesting to say the least. The bad: The series has lain dormant for the last 28 years and people may no longer be interested. Three decades ago, a planet ruled by animals was a novel piece of sci-fi. These days, we send drilling teams to blow up life-threatening asteroids barreling toward Earth. My how times have changed. I've seen the TV ads. My father laughed. I had a similar reaction that was internalized. A post-Perfect Storm Mark Whalberg would have his career launched or re-launched if this became a hit.

Rollerball: See above. A remake starring LL Cool J? God help us.

Rush Hour 2: After the tremendous success of the original, Chris Tucker emerged as the star not Jackie Chan. A listless performance by the Chan vehicle Shanghai Noon at the box office proved this. It will be Tucker's first return to the big screen since the original was a runaway October '98 hit. Notice a theme here? Sequel, remake, sequel, remake.

Rat Race: A remake (big surprise huh?) of It's a Mad Mad Mad Mad World. For anyone that has not seen the original, I cannot recommend it highly enough. A collection of comic legends in a script chocked full of hilarity. Among the highlights of this cast: Whoopi Goldberg, Seth Green, Cuba Gooding Jr. and Jon Lovitz. Also stars about one-half the cast of Road Trip.

American Pie 2: A friend brought up a good point: how do you make a sequel to a movie about losing one's virginity when all the main characters have already lost their virginity? American Pie struck a chord – not just because of its sexual antics, but because of its ability to capture the high school experience. I'd be very surprised if the sequel could make the magic happen again.

Osmosis Jones: Warner Brothers follows up the critically lauded, but publicly overlooked The Iron Giant with this animated movie. Chris Rock provides the voice, so that's a plus. It's tough to tell with August movies, but it could become big at a time with little kid's competition.

Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back. The ultimate fan boy movie. Kevin Smith fans have been licking their chops for this since Dogma. Basically, another forum for Smith to spew off one-liners and elaborate on all his philosophies on life. Phat! Don't make me laugh.

Knockaround Guys: The fairly inept sons of Brooklyn mobsters must retrieve a haul of money that they lost on a train. Vin Diesel returns (he's a tour de force). Seth Green and Barry Pepper also take on roles of sons while John Malkovich and Dennis Hopper assume two of the elder roles.

Keep an eye on these Independents.

About Adam (May): An Irish import. Kate Hudson in her first post-Oscar nomination role, plus the Miramax stamp of approval.

Startup.com (May): A documentary following (you guessed it) an Internet startup company. Timely considering the recent dot-com crash and early reviews are good.

Songcatcher (June): Continues the summer theme of movie's with strong musical elements.

Better than Sex (June): Three days of nothing but sex. Seriously. The film follows a couple's sexual relationship after they hook up at a party. It's filmed kind of like a documentary and reviews say it's "quirky and clever."

Sidewalks of New York (July): Think a smaller version of Playing by Heart set in New York City. Heather Graham, Ed Burns and Stanley Tucci star.

Jurassic Park

as Dr. Alan Grant, who was left out of the second film, and along with Laura Dern's character, Dr. Ellie Sattler, JP3 will try to recreate the characters we learned about the first time around. An addition of William H. Macy and Tea Leoni as a married couple stranded on the forsaken island of Isla Soma to the series will combine with a new breed of dinosaurs called Spinosaurus.

Jurassic Park 3 has very little to brag about, and probably should not have even been made. Instead of the most intense marketing plans and powerful hype we experience in 1985, we'll just get posters that say, Jurassic Park. Now under new management! Have you ever been to an amusement park under new management? The rides usually break and it closes down with in a week. Sadly, Mr. Johnston's Wild Ride will probably make Euro-Disney look like the World's fair.

Destiny's Child triumphs

DESTINY'S CHILD
Survivor
Sony

They met a dizzying series of obstacles: several litigious ex-members (a lawsuit claiming breach of contract and favoritism is still pending), continuous rumors of planned solo splits and endless gossip about a demanding and all-empowering group manger. And yet they survived. (Gee, I wonder how they come up with the album's title.)

The group is Destiny's Child – made up of 19-year-old Beyoncé Knowles and 21-one year-old Kelly Rowland and Michelle Williams – the current pop princesses, hoping to continue the success of 1998's triple hit spawning, septuple platinum The Writing's On the Wall.

We were first introduced to the trio with their effervescent debut hit single "No, No, No" and they have since grown into the biggest R&B group of the moment, albeit with enough backstage drama to rival any episode of Behind The Music.

Like R&B girl-group TLC before them, Destiny's Child's trials and tribulations have garnered the attention of listeners through the abundance of ongoing backstage crises, but it has been their inescapable power jams that retain that important attention. And with plenty of radio-friendly hits, that same formula will prove indestructible on their third album, Survivor.

Survivor is replete with giddy energy and positive vibes. The girls are vocally gifted, although Beyoncé can be said to be a step above the rest. One thing is also obvious: the girls can harmonize. In the aptly titled "Happy Face," a sunshine hitting, congenitally blissful track, these important qualities are apparent. But the up-in-the-sky assurance of the closing words "I'm flying," which are warbled out like a wounded bird, however, detract the song's value.

"Independent Woman Part II," the sequel to the mega-hit "Independent Woman Part I," a number one hit on the Charlie's Angels soundtrack, is as equally saucy, although less energetic than its predecessor.

The album is one that teenage girls will be able to relate to and gain a genuinely positive way of looking at otherwise negative issues. "The Story of Beauty" was inspired by a fan letter to Knowles, in which a young girl wrote that her stepfather molested her. The trickling beat, along with the assertive lyrics, "please dry your eyes young girl, you're beautiful," create a splendid track. Similarly, the album's title track is a testament to a woman's strength, but also carries a flaw that disappointingly occurs all too often on the album: the girls try too hard and preach too much.

The uproarious "Bootylicious," destined to become yet another gargantuan hit for the girls, is a self-esteem builder, implementing confidence in those who are self-conscious about having a big ol' booty (paging J.Lo). The lyrics come off as hilarious: "I don't think you're ready for this jelly." Equally amusing is "Nasty Girl," "you're nasty/ you're trashy/ you're classless, girl/ you're sleazy, you're freaky" they disparage to the lower class.

On the sexy "Apple Pie à la Mode" the girls croon about a "scrumptious" guy asking "where have you been all my life you chocolate covered strawberry apple pie?" Smooth and sultry, it's a sugar-drenched come-on-over, baby track. The dance hit "Sexy Daddy" continues on the same theme, only to an even greater level. The lyrics aren't nearly as sultry, but the beat is heavier, the vocals are stronger, and flavor is funkier – a fine dance recording.

"Emotion" is a beautiful cover of Samantha Sang's long-forgotten 1977 disco ballad. The soulful song is layered with acoustic guitar, handclaps, and the group's signature harmony. "Dangerously in Love" is the most eyebrow-raising track on Survivor, with the vulnerable lyrics that expose a woman's hopes and fears – afraid to lose themselves in love.

So what is the trio's destiny in this fickle market of music buyers? Which member will get booted off the fame producing, yet tiring, music island next? (Calling Jeff Probst!) Although Rowland and Williams both sing lead vocals on Survivor, the fact remains that the group is dominated by Knowles. Her creative input (she crafted nearly every track on the album) leads one to question the sisterly love and together forever stance (they sing each other's praises on the ending track, "Outro (DC-3) Thank You").

But if Destiny's Child does stick together and we eventually do learn to say each and every last one of their names, it will only depend on whether the jams they churn out are as well crafted as those that they have crafted thus far. (And perhaps a tinge of backstage turmoil for added publicity will help in securing the spotlight.)

During another scene, birds of the forest are blown up like balloons for the amusement of Shrek and his princess. It's undoubtedly shocking, because you don't expect, but the movie moves along as if nothing's wrong. Indeed, the entire film has a blaze attitude and fresh, fast-paced feel. It manages to avoid, at least for a long time, the heavy-handed feel that can bog down Disney films.

Of course, a typical romance develops between Shrek and the princess. Popular Disney themes like "accepting others," "accepting ourselves" and "accepting differences" arise. But that's about where the comparisons stop. Happy, feel-good ending a given, Shrek is an enjoyable romp – a twisted tale of courtly adventure gone bad or gone so amazingly right.

Eddie Murphy is absolutely a tour de force as the sidekick. His slick talking, self-deprecating donkey is brilliant. It gives Murphy the perfect vessel for his humor without the theatrics of his onscreen presence. Mike Myers adopts a Scottish accent for the lead role – something which I consider one of the movie's weakest points – but he embodies the brutish ogre fairly well. It would have been interesting and possibly better to see Chris Farley, who actually did voice some parts of the film before his death, in the role.

In publicity interviews for the film, Dream Works' execs said that they did not intentionally set out to attack Disney. In fact, Dream Works even held a special advanced screening of Shrek for the people at Disney. Apparently, Disney expressed no objection.

Maybe they should have. In fact, Disney should be afraid. A studio has finally succeeded not only in copying Disney's success, but more importantly in challenging the fundamental way in which they make movies. Shrek is an absolute success and I highly recommend it, even if you haven't been in grade school for a while.

Blues Traveler emerges from troubles with sonic solidarity

By Matt Despres
Collegian Staff

BLUES TRAVELER
Bridge
A&M Records

The musical equivalent of standing from a card game with your hand face-up on the table, Bridge, the latest release from 90's jam band pirates Blues Traveler, is an exercise in letting it out and forging a new identity, and that's only after having spent the better part of a decade dodging such singular labels and handles.

Still working through the tragic loss of bassist and founding member "Brooklyn" Bob Sheehan – for whom this album is formally dedicated – Blues Traveler has forged onward with new faces (Tad Kinchla, brother of guitarist Chan, on bass; and Ben Wilson on keyboards) and sounds that, while not entirely original, blend together a heaping of the Old School and a splash of what's to come.

Album opener "Back in the Day" screams for the pleasure that is frequent radio massage, and with good reason – an accessible chorus, tight instrumentation and easy-to-digest lyrics have long been the popular norm, and while Blues Traveler has always been and will continue to be a live band, they've learned to reign in the loose ends and construct pop ditties that fit comfortably into the waiting hands of Top 40 radio.

"Girl Inside My Head," the album's first release, is perhaps the band's most successful attempt at crafting a piece of pop candy to be stretched into something more beautiful and abstract on tour. Undeniably infectious from the start, and highlighted by a Wilson showcase on keys, the song is sweetened by singer John Popper's voice, a beautiful instrument itself, far too often overshadowed by his virtuoso harmonica playing.

The album's gloss is rooted in something darker, however – the act of a band embracing, not running, from a death some two years gone. Sheehan's memory haunts every track, particularly on cuts like "Pretty Angry," in which Popper draws his lost friend into an intimate dialogue: "And I guess I'm still pretty angry/And I don't want to be/I don't know which was the bigger waste of time/Missing you or wishing instead it was me."

Even where Sheehan isn't lyrically referenced, his inimitable power continues to loom. While Kinchla does a surprisingly good job of easing into a role some thought could never be re-cast, his unique talents still need time to grow – on both the listeners and his band mates.

As often as Blues Traveler touches down on those dark points, though, they have connected the spaces between with the freewheeling, fun loving spirit that have made past studio efforts and live shows so enjoyable. "The Way," which made its full band debut at the Orpheum Theater in Boston four years ago, is an optimistic tune colored in all the right spots by Popper's nimble harp and smart production. Musically and lyrically liberating, the song gathers both speed and size as it rolls along.

If "The Way" is the blissful climb to the top, then "Decision of the Skies" is the contemplative break waiting at the peak. Originally intended for a now discarded concept album, "Skies" is a beautifully composed song that floats along in a Stevie Wonder-esque vein, placing on top of his influence a unique songwriting effort that appropriately caps the album.

Simmering under the many light pop-song sensibilities, however, is the band's love of a burned and driven effort, revealing an edge still sharp after years of exhaustive touring. Both Kinchla and Wilson perform wonders for the remorseless "All Hands," which churns with passion and simple, raw musical chops. "You're Burning Me" plays in the confines of that shadow, borrowing the granular tone while carving a shape of its own. And, as on every track here, drummer Brendan Hill simply comes to play.

In the end, Bridge accurately reflects the number of moods a band will go through when forced to rediscover itself, resulting in a fair share of growing pains. Those pains, however, for a band that's been around the block like this one has, will become motivations in the future, driving each member to further explore the enormous capabilities and talent they have. While not their strongest effort to date (see 1991's Travelers and Thieves and 1993's Save His Soul), this Bridge more than holds it share – both the memory of an old friend, and the talents of a group headed into a new beginning.

R.E.M.'s brilliant return; significant others

R.E.M.
"Imitation of Life" (Maxi-Single)
Warner Bros. Records

Three years after releasing 1998's Up, a shape shifting and beautiful album that found R.E.M. absorbing the loss of drummer Bill Berry while trying to forge ahead creatively, the band has returned with "Imitation of Life," the first single from the highly anticipated Reveal.

With its impeccable verse/chorus frame and roots planted firmly in a Fables of the Reconstruction sensibility, "Imitation of Life" is both familiar and fresh – as it unfolds for the first time and again in subsequent spins.

Although it's textured with the simple guitar/bass/drums of previous efforts, "Imitation" glides along not on the tails of past accomplishments, but rather is fed by the energy of a band that has rediscovered a comfortable and productive state. Peter Buck keeps things remarkably simple on guitar and still wrangles a powerful voice from it: if there ever was a successful practitioner of the "say more with less" theory, it remains him. Mike Mills chips in with a typically sinuous bass line, while Michael Stipe is brilliant under his lyrically poetic leanings. His voice is this song in so many ways: inspired and chillingly youthful, it is his unique front man persona that fills in the blanks.

R.E.M. keeps blends the past and future on "Imitation of Life."

Also included on the single are three bonus tracks, all excellent. "The Lifing," a Reveal track heard here in its original state, is an achingly beautiful, measured tribute to the songwriting prowess that R.E.M. has retained over two decades. Stipe and Buck again have full control, painting the air with simplicity as they move on, ignoring the sleepy state that so often lulls veteran bands away.

"Beat A Drum" is a sweet, minimalist ballad lifted from the desire that Stipe verbally pleas for, while "2JN" is a pleasing, second cousin to the Out of Time instrumental "Endgame."

Talk about the passion? Absolutely. Although Reveal is less than a week away, R.E.M. could have issued this EP alone and still put legitimate claim on the title of the most vital band working today. (Matthew Despres)

Sampler
Brown Chair Records

Remember the feeling of discovering a new artist? The feeling you got your sophomore year of high school when, alone in your bedroom, the CD in the stereo seemed to be able to succinctly summarize your life in glaring detail, and as much as you wanted to go out and tell the rest of the world about this new artist, you also quietly hoped they wouldn't get discovered for a while – so that they could somehow be your own.

Sam Shaber's new ep, Sampler, reminds you of that feeling. With only five tracks, the album is small in proportions. The songs, all accompanied by a single acoustic guitar or djembe drum, also seem like their own small, but precious, stories. They range in subject matter from the passionate "Beloved," the singer's own take on the Toni Morrison novel of the same name, to a fond remembrance of family in the thoughtful "Uncle Bob."

Perhaps Shaber's greatest success in these songs is the feeling of honesty they evoke. The minimal instrumentation lends an intimacy to the cd that allows you to picture Sam playing in a hushed auditorium, the coffeehouse down the street, or your own living room. The song "Bare" is a prime example of her down-to-earth mentality as she sings "Here I go as I go anywhere/and here I go...bare." Her credibility is all the more believable when one considers the inspiration for her songs. "It's almost entirely autobiographical," Shaber says, referring to her writing.

Shaber also maintains a reputation as one of the hardest working members of the folk community. A glance at her schedule for this month sees her touring extensively on both coasts of the U.S., including a stop at the Iron Horse on Thursday, the 24th to open for Trey Lure. When she's not winning fans, she's convincing critics, such as those that awarded her the 2001 John Lennon Songwriting Contest.

With the increasing exposure, two previous full-length cds, and a forthcoming live project from Sam Shaber, it's doubtful that her music will remain in the ears and stereos of a select few for much longer. She may ultimately be discovered by a greater number of listeners, but the intimate sound, heartfelt playing, and revealing songs on this cd will remain the same. So while Sam Shaber may not actually play in your living room anytime soon, Sampler just might be the next best thing. (David Piper)

Okla. State dreams of rebuilding stadium; cost reaches $100 million

By Ryan McNeill
Daily O'Collegian (Oklahoma State U.)

(U-WIRE) STILLWATER, Okla. – It would be the crown jewel of the Oklahoma State University athletic department.

A $100 million rebuild of Lewis Field would give the aging stadium a completely new look, including a new press box, a new exterior in line with the university architecture style, club seats and new luxury skyboxes.

In an effort to make that dream a reality, the OSU athletic department has retained the services of ScheerGame Sports Development LLC to study myriad renovation possibilities for the aging Lewis Field.

"We are confident that ScheerGame will bring the expertise needed to this initial investigative stage in our renovation plans," said OSU Athletic Director Terry Don Phillips.

Phillips and the University have embarked on their goal of breaking ground for the project prior to a 2002 football game against UCLA.

The study will attempt to identify creative funding solutions for the project. Also included in the study will be plans for design, construction, marketing, finance and risk management.

"We feel using ScheerGame will offer us the most prudent approach to the overall process, enabling us to approach the project in a methodical manner," Phillips said. "We believe that by using the expertise of ScheerGame in this very early stage of the planning process, it will result in one of the finest college athletic complexes in the country when combined with the newly completed Athletic Center and Gallagher-Iba Arena."

University officials are seeking to fund the project through private donations, corporate partnerships, priority seating and suite sales, said OSU President James Halligan.

"The scope of the renovation will be determined by our private fund-raising success," Halligan said. "We expect to build upon the achievements realized during our recently completed 'Bringing Dreams To Life' campaign."

According to a press release from ScheerGame, the study is already underway and will incorporate the assistance of Tulsa-based Gary Sparks Companies, which designed the $54 million Gallagher-Iba Arena expansion, along with Heers International Inc. and Trahan Architecture in Baton Rouge, La.

"We believe ScheerGame's vertically integrated, turn-key services will result in a facility that is designed to be more cost-effective, produce more revenue, create more fan enjoyment and excitement, and attract the best and brightest student-athletes to the OSU campus," said Martin I. Greenberg, ScheerGame managing director. "We look forward to working with OSU to achieve its goals in the renovation and redesign of this facility."

Named after a popular dean of veterinary medicine, the first grandstand seats at Lewis Field were built in 1920 with 8,000 seats. The facility, now one of the few east-west playing fields in the nation, was originally in the traditional north-south direction.

ScheerGame is currently acting as the project director in the construction of the 10,000-seat Manchester Civic Center in New Hampshire, which will be the home of an American Hockey League team. ScheerGame also developed the nationally recognized BI-I-O Center in Greenville, S.C., home of the East Central Hockey League's Greenville Grrrowl and the Carolina Rhinos.

Softball adds honors to palette; ten women make conference team

While the Massachusetts softball team is preparing for post-season play, 10 players have been named to the Atlantic 10 All-Conference team. The Player of the Year, Pitcher of the Year, Coach of the Year, and Rookie of the Year Awards were all handed out as well and the Maroon and White took home a boatload of them.

UMass junior third baseman Cherra Wheeler was named A-10 Player of the Year. "Scooter" finished the regular season first in the conference in RBI (38) and on-base percentage (.457). The Kingsburg, CA native leads the Maroon and White in hitting (.324) while ranking second in the A-10 in slugging percentage (.537). Wheeler has pounded out 44 hits, 11 doubles, and six homeruns on the season.

Junior hurler Jen Hadley was named Pitcher of the Year after leading the conference in wins (15), opponents' batting average (.202), and strikeouts (119), while tossing two no-hitters on the season. The Bristol, Conn. native heads into the A-10 post-season with a 15-6 record. Hadley has amassed a 1.70 ERA in 140 innings pitched. The right-hander has won 14 of her last 15 starts.

Meanwhile, coach Elaine Sortino was named A-10 Coach of the Year. In the 21 years she has run the program, Sortino has established herself as one of the nation's most successful collegiate softball coaches, posting a record of 728-325-3. Sortino led her squad to an undefeated 21-0 record in the A-10, a 40-win season, and a No. 25 ranking in the national polls. The award is Sortino's sixth in her tenure.

On the All-Conference team, Wheeler is joined in the infield by sophomore shortstop Emily Robustelli and junior second baseman Ashley Bakken. The outfield boasts the two more Minutewomen, sophomore right fielder Anna Perey and junior centerfielder Teri Rooney. All five of the Maroon and White's positional representatives are batting at least .313 on the season.

Senior Carrie Jeffries joins Hadley on the pitching staff. The Placienta, Calif., native is the team leader in ERA (1.24) and has put together a 12-4 season.

In an A-10 season that has been so thoroughly dominated by the Minutewomen, it comes as no surprise that so many on the team received awards.

against the Huskies on Tuesday, while junior Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler pounded out two hits, a run scored, and an RBI. Senior Debbie Tomoguchi and sophomore Anna Perey each slapped run-scoring singles.

The UMass attack boasts five everyday players batting over .310-Wheeler (.331), sophomore Emily Robustelli (.325), Teri Rooney (.320), junior Ashley Bakken (.318), and Perey (.315), an accomplishment matched by few.

Coach Elaine Sortino has pointed the team toward this part of the season all year long. From her 700th victory to the team record-tying 24-game winning streak, Sortino has continuously been focused on winning the A-10 tournament.

All that determination and talent should pay dividends in Dayton, as the Minutewomen look to win their 14th championship overall and seventh in a row.

Sophomore Anna Perey was one of ten Minutewomen to make the A-10 All-Conference team.

Letter to the Editor:

As an employee and alumnus of the University of Massachusetts, I take great pride in the accomplishments of our student-athletes. I believe their successes reflect positively on our entire university. We are blessed to have a number of athletic programs that compete on a national level, and every year we have a number of teams and individuals advance to their respective national tournaments.

This past Sunday night a grave injustice occurred when the NCAA failed to award an at-large bid to the UMass men's lacrosse team for this year's tournament. We were all saddened and even angered by the decision of the selection committee. However, we should not lose sight of the successes of this year's team. They had a wonderful season.

They finished with an impressive 12-2 overall record. They won a share of the ECAC title. They beat national powers Hofstra, Navy, Penn State and UMBC. They beat regional rivals Harvard, Yale and Brown to earn the New England Championship. They finished ranked in the top 10 in all seven statistical categories that the NCAA keeps.

They finished the regular season ranked ninth nationally in the USILA/STX Coaches' Poll. Rich Kunkel finished his career as the 12th all-time leading goal scorer in UMass history. John Madigan recorded his 100th career point in the final game of the season. Juan-Pablo Mas was recognized by the University with a senior leadership award for his success in the classroom as an electrical engineering major. By all accounts, this was one of the best seasons ever in the storied history of UMass lacrosse.

The selection committee took away the opportunity for these kids to compete for a national championship. But the NCAA cannot take away the respect and admiration the members of the team and coaching staff have earned. The program has been through a lot over the past few years, from the death of friend and teammate Eric Sopracase to two consecutive losing seasons.

This year's senior class deserves a lot of credit for the way they collectively handled themselves through all the ups and downs. They truly are a great group of people, and I am proud to have them represent our university. They are champions on and off the field and for that, I thank them.

Congratulations on a great season!

What they're saying...

The following are responses to Eric Soderstrom and Matthew F. Secco's article on the lacrosse team's omission from the NCAA tournament. All comments were posted on www.dailycollegian.com.

I must say that I am completely disgusted with the decision of the NCAA committee as well. It just feels like this has been a losing season now. I can't imagine how the players must feel. Is there any way to write the committee and give them our thoughts?

-Rich Rebidue

Simply put, neither Virginia nor Hofstra deserve to be in the NCAAs.

Greg Cannella, you definitely got a raw deal from the NCAA committee. You should NEVER let [Harry] Royle or [Dom] Starsia forget it. They know they do not deserve the bid. They are neither honest nor do they have enough integrity to back out and admit that their teams did not perform up to par to deserve a bid.
What is wrong with the NCAA to allow this? Does anyone out there have any INTEGRITY? What credibility does the NCAA have after this? What does this say to the kids?

I guess if you have the right connections and can bring in the money you can do anything you want. I guess this puts Starsia and Royle in the same league as the murderer O.J. Simpson and dirtbag Bill Clinton as men with absolutely NO INTEGRITY.

-David Guill

Thanks to Soderstrom and Secco for reporting the Hofstra and Virginia connections to the tournament selection committee. What is AD Bob Marcum's response to this obvious slight?

Most importantly, congratulations to Greg Canella and the Minuteman lacrosse team for an extremely successful year. By the way, could we possibly add Virginia to our schedule next year? I'm sure our team would love to play them – home or away. Thanks to Soderstrom and Secco for reporting the Hofstra and Virginia connections to the tournament selection committee.

New law tries to stop agent-athlete contact

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

A new law to curb contact between student-athletes and sports agents will be implemented in Indiana, starting July 1. Other states have passed similar versions of the law, entitled "The Uniform Athletes Agent Act," but Indiana Attorney General Steve Carter is the first to implement it.

"The bill had unanimous support from the Legislature and we are currently establishing policies to enforce it," Carter said in a released statement. "We feel that Indiana will implement a process that will significantly curb unethical practices that sometimes occur in agent/student athlete interactions."

The law, sponsored by Senator Vi Simpson, was signed by Governor Frank O'Bannon on May 1.

Indiana schools such as Notre Dame, Indiana University and Purdue University are all Division I schools. The National Collegiate Athletic Association and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws proposed the law to all states with college teams.

"This legislation will be beneficial to student-athletes and agents because it will allow the agents' recruitment of players to be regulated," said Indiana University head football coach Cam Cameron. "We applaud the governor, the legislature, and state Senator Vi Simpson, who sponsored the bill, for taking such strong measures."

The NCAA can regulate the schools and athletes, but until now, there has been no way to regulate the agents. The NCAA has seen what it calls a "dramatic increase" in agent-athlete misconduct in recent years. Citing unrealistic promises and secret payments, the NCAA has sent a letter endorsing the bill to each state legislature.

Such language hits particularly close to home at the University of Massachusetts. After his graduation, Marcus Camby, current Knick starter and former Minuteman, was cited for accepting money and gifts from agents while being courted for the NBA. Scholarships to the men's basketball program were cut, and the Final Four banner was removed from the rafters of the Mullins Center.

No Representative or Senator has yet introduced the bill into law in the Massachusetts General Court.

"The Uniform Athletes Agent Act establishes registration requirements for sports agents within the state of Indiana," the law reads. "It requires all sports agents to register though the Attorney General's office before they can solicit athletes in the state of Indiana and authorizes the Attorney General to enforce laws on agent activity."

The penalties for any violation of the law range from civil to criminal, and may constitute an 18-month prison term and a 10,000 dollar fine.

Violations of the law run the gamut, from giving false or misleading information to athletes, cash and gifts before a contract is signed to unregistered agents initiating contact with a student athlete.

Seventeen other states have entered the bill into their legislatures, and Arkansas, Arizona, Idaho, Mississippi and Utah have all passed the law. None but Indiana has empowered the Attorney General to enforce it with prison and fines.

After taking an inning off, the Maroon and White tallied yet another two spot in the bottom of the fifth. Maumus hit a one-out double to left, and after Ellerbrook was retired on a grounder to second, Kulak launched his third longball of the year to right field and to put UMass up 8-4.

Loonie had a rough inning in the sixth, as Rich Caloiero ripped a ground rule double to right field to lead things off. Two batters later, Godusky singled to bring Caloiero around. After a wild pitch moved him to second, DeVincentis then hit another single to bring Caloiero in. After Jim Reilly hit an infield single, first baseman Tim Gunn roped a 3-1 offering over the 370 mark in the left field power alley to put the Hawks up 9-8.

The bats stayed quiet until the bottom of the seventh, when Maumus led things off with a walk. Ellerbrook dropped down a bunt single between pitcher and first base. Kulak then sacrificed them up a base, and they advanced again on a wild pitch. But Jim Boylan snuffed out the rally by striking out pinch hitter Tim Klett and getting Gorneault on a pop up.

Santos set the Hawks down in order in the eighth, setting up Maumus's heroics. Altieri led things off by singling to center, and was pinch run for by Connell Clark. Senez then ripped a one-out single to deep short, and the runners moved to second and third on a wild pitch. After Anderson went down swinging, Maumus hit a sizzler through the middle to put the Maroon and White up 11-9.

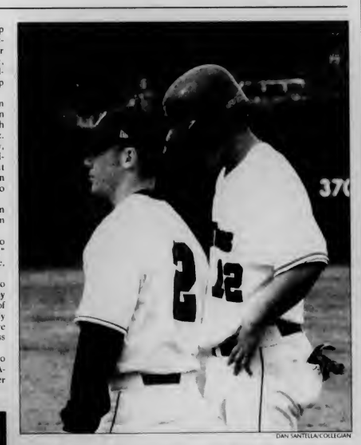
Santos retired the first two men easily in the top of the ninth, but then gave up consecutive singles to pinch hitter Michael Walls and Tarewicz. Skirkanich came in to face Godusky, and the runners got into scoring position by way of a double steal. But Godusky hit a soft grounder to Gavin Clark at first base, who flipped to Skirkanich for the out.

With the win, the Minutemen upped their record at Earl Lorden Field to 14-4 on the season.

"We don't let anybody come into our home and push us around," Gorneault said. "Anyone we play here, we know we can beat them."

"I think it's especially enjoyable to play at home because we play so many games on the road at the beginning of the season," Stone said. "We really feel comfortable here. When you have early success here, it leads to success later on."

The Maroon and White will look to tie up home field advantage in the A-10 tourney when it travels to Xavier for a three-game set this weekend.



DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Tom Ellerbrook (right) had nothing to hang his head about in the team's series with SJU. The sophomore went eight-for-11 with five RBI in the three game set.

■ Campolettano

Because of the unfounded advantage that Mulligan held over him, Campolettano was forced to play a waiting game that would eventually lead him to Amherst.

"Every school I was talking to was talking to [Mulligan] and they were all making him offers first," he said. "So I had to pretty much sit around and wait for him to choose schools before I could decide."

Eventually Mulligan signed with Syracuse while Campolettano headed to UMass to succeed John Kasselakis in net for Cannella and his Minutemen.

Unfortunately, Kasselakis was not yet ready to yield his starting position and as it stood, Campolettano would have had to wait two years until he was the number one keeper.

"I told coach [Cannella] I knew Kaz [Kasselakis] was going to be the starter for the next two seasons and it just wasn't worth my time if I was only going to be the starter for two years," he said. "So he told me I should red shirt, but if I red shirted my freshman year there wouldn't have been any back up so I did it my sophomore year."

Even after watching from the sidelines in '98, Campolettano was by no means handed the title – he had to earn it.

"It was between Tom Gilligan and me for the job and really it came down to the spring scrimmages," he said.

Campolettano earned the title of number one keeper and he shined on a struggling 4-8 squad. But his exceptional first season as a starter was followed by a year of tragedy and a season of struggle.

As a senior, Campolettano refused to let his collegiate career end on a sour note. With the calamity of 2000 behind him, lacrosse has once again become the spice of life.

"It's fun again and I am starting to like it," he said. "It's not like a job or going to work everyday, lacrosse is really fun again."

His re-energized work ethic and his renewed passion for the sport he once loved has paid huge dividends on the field in 2001.

Campolettano was again up to his old antics, frustrating shooters with a .627 save percentage (6th in the nation) and driving offensive coordinators to the brink of madness with a 7.87 GAA (9th).

Possibly his best game in a UMass jersey came against defending National Champion Syracuse. As the hill of Garber Field was teeming with fans, Campolettano put on a goaltending clinic for the 5,000 plus in attendance.

With a 19 save performance, he had the members of the potent Orangeman attack talking to themselves as they headed back to the sideline.

His performance even drew the praise of a long time rival.

"Camps's a great goalie," Mulligan said. "It's unfortunate he doesn't get the postseason awards he deserves."

The key to Campolettano's heroics in net is not his work ethic or his ability, because he has always been blessed with talent. The key is his attitude, an attitude that has been overhauled and retooled since his freshman days in Amherst.

"You look at Chris Campolettano now and compare that to when he first set foot on this campus, you're talking about going from a boy to a man," Cannella said. "And all of that has to do with Chris."

It is amazing when one thinks about the year of trepidation that he struggled through, only to return 10 months later, in top form, with aspirations parallel to those of his teammates.

"I know he'll be there when we need him," Cannella said after an early season victory.

Could he have said that a year ago? Maybe not. But in hindsight that statement is almost fortuitous, as Campolettano turned up the juice every time the he was faced with adversity.

Campolettano completed his turbulent but successful four years at UMass by leading the Minutemen to one of the best seasons in its hallowed lacrosse history (12-2 record, No. 8 national rank ing).

Despite the disputed absence of an NCAA tournament berth, there is no argument that Campolettano is a champion to all who know him and have heard his story.

So now you know Chris Campolettano and now you can call him Camps.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

When Campolettano walked off the field for the final time at Brown, he left behind a legacy that included the sixth most saves in school history, just behind peecessor John Kasselakis.

Horoscopes

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Anxiety over your workload either at home or on the job will keep you from enjoying a hidden opportunity today – unless you lighten up!
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Don't get carried away with yourself today. A little subtlety, style and grace go a long way toward impressing others.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Physical and mental activities have much to offer you today, and you will want to combine the two for the best results.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Someone close to you is likely to be quite edgy and irritable today – and it will be up to you to see that he or she stays in control.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You must be willing to take a personal interest in someone else's affairs today if you are going to help at all. You mustn't remain impartial!
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You must remain on top of things as they develop today. If it's more authority you're after, you must be willing of prove that you can handle it.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Don't misuse your own popularity today. Give others the time of day – and the benefit of the doubt. A friend comes to you with advice.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – It may be up to you today to do those things that you thought were someone else's responsibility. You can do it all much better!
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – This is a good day for solving financial problems as best you can. Remember, you can bend the rules – but you mustn't break them.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – What is asked of you today may not be fair, but if you can rise to the occasion and so what is required, then you'll be ahead of the game.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – What seems a mistake at first may prove to be highly beneficial to you in the long run. It may take time, but you'll eventually be rewarded.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – An old-fashioned approach to a new and unexpected dilemma is likely to pay off with surprising speed. This may, indeed, be the way to go!

Softball readies for A-10 tournament

Women to face URI in first round

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

Forty wins. Ranked No. 25 nationally. Two no-hitters. Undefeated in Atlantic 10 play. Seven hundred career victories for the coach. Twenty-four consecutive victories, tying the school record. Seven All-Conference Players. A-10 Player of the Year. A-10 Pitcher of the Year.

So many accomplishments, all culminating this weekend in the Midwest.

The Massachusetts softball team (40-11 overall, 21-0 A-10) will begin post-season play this afternoon as the No. 1 seed in the A-10 tournament. The Maroon and White will take the field opposite No. 4 seed Rhode Island in Dayton, Ohio.

The two squads met just last weekend for a three games at the UMass Softball Complex. The home team swept the series, outscoring the Rams 16-2. Each of UMass's three pitchers - Carrie Jeffries (12-4), Jen Hadley (16-6), and Kaila Holtz (12-1) - notched a win in the series.

The dominating performance completed UMass's undefeated conference record. The Maroon and White had long since clinched its 11th straight A-10 Championship and will take on a team in a much different position.

Despite the poor showing against the A-10's top team, URI managed to tie the school record of 28 wins in a season, good enough to get the team back into post-season play for the first time in four years. Overall, Rhody is 4-11 in its six A-10 tournament appearances.

The Rams have a checkered past against the Minutewomen, who have won 53 out of 65 meetings between the two teams.

April was good to Rhody. After a shaky 6-19 start, the Rams went 17-5 including three five game winning streaks.

Senior Christine Pederson and junior Gwen Rack pitched no-hitters on April 26 and April 29, respectively. Pederson is 13-11 on the year with a 1.68 ERA and seven shutouts. It was with a blast against Brown on April 25 that Rack tied the team record of eight home-runs. The Pine Hill, N.J. native's powerful display led the Rams to a total of 19 homeruns on the 2001 season, nine more than their previous record.

The UMass attack is running on all cylinders. After being unable to take the mound for nearly a month, Holtz has returned with a vengeance and was honored with her second A-10 Pitcher of the Week Award. The right-hander tossed 14 innings, allowed just six hits, no earned runs, and struck out 12 batters.

Hadley, meanwhile, is coming off her second no-hitter of the season. The dominating effort against UConn dropped the junior's ERA to 1.64 on the season.

The ball has been jumping off the offense's bats as well. Sophomore Brandi Cross went deep

Setting up Camp

Senior fought through tragedy to lax stardom

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

You can't call him Camps. You can't because you don't know him. You can't because you don't know what he has been through. You can't because to you he is a number or a statistic. You can't because all you saw in 2000 was a dismal goals against average, when all he felt was grief and sadness.

You don't know Chris Campolettano, because if you did you would understand why the last thing he wanted to do 365 days ago was play lacrosse.

"Last year my mom died over the winter and my grandfather died before I came back to school," he said. "Last time I really played, [lacrosse] my buddy Eric [Sopreasa] died so that left a bad taste in my mouth."

Campolettano left Amherst after his red shirt sophomore year saddened by a 4-8 record but invigorated by a .612 save percentage in his first full season of action.

His numbers had him touted as one of the best young goaltenders in college lacrosse with an upside that had his coaching staff and his defense salivating.

But the death of close friend Sopreasa scarred what turned out to be a glimmering fall season debut for the sophomore. Leaving Massachusetts for Long Island, N.Y. should have helped Campolettano but instead he was met with more tragedy over the winter of 1999.

The loss of his mother and his grandfather coupled with the tragic memories of a fallen teammate led to a time of confusion for the star goaltender, so lacrosse took a backseat to life.

"My head really wasn't on lacrosse," he said. "I just wanted to hang out with my buddies and not really do anything, so my performance really slipped a lot."

His 12-month nightmare concluded with a lurid 14 games in 2000. The Massapequa Park, N.Y. native barely saved fifty percent of the shots he faced (.527) while allowing over ten goals per game (10.89) for what would prove to be the only time in his career.

For the first time since his seventh birthday Campolettano really didn't want to be in net – and it showed.

Growing up in Long Island is much like a childhood of playground basketball in New York City.

"My brother [Matt] and me had a goal in my backyard and we lived behind a park, so we used to bring the goal out there," he said. "In Long Island everyone plays lacrosse so we used to play in pickup games, instead of playing pickup basketball we played pickup lacrosse."

In the mold of a pure jump shooter that grew up taking hundreds of shots a day, Chris and Matt Campolettano were seemingly born and bred as attackmen. But somehow the elder of the two brothers got roped into stopping shots instead of firing them.

"My Dad was my coach my first year when I played attack. I was seven years old," he said. "Nobody else wanted to play goalie so he asked me if I could play one year and after that he promised me I would never have to play goalie again."

After a Little League season of donating his body to punishment in the crease, Campolettano was looking forward to fluttering the nets, instead of fearing the sound of rubber on twine.

Unfortunately for Campolettano, the glory of attack was not in the cards; he was instead anointed as guardian of the cage and bound to an existence between the pipes.

"The next year nobody wanted to play goalie again," he said. "So I got stuck playing and I was halfway decent at it so I just stuck with it."

Campolettano was a quick study in the cage, and by the time he reached the high school level, he was one of the top goalies on the Island.

Under the tutelage of coach Pat Shea at St. Anthony's high school, Campolettano raked in the accolades.

He backstopped his high school mates to a Catholic League championship in '98 while earning a first team All-Catholic League selection in '96.

Campolettano was simply dominant in his junior and senior years of high school and while his on field presence wowed Long Island lacrosse crowds, it also drew attention from many of the top lacrosse programs in the nation.

"I talked to Syracuse, Duke, Towson and Cornell but I came here [UMass] and I had a great time on my trip," he said. "I thought the guys were great, I talked to coach [Greg Cannella]. He was young and I thought he was on to something."

His staunchest competition for the title of best goaltender on Long Island was present Syracuse goalie Rob Mulligan. Through no fault of his own, Campolettano was at somewhat of a disadvantage because of the nature of the school he attended and played for.

The distinction between the two talented backstops was that Mulligan played for Farmingdale, a public school, while Campolettano backstopped St. Anthony's, a private institution.

"Me and Mulligan were supposedly the two best goalies on Long Island," he said. "[Mulligan] went to public school and I went to private school and on Long Island the public schools get more attention from scouts."

Baseball sweeps SJU, enters final weekend in tie for first place

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

It's good to be on top.

The Massachusetts baseball team pulled out an 11-9 victory yesterday over St. Joseph's on Senior Day to move them into a tie with Temple for first place in the Atlantic 10.

The Minutemen (23-17, 13-6 A-10) swept the Hawks (22-25-1, 9-10 A-10) in the three game set, and are in a position to grab the top spot in the conference tourney as they travel to Ohio for a three-game series with Xavier this weekend.

"It's good to be in first, but we still have a lot of work to do," head coach Mike Stone said. "We're not definitely in the tournament yet, but as I told these guys, first place is available, so why not take it? If we play well, we should be in good shape."

The Maroon and White can ensure its presence in the four-team field for the tournament by winning just one of three from the Musketeers this weekend or by way of another team's performance. Temple plays fifth place Saint Bonaventure in a trifecta while third-place Dayton travels to Fordham for three. Fourth-place George Washington is finished with their season.

As for yesterday's contest, a two-run single by shortstop Cullan Maumus with two outs in the bottom of the eighth inning broke a 9-9 tie with St. Joe's. Maumus went two-for-four with three runs scored in the contest, while junior Mike Kulak chipped in three hits, including a triple and a homer, and drove in five runs.

"It's huge [to sweep St. Joe's]," said senior Nick Gorneault. "We knew at this point of the season that we needed to get some wins against this team to ensure our spot in the playoffs. Every year our goal is to win the Atlantic 10 championship, and we've done a good job to get ourselves in that spot."

"This was definitely a big series," added senior Gavin Clark. "I think we've got a great team and we deserve this."

Jesse Santos picked up the win to improve to 6-4 on the season, as he pitched two and two-thirds innings of scoreless relief for the Minutemen. Nick Skirkanich came in with two away in the ninth to register his third save of the year.

The Hawks struck first in the top of the initial frame, as Justin Godusky drew a one-out walk. He then swiped second base and came around two batters later, when catcher Mike DeVincentis doubled him home.

The lead would be short-lived however, as the Minutemen countered with two tallies in the bottom of the inning. Kulak reached on an error by Hawk second baseman Jason Tarewicz, and he trotted home when Nick Gorneault hit his 12th homerun of the season to make the score 2-1.

The Maroon and White got two more in the second, as senior Scott Anderson started things off with a walk. Maumus reached base when shortstop Pace Bradshaw bobbled his grounder. After Tom Ellerbrook struck out, Kulak tripled the two runners home to give the home squad a 4-1 edge.

The third brought two more runs. Jeff Altieri led things off with a single and Aaron Senez drew a one-out walk. Anderson then singled home Altieri to put UMass up by four. Starter Eric Vardijan then issued consecutive walks to Ellerbrook and Kulak, the second of which scored Senez. That brought Jon Kokol in, who finished up the inning.

On the other side of the field, starter Brandon White was cruising, as he settled down from his first inning trouble to allow just three hits through four innings.

"Brandon White threw well for four innings but then he got a little distracted," Stone said. "David Loonie was throwing well, he just wasn't getting ahead in the count, so it gave them an opportunity to swing at some pretty good pitches. Santos did a good job and we finished up with Nick. We piecemealed some pretty good innings together."

The fifth inning spelled doom though, as Tarewicz and Godusky led off the inning with back-to-back singles. Centerfielder Eric Wyatt then ripped a three-run shot over the right field fence, and DeVincentis followed with a single. David Loonie came on to put out the fire, but the SJU deficit was trimmed to two.

General education discussed, Senate re-elects chair Hugus

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The Faculty Senate re-elected Professor Frank Hugus as Presiding Officer and Professor Brian O'Connor as Faculty Delegate to the Board of Trustees at their regular meeting yesterday afternoon.

Both were elected by acclimation with no other nominations from the floor. The elections were held after a presentation by James Cahill, Director of Facilities Planning Division, on several construction projects.

"Today, its good news," Cahill said, displaying several slides of completed construction projects. "We have been doing some good things. The Computer Science building is finished, we've renovated Mahar. This is just a sample of what we've done."

Completed projects such as the campus gateways, the W.E.B. DuBois library's fence, and the Fine Arts Center lobby were discussed as well as future projects. Isenberg School of Management room 120, a 215-seat auditorium, is scheduled to be renovated, and the groundbreaking for the new addition to the SOM, paid for largely by private donations, will occur soon.

"The fence is up," Cahill said. "We'll start digging this week."

Professor Lila Geirash and Robert Duby then presented on the proposed 22.9 million dollar Integrated Science building. The project would provide a new home for the Life Sciences and Chemistry departments, with classrooms, offices, student space and a research wing.

"I was head of the Chemistry department when the crisis arose in Goessman," Geirash said. "Two thousands students take General Chemistry and they are trying to do it in an unsafe building. The air is not good enough."

Cahill explained that due to an inadequate exhaust system, "20 mile an hour winds" would greet visitors and the chemical fumes were not being properly vented.

However, the discussion of multimillion-dollar construction irked some senators. Professor Kandula Sastry wondered where the money was coming from. Another senator wondered, in light of decreasing faculty numbers, if "by the time these buildings are finished, will the faculty on campus be reduced to zero?"

The Senate then passed several motions. It created seven new classes, including three new Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration courses and two new Nursing courses.

The Stockbridge School of Agriculture was the subject of two motions. The first created a fourth concentration in Horticulture, that of General Horticulture.

"The Department of Plant and Soil Sciences has been actively involved in assisting the Stockbridge School of Agriculture in the two-year Associate Degree Program in the field of Horticulture," the Academic Matters Council report on the motion reads. "Currently there are three concentrations under Horticulture. The current rigid structure of the School's major does not even provide the opportunity for enrolling in electives."

No new classes or faculty are needed to create the concentration. The Academic Matters Council estimates that enrollment in the concentration will be about 25-30 students.

The second motion renamed a major within Stockbridge. The "Arboriculture and Park Management" major is now known as the "Arboriculture and Community Forest Management."

"Nationally, there has been a trend to move away from Park Management to Community Forest Management," the Academic Matters Council report on the motion reads. "This is consonant with employer/student interests across the country. The new emphasis is on Community Forest Management."

New drug helps fight rare lukemia

By Erik Haan
Collegian Staff

For those grappling with the effects of a rare form of leukemia, hope has sprung forth with the Federal Drug Administration's approval Thursday of Gleevec, a medication designed to attack cancer cells while leaving healthy cells unharmed.

The drug has been approved for the treatment of chronic myeloid leukemia (CML), a disease that is responsible for a vast increase in the amount of white blood cells, which could then possibly hamper the function of other organs in the body. The affliction kills approximately 2,500 Americans every year.

Gleevec functions by blocking the chemical signals emitted from cancer cells. This prevents the abnormal growth and production of other cancer cells. The best feature of the medication, however, is that it has the capability to target only the cancerous cells, while leaving normal human cells intact.

"We believe such targeting is the wave of the future," Tommy Thompson, Secretary of Health and Human Services, said in an announcement that was published on The New York Times website.

Gleevec, which comes in pill form and is consumed once a day, is manufactured by Novartis Pharmaceuticals. The company did numerous clinical trials before the F.D.A. approval went through. Of 530 patients in the first phase of CML, 90% enjoyed dramatic results, watching their cancer go into remission after 6 months of taking the medicine. In second phase patients, another 90% had some type of a positive reaction, with 63% of 230 patients going into remission.

In recent years CML has been treated through two methods, generally. One procedure is bone marrow transplant, which has potential dangers attached to it. The other is interferon, which can lead to remission for up to about two years but has also carried with it the reputation of causing side effects in 20% of patients using it. Gleevec has produced only minimal side effects, such as nausea, muscle cramps, and fluid retention.

The F.D.A. has also approved Gleevec to be used in the treatment of advanced forms of CML, such as "accelerated phase" and "blast crisis." In the care of "blast crisis" patients, which was once considered virtually untreatable, outstanding progress has been made.

"[M]ost blast crisis patients relapse within months," said Dr. Brian Druker of Oregon Health Sciences University, to CNN.

The fast-acting medication, which, before approval, was only utilized to treat patients who had failed standard therapy, was passed through the F.D.A. for approval equally as quickly, a tribute to the drug's incredible results.

"There are hints cure may be possible," said Druker. "In at least one patient, leukemia cells could not be detected. If those results continue for a year or two, patients could be taken off treatment."

The American Cancer Society reports that approximately 5,000 new cases of CML are diagnosed annually.

Empty coffee pots make kids sleepy at Amherst College; 24-hour caffeine ban draws attention to substance abuse

By Kavan Peterson
Collegian Staff

A temporary caffeine ban at Amherst College Tuesday received national media attention and left some students bleary-eyed and disgruntled.

A 24-hour ban on the sale and distribution of coffee caught the attention of The New York Times and local newspapers but left students questioning the legitimacy of signs adorning their cafeteria:

"The alarming rise in caffeine use and the adverse side effects associated with this drug are seen as a significant public health risk. In order to curb the use of caffeine at Amherst College, the sale and distribution of COFFEE are no longer permitted on campus."

Some students were shocked to find empty coffee pots in Valentine dining hall and Schwemm's Gourmet Coffee House, but they may have been more surprised to learn that the ban was part of an elaborate ruse orchestrated by senior art student, Andrew Epstein.

By banning coffee, Epstein said he hoped to demonstrate the hypocrisy of drug laws that sanction certain substance abuse while banning others. He came up with the plot in an art class called "Social Sculpture," and with the blessing of the administration and student government organization [SGO], he set himself up as the Caffeine Czar of Amherst College.

"Obviously there's hypocrisy in the application of drug policies," Epstein said. "I wanted to raise awareness of this by forcing people to look at their own substance abuse."

To achieve the desired affect, Epstein said that students had to believe the caffeine ban was real. As part of the ruse, Epstein dressed up in a suit and held a press conference for a small group of curious onlookers.

"Today is a great day for Americans who value a drug-free society," Epstein said. "Caffeine is a dangerous stimulant that increases levels of stress and increases health problems."

He went on to describe the many ailments associated with caffeine consumption, including stress, high blood pressure and increased risk of heart disease. Some students booed and demanded their coffee, but others seemed to be in agreement with Epstein.

"I think it's very dangerous," Josh Levy said, a sophomore and a non-coffee drinker, "coffee should be banned."

Another student who admitted he was in on the secret said Epstein's message went to the heart of prohibitive drug policies.

"I think it's ridiculous to try to ban anything," junior Alex Hochron said. "Who is the SGO or campus administration to control what kind of substances I want to put in my body?"

During the press conference, one of Epstein's cohorts asked him why the faculty still had coffee in their dining hall. Epstein's prepared response was, "I guess just like in the real world, illicit drugs are readily available for the privileged only."

Epstein had some unlikely allies in his plot to ban coffee. Along with the dining hall and campus cafe, Epstein got the administration's approval and persuaded the SGO to pass his coffee resolution during a closed-door session. Michelle Oliveros-Larson, junior and student body president, said the resolution passed overwhelmingly.

"We were able to endorse this as an academic project," Oliveros-Larson said. "I don't think he could have done this if he approached us as a political activist."

Epstein is the founder and president of Amherst's chapter of Students for a Sensible Drug Policy. He said that it's hard to get people to listen when he approaches them directly about drug

John P. Walters: the new drug czar

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

In an effort to finally corral the escalating illegal drug problem in the United States, President Bush named conservative John P. Walters to the head of the Office of National Drug Control Policy yesterday. The appointment had been rumored for days and was made official during a Rose Garden Ceremony.

The nomination is subject to Senate confirmation. Mr. Bush also announced his plans to run a series of cabinet reviews of the current federal anti-drug efforts and their effectiveness. He also outright rejected the idea of any drug legalization.

Mr. Walters also served in the administration of George Bush senior, when he was the top deputy to the former drug-policy director, William J. Bennett. Walters is hailed as being supportive of law-and-order punishment policies, including tougher sentences for drug offenders.

He has also said that he favors tough prison sentences for repeat offenders, marijuana smugglers and violent felons.

In the same ceremony, Mr. Bush called on former Princeton professor John DiTulio Jr. to head up a program that would open federal programs to religious and community groups. The goal would be to support anti-drug efforts within federal partnerships in the community.

As the final move in his anti-drug plan, Bush asked Attorney General John Ashcroft to submit a plan that would keep all federal prisons drug-free for 120 days, as well as expand drug testing for criminals. He then looked toward Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson to do a state-by-state inventory of treatment capacity and needs, also within 120 days, and report back to him.

Bush called for an all out attack on drug-traffickers, but at the same time called for compassion and treatment for those Americans who are already addicted.

"The only human and compassionate response to drug use is the moral refusal to accept it," Bush said. "Drug legalization would be a catastrophe...It would completely undermine the message that drug use is wrong." Bush also said that illegal drugs rob people of "innocence and ambition and hope."

"Our country has made great progress in the past reducing drug use, and we will do it again," Walters then said.

The Faculty Senate also passed three motions on General Education, in response to a report distributed and discussed at the last Senate meeting.

Two motions serve to promote general education classes to students.

"Too often we hear students speak of 'getting their gen eds out of the way'," Professor Ralph Faulkingham, co-chair of the General Education Council said.

"The Faculty should be widely informed of the purpose of the program, as well as its specific requirements," the General Education Council report on the motion reads. "We cannot expect students to believe that there is a coherent purpose to requirements if the faculty, as the principle embodiment of the campus's educational mission, do not express this."

The third motion changed the structure of the diversity requirement. All freshmen and transfers, beginning in the Fall of 2002, will have one national diversity requirement and international diversity requirement.

There will be a special meeting on May 17 at 3:30 in Herter 227 to discuss the future of Consumer Studies. According to Frank Hugus, adding extra meetings to deal with issues not resolved in the regular year has become commonplace.

"What happens is if committees and councils don't start with a fresh slate by the time they are ready for the senate it's late in the year? It's one of those things that don't change," Hugus said. "There really is no one cause. In some cases some of the proposals really call for a lot of research, which takes time, and people are very busy. In other cases, members of subcommittees will recuse themselves from projects that deal with their particular programs."

reform, so he hoped that he could get a stronger response by indirectly involving them in his art project.

According to associate professor DeWitt Godfrey, the instructor for "Social Sculpture," contemporary artists now create art out of situations instead of objects. The concept is based on the work of Joseph Beuys, a German artist and founding member of Germany's Green Party.

Beuys believed that art had the capacity to heal the hurts of the world and save humanity, Godfrey said. In his class, Godfrey's students use this concept to create situations in which the public is forced to interact with the artist's message.

"Andrew can do a lot more as an artist, in the context of an art project," Godfrey said. "Even a simple action - taking away coffee - has a powerful impact."

Friends of Epstein were stationed around campus in vans, surreptitiously pushing black market coffee to create a prohibition like environment.

"Hey, you need coffee? I got coffee," said one student, who refused to identify himself to the "narco-media."

After the press conference, Oliveros-Larson said one angry student wanted to sue the SGO for taking such drastic action without addressing the student body. But by the end of the day, Epstein circulated an explanation of his project and student complaints subsided.

"I think it's cool that a lot of people were affected by this and pissed off about it," said Hochrun. "There's too much apathy about this on our campus."

Amherst residents still at odds over location of Civil War memorial

By Jennifer Lodge
Collegian Correspondent

After a two-hour debate, city officials were still at odds over the location and construction of a new Civil War memorial, which would include plaques donated in 1893.

The Amherst Design Review Board and the city Historical Commission are reviewing two possible sites to place six marble plaques honoring residents who served in the Civil War: Gates Lot, across from the police station and a site in front of the Town Hall.

Historical Commission member Linda Faye said her group recommends town hall because the six tablets had been mounted for 30 years inside Town Hall. "The plaques had been moved only to protect them during renovations but now should be returned home," she said.

Amherst resident Dudley Bridges, who originally began the project a year ago, disagrees. "My family has names on that memorial" he said. "We need a special place." He said that special place is Gates Lot, which, directly across from the police station, will be easily watched over and accessible.

But Design Review Board member David Dillon said, Gates Lot is "off the beaten path...there's no reason to make that route and it does a disservice to the importance of these plaques by putting them here." He argued that the plaques should be placed as close to town as possible, and being by the town hall is ideal. As people "walk in and out they would be reminded and they don't have to go out of the way to do it. It's an intricate part of the fabric."

Rod Robinson, director of veteran services, opposes the Town Hall site because it would situate the memorial only a few feet from the sidewalk, where there's no time or quiet to pause and take in the names of those who gave their lives in the war. He echoed resident Ned Marbert's concern, that at Town Hall "there's a hustle and bustle, it's not peaceful."

Robinson also asked the boards to consider adding memorials for veterans of World War I, World War II and the Vietnam War. He said there would be additional plaques "complimentary to the Civil War tablets."

The six tablets, donated in 1895 by a local unit of the Civil War veteran organization, Grand Army of the Republic, have historical and sentimental value. The 300 names include seven local African American men who served in the 54th regiment, the first black regiment. Other names include William S. Clark, co-commander of the American exploration of the Louisiana Purchase, and members of the family of poet Emily Dickinson.

Planning Department member Jonathan Tucker argued that although Gates Lot allowed them to be "all by themselves," at the same time people will be wondering what "this has to do with Emily." "They are too important to have something looming over them, and Gates Lot is in the middle of Emily's turf," he said.

The Select Board will decide the site as early as May. Bridges, began organizing for the Gates Lot a year ago.

"I had everything set. One fellow donated $1,000, the middle school raised $1,000 and a few individuals donated a couple hundred. I went to the richest man in Amherst, Mr. Jones and he said 'anything you need'." Bridges said he'd gathered an architect, builders and laborers willing to work for free and have it done for this spring. Now, he said the project may not be done for another "three to four years" and cost "thousands and thousands of dollars."

But Tucker said the final location doesn't matter because "wherever the Civil War memorial goes it will become an integral part of Amherst."

New questions
Concerning "The Babe"

From back in sports history a provocative question has been given new light recently, a question even the most passionate of fans had never given thought to or made aware of.

Was The Babe black?

A recent article in Sports Illustrated raised that question – if, in fact, Babe Ruth was black – and chased that thought with the following question: Should we care?

We at the Collegian ask the same.

The story surrounding Ruth's suddenly in question ethnicity is based largely on speculation and old stories passed on – derived from sources in his time, such as fellow legend Ty Cobb. Essay author Dan Okrent points to a number of instances that have been noted where Ruth received lesser treatment because of his physical features and dark complexion.

Although most all fans today who look back and reflect upon that golden age of baseball see Ruth for what he was – one of the greats – the idea of his unclear heritage was in question even while he played, and was not a surprising notion to see being passed around at the time.

Who knows how far this research or "investigation" will go into the matter. The question really is, as Sports Illustrated made clear in its headline, should we really care?

The answer: no, we really shouldn't.

Of course the idea of Ruth hailing from a different past than what we all believe is an interesting one, and if something legitimate ever comes from it, it certainly is a newsworthy topic.

However, until that legitimate and clinching piece of evidence comes to light, the idea stands on speculation alone, leaving the media nothing to do but further add to the momentum of publicity.

If Ruth was black, would that change his impact on the game? Would his talents be viewed any differently, his charisma and impact on America's pastime any less? Absolutely not, but that is, sadly, what some people will be looking for. His contributions to the game shouldn't be viewed as those of a white man or a black man. They should simply be viewed as the efforts of a great man – a great athlete – and nothing more.

Since the days of Ruth, our society has changed little in terms of dealing with what is "different." Distorted views of race still exist as they always have, and while acceptance in the sporting world has grown to a degree, the views of those elsewhere may never reach a comfortable level.

The conversation doesn't belong there, though. The sporting world is a place to escape to, not a collection bin for the errors of our culture.

Black, white, red or blue, he's still the Babe, and that's all that matters. Define him by his numbers, not his color.

A temporary resurrection

NATTY YAGUDIN

I grew up in a tiny Northern Israeli village named after an ancient crypt. The crypt still exists as an archeological site about 5 miles away from the modern-day town. The judges of the high court of Israel were buried there hundreds of years ago in a dark cave, before the British, the Turks, and even before the crusaders came.

Living in a place with such a legacy didn't seem to weigh down our lives; tourists were few and far between. We would never go there; of the neighbors I lived with, no one knew who exactly was buried there, when, and why. Except for a ritualistic elementary school visit that everyone made once in their lives, the place was abandoned, the judges forgotten. For a modern Israeli, that would mean suffering a fate worse than death.

The current cemetery has nothing to do with the old one, neither in the feel nor the look of it. Early settlers in the 1930s chose to locate it in an idyllic location among the flat fields of cotton that surrounded the town, after a short mile of dirt road.

Now the cemetery is crunched between rows of red roofed houses that city escapees built. But it is not the only cemetery that suffers from space issues. In Haifa, where one of my grandparents is buried, the cemetery stretches right across from the sea, in an area so attractive for development that now residents are complaining is too much to give up. My cousin always jokes around, saying that the dead could really make some good money selling their real estate.

But then again, where you are buried in Israel is sometimes more important than where you live. The problems that are rearing their head in Haifa are very old news in Jerusalem, where, in some places, you have to pay $100,000 for a grave lot. Jewish gravesites flood the area facing the Temple Mount, where, according to the faith, the messiah will appear. When he does, all the dead will come back to life, starting with the ones that are buried in Jerusalem, right across from where the Temple used to be.

People still pay the price because they want to be buried in the Holy Land. After all, as my cousin says, they are going to stay there for a pretty long time. But I always suspected that there was more to it. Although they were given a hazy concept of heaven and hell, Jews still adhere to very specific burial rituals in the hope that it will pay off in the end.

Perhaps this perception of an active underworld, at least in the minds of the living, was what carried Jews through so much hardship for thousands of years: the Holocaust, wars, famine, disease, and loss. The worst that can happen to you is not death; it is being forgotten. And nowadays, the only way you are not forgotten is by being buried on hot property. Although there is no telling when the messiah will come, in Israel at least you can get yourself some kind of temporary resurrection.

A corrupt politician? Not a big surprise

KEN CAMPBELL

Show me a politician speaking the truth and I'll show you somebody who made a deal with the United States Attorney.

The latest tryst in our happy little love nest known as Washington DC concerns Ohio representative James Traficant, an outspoken Democrat known for his loud suits and even louder commentaries against, amongst other things, the United States Justice Department.

Which just isn't a good idea when you're the target of a Justice Department investigation centering around whether or not you accepted bribes, used staffers as farm hands and took kick backs for contracts. Traficant got indicted for a variety of charges, including racketeering.

So?

This is where my Republican friends will get all upset, because I'm going to be saying some good things about a Democrat.

Traficant didn't hurt anybody – he hasn't killed anyone and hasn't sexually assaulted anyone. He hasn't lied to my face, and that counts for something. Supposedly, Traficant had his staffers fix fences and bale hay on his farm. Having worked on political campaigns, I can understand the farm work. These campaigns are packed with pasty folks – myself included – who could use a few days of hard physical labor to get their blood flowing.

As for accepting bribes and kickbacks for contracts? I bet those jobs went to folks in his district, and fed some families along the way as well.

I'm from Massachusetts. I expect my politicians to be crooked. I prefer them that way. I know I'm getting screwed by the government, and it comforts me to know that somebody in DC is screwing them back. Look at the Big Dig – Teddy got us the money to start that thing, and now most eastern construction workers will be employed for the next 15 years or however long it will take to finish the damn thing. Politicians are a dime a dozen, literally, and they're all pretty much cut from the same bolt of star-spangled cloth, with a few policy disagreements thrown in for your CSPAN viewing pleasure.

If Traficant was from Rhode Island or Massachusetts, this wouldn't have come as a surprise to everybody. Tremont Street is straighter than most state politicians. This is the state that produced James Curley, Billy Bulger and Teddy Kennedy. Hell, Teddy killed a girl, and nobody's ever talked about kicking him out of office.

This whole thing strikes me as very convenient. When Traficant broke party lines and voted for a Republican House Speaker, the Dems basically disowned him. Traficant used to bad mouth Janet Reno and her ATF thugs all the time. This is payback.

But I really hope Traficant beats this rap, much like he beat the one 18 years ago on similar charges.

The reason is simple: our prisons are rapidly filling up. If we start throwing dirty politicians in jail, Rhode Island will find it easier to just put up barbed wire fences around the state and Beacon Hill might as well build guard towers.

Let's leave Traficant alone. After all, he's providing valuable jobs for his district at rock bottom prices. Shop around, and you won't find a cheaper kick back than Crazy Jimmy's Ohio House of Government Deals. His farm? It's not slave labor; it's an out-of-office health program. See? Everybody benefits. Some just benefit more than others.

And isn't that the American way?

WILL AND ABE'S GUIDE TO RESTAURANTS
FEATURING THE CHALLENGE OF CROPTHEIR
THERE'S MANY DIFFERENT KINDS OF RESTAURANTS, SUSHIBUY, FANCY REGALIA, AND FAST-FOOD.
AND TASTY!
FAST-FOOD RESTAURANTS HAVE PIZZA, HAMBURGER OR CHICKEN. IT'S CALLED FAST FOOD BECAUSE IT DOESN'T TAKE THAT LONG TO ORDER. THEY'RE ALREADY MADE, AND THEY'RE LIKE A LITTLE BIT GOOEY.
PIZZA RESTAURANTS ARE USUALLY SMALL AND HAVE COUNTERS. A LOT OF PIZZA RESTAURANTS DO SOME REALLY NICE THINGS WITH MONEY. THING TO GIVE THEM GOOD LUCK – MONEY TAPED ON THE WALL THAT FRIENDS GIVE.
WATCH OUT FOR TOO-HOT PIZZA! ONE TIME I THINK I WAS COMING OUT OF ABE'S MOUTH IT WAS SO HOT!
IT WAS HOT! AND TASTY!
MY FAVORITE KIND OF PIZZA IS CHEESE AND ALSO PEPPERONI!
MY FAVORITE KIND OF PIZZA IS PIZZA!
SWANKY RESTAURANTS USUALLY HAVE A JUNGLE OR BEACH THEME, WITH LITTLE LIKE KID CHARACTERS, AND FAKE BIRDS HANGING DOWN. WE EAT BURGERS THERE. IT'S JUST LIKE FAST FOOD, ONLY A LOT OF DETAILS.
AT MEXICAN RESTAURANTS YOU SHOULD ORDER QUESADILLAS AND HORCHATA. HORCHATA IS A RICE DRINK WITH BROWN SUGAR THAT'S SO SWEET IT'S LIKE SUGAR WITH MILK AND A LITTLE KICK.
IT'S SWEET AND TASTY!
CHINESE AND JAPANESE RESTAURANTS ARE CONFUSING. FANCY RESTAURANTS: THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN CHINESE AND JAPANESE IS THAT CHINESE IS SORT OF LIKE STEAMY AND SORT OF MESSY, SORT OF.
THE FOOD OR THE RESTAURANT?
BOTH!
BY JAPANESE THEY HAVE BRAND GOOD TERIYAKI CHICKEN MIXED IN WITH SAUCE. WE LIKE EATING WITH CHOPSTICKS. IT'S DOWN THERE. PICK UP LIKE A SHOVEL, AND CHOMP!
NO, I LIKE FORKS!
WITH FORKS, IT'S VERY SIMPLE. JUST DOWN, UP, IN, DOWN, UP, IN. WITH CHOPSTICKS, IT'S DOWN, THERE. PICK UP LIKE A SHOVEL, AND CHOMP!
FANCY RESTAURANTS USUALLY HAVE SEAFOOD WITH FISH AND SHRIMP AND A LOT OF OTHER DELICACIES LIKE CLAMS AND OYSTER. AND IF THERE'S A CHICKEN-FANCY RESTAURANT, THEY'LL GIVE YOU A WHOLE BIG CHUNK OF CHICKEN, NOT JUST A DRUMSTICK.
I ATE DRUMSTICKS ONCE.
KIDS, IF YOU DON'T LIKE FISH, WATCH OUT FOR A SIGN OF A BEACH WITH A SMILING FISH ON IT, OR A FISH WITH A MEXICAN HAT. THING ON IT? WHATEVER. YOU DO, DON'T GO IN THERE!
KIDS MENUS AREN'T AS GOOD AS GROWN-UPS' MENUS. THEY DON'T HAVE AS GOOD SELECTION. THE GROWN-UPS HAVE PAGES AND PAGES AND THE KIDS HAVE ONLY ONE OR ONE HALF PAGE!
AND THE NAMES OF THE DISHES ARE REALLY BAD, LIKE SMILEY THE FISH! IF YOU ORDER SMILEY THE FISH, YOU GET A FISHSTICK, AND THEY PUT BALONEY IN TO MAKE IT LOOK LIKE IT'S SMILING, AND AN EGG IN WHERE ITS EYE WOULD BE.
THE WORST THING YOU COULD ORDER IN A RESTAURANT IS FROGS' LEGS! ALSO, WATCH OUT FOR MISTAKING BARBECUE SAUCE FOR KETCHUP! IT SMELLS BAD! IT SMELLS BERRY! AND IT WILL GIVE YOUR FRIES!
IT'S DEFINITELY NOT TASTY!

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

BRIAN MCALLISTER

Kick ass....I finally get to write one of these puppies. To top it off, this is the last Campus Center notes of the semester. There's a long history of good comedy here...

...You're waiting for the comedy, aren't you?

Let's begin with a story. Like all good stories, this one starts with a little freshman kid named Victor.

Saw a special on Lil' Bow Wow on MTV the other day. Then, Ice Tea introduced his son, Lil' Ice. Now – what if Ice Cube has a son? Will he have to be Lil' Cube? Aren't cubes, by nature, pretty Lil'? These are the things I worry about. By the way, next on MTV: Lil' Steely Dan.

If I could marry anyone famous, it would be Gwen Stefani. Did I say Gwen Stefani? I meant Moby.

My greatest accomplishment at UMass is, clearly, retrieving a Sprite bottle from a campus vending machine. I'll tell you the story. I pushed the Sprite button, and I heard the bottle come down. But then it got stuck. So I had an idea. I reached my hand up and got the Sprite from under the flap. Then I drank the Sprite. The lesson to be gained here is that Sprite is the taste of the Next Generation.

I created a new drink: 1/2 cup tomato juice, 1/2 cup puke, 1/2 cup lemon juice, 1/2 cup vodka. It's called the "Troy O'Leary."

I get to write a senior column next week, and I'll probably rant and rave and blush and gush over all the things I'll miss about UMass. Truth is, I'm really missing one thing: The Goat Trail. Man, all the memories! I remember that time I was walking down the Goat Trail going to class. I remember that time I was walking down the Goat Trail, going to withdraw money from the ATM. That was good times. There was this little squirrel that ran away when I walked by it. And then my friend, Tobias, said to me, "There aren't even any GOATS on the Goat Trail!" Boy, was Tobias witty!

I hope you daaaaaaaaance....I hope you daaaaaaaance....

My favorite commercial on the radio: We've got it naughty and nice! At Bookends! We've got it naughty and nice! At Bookends! Ok, who's ordering the nice? Cause it's not me...

NEVER live in Sunderland. Ever.

I'm probably the best hitter of all time in Triple Play 2001, or as it's known in hidden circles, Triple Play Baseball. Give me the Red Sox versus any team, I'll bust out about 25 hits and at least 10 runs. In real life, I have a career .092 batting average. I think this proves that technology is good, and nature – nature is evil.

Speaking of that, does anyone else have this disturbing feeling that the U.S. is seriously going downhill? It's almost like a Behind the Music episode. Big, hard-working country becomes the most powerful empire in the world.... empire gets too egotistical and arrogant and materialistic.... empire collapses into a bevy of drugs, drinking, sex, chaos, and destruction. That's why I'm fleeing the country until we reach the sex part.

I couldn't possibly write a column of random thoughts without including something about movies. My predictions for the best movies of the summer: Moulin Rouge, A.I., and Pearl Harbor. I know. I know – Michael Bay is the antichrist. But once you admit that, it seems like it might be fun.

I'm leaving for Europe in exactly 18 days. I'd just like to say that. Viva la Italia!

Other final countdowns: New REM album: 4 days. Graduation: 16 days. Me, lounging in my room, missing college, playing Super Baseball Simulator 1000 on Super Nintendo, working at some dumb job: All summer.

Hip-Hop comes to Northampton

Cappadonna twists darts from the heart

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

CAPPADONNA
Pearl Street
May 9

He assured everyone that his focus wasn't toward legal tender.

"...It's not for the money, it's for the love," he said, mixing some sincerity into his final freestyle of the night.

Draped with his customary gold medallion, dressed in a white polo shirt emblazoned with "Sandals (Resort) Montego Bay," Cappadonna stepped onto Pearl Street's first floor stage, grabbed the microphone and broke immediately into verse at about 9:30 Wednesday night.

For those unfamiliar with the Jay Bird – Cappadonna is the tenth and final "official" member of the Wu-Tang Clan. He wasn't around for the Wu's first album, Enter the Wu-Tang: 36 Chambers, but was featured on the majority of tracks from the Clan's second release, the two-disc Wu-Tang Forever. On the Wu's final record, The W, Cappuccino is accepted without the "featured" accreditation.

Wednesday's performance in Northampton was just one of the many stops on the promotion tour for his new album, The Ying and the Yang, an 11-track release which features his colleagues Ghostface Killah, The RZA, Raekwon and others such as Da Brat and Jermaine Dupri. Remedy, a Wu-affiliate who is also featured on the album, was on the show's ticket but did not show up.

An LP with lots of emotion – Cappadonna claims – The Ying and the Yang sneaks away from the Wu's typical style.

"In the mist of all the other hard core hip-hop, I just gave you something to think about," he said, his capped teeth shining. "Remember, it's for the love."

Cappadonna released his first album, The Pillage, in March of 1998.

"That's when I was selling crack, son," he said, referring to the time in his life The Pillage presents. "I can't do that again. If I go to jail who's going to feed my 2, uh ... 1 babies."

But only statements like that added some entertainment to a rather monotonous night – because the show's arm-pumping pinnacle only lasted for about 20 to 30 minutes, the first 20 to 30 minutes.

In that span, Cappadonna performed parts of songs such as "C.R.E.A.M. (Cash Rules Everything Around Me)" and freestyled over other old joints such as "Shame on a Na." He also dropped verses from Raekwon's "Incarcerated Scarfaces" and "Ice Cream."

But for the next 40 minutes, the crowd of about 100 settled down to a slow head bob. The DJ played instrumentals for the majority of that duration, and Cappadonna's three friends tried to freestyle over them.

"Slang Editorial" and "Run," tracks from Cappadonna's first album, interrupted the freestyle barrage a bit, but Cappadonna shouldn't have let two of the three extras touch a microphone. At points, even, Jay Bird had to cut off the freestyle disasters from chanting "Hip-Hop, Hip-Hop," in excess.

Things got a little better later in night when Cappadonna spit "Camay," a love song from Ghostface's Ironman.

"You need a good wife on your side to survive," he said before the song. "Or else you'll be digging for mud." There are a lot of good women out there, Cappadonna continued. "I mean Mom-dukes ain't no ho."

After dropping the tracks "Supermodel," "War Rats," "Big Business," and "The Grits" from his new album, he continued with a "Shimmy Shimmy Ya" dedication to incarcerated Clan member Ol' Dirty Bastard.

"No pussy for ODB," Cappadonna said. "So this one's for Ol' Dirty."

"All I Need," a song by Method Man and Mary J. Blige followed the Ol' Dirty salute and the song set finished with "Wu Tang Clan Ain't Nothing Ta F' Wit." During these songs, Cappadonna and his crew rapped along, skipping words, of course, in the process.

For the next hour, anyone who could freestyle was allowed to go on stage and do so. Cappadonna just stepped to the back of the stage. One local who went up was impressive, but listening to freestyles really gets old after a while. A condensed version of this show, with only Cappadonna's performances, would have been just fine. Instead, it dragged.

One fellow who stepped up told Cappadonna that his birthday was on Thursday, and the Clan member responded by singing him the "Happy Birthday" song.

"Happy Birthday," he said laughing. "That's how we used do it at McDonald's."

Pharcyde lacking the spirit of better past

By Sam Wilkinson

PHARCYDE with
UGLY DUCKLING
Pearl Street
May 7

"I want to hear "Runnin'" but I don't want to hear any of that new shit."
—Fan before show

Pharcyde was the hope of a stagnant rap scene. The weird hooks, the strange rhymes, the eclectic videos: it was the total package. Like an early 90s OutKast from the west coast, Pharcyde's unique approach to hip-hop kept a creative vibe flowing through the veins of a body that consisted mostly of macho braggadocio.

But internal strife killed all of that. The promise, the talent, the outlook – all of it was gone by their last album, Plain Rap. Fatlip has left the band, releasing his own album about the pain of talent gone to waste. Perhaps Pharcyde should pay heed. Their last album felt forced and rarely captured any of the magic of their previous two. That vibe followed the band to Pearl Street last Monday night.

After the poorly received Ugly Duckling (see related story) introduced the group, Pharcyde hit the stage, full of energy, louder than loud and bouncing all over the place. The crowd was ready for the show, but Pharcyde found a way to deliver a very brief hour-long set that was almost totally devoid of any soul. It just didn't matter how much they were willing to jump on the stage or, apparently it was comedic, stir Massachusetts. With the exception of the conga player, nobody had any soul, like it the room itself had been empty, they would have performed the same way.

When they encouraged the crowd to participate, it was to give themselves a breather, not include the fans. When they brought fans on stage to sing and then refused to finish the song because they forgot the lyrics, it was downright depressing. Pharcyde was going through the motions in a club that was smaller than anything they should have been playing at, had it not fallen apart for them.

And while songs from the first two albums were big hits, "Drop" from Labincabincalifornia popped the crowd only because people seemed to recognize it. Unfortunately for the Pharcyde, hip-hop went sprinting away from them, and when Plain Rap was, by all accounts, a total failure, the Pharcyde fans didn't keep up with the band. It reduced Monday night's performance to sheer novelty, like going to see an Allman Brothers Band concert. Nobody wants to hear anything new; they want to hear "Jessica" or in Pharcyde's case, "Drop." To further frustrate, when asked if the crowd was supportive of Pharcyde back in 1992, when Bizarre Ride II The Pharcyde was first released, the crowd of mostly twenty-year-olds readily agreed that they did an unlikely truth from a crowd wanting to get into the novelty. If Pharcyde was going to play the old stuff, then by God, they'd been there for it.

Pharcyde played some of their hits. "Ya Mama" brought down the house and the fun from the beginning of the article got his wish when they played "Runnin'." "Soulflower (Remix)" and their absolutely definitive hit, "Passing Me By" got there just in time as well, but when a band has to ask the crowd if they want to hear the 'new stuff,' the show isn't going well. When Pharcyde wasn't playing the hits, the crowd simply stood and watched, seeing a band that didn't care about its performance, and when Pharcyde tried the new material, the crowd stood idly, wanting something more.

Something that Pharcyde lost a long time ago and barring some unforeseen event, something they aren't going to get back.

Ugly Duckling chills before embarking for UK

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Andycat (Andy Cooper) is sitting with his back against a wall after his 45-minute set with Ugly Duckling. Next to the bar outside the main room at Pearl Street, fans are coming up and shaking hands, dropping compliments, stoking his almost non-existent ego. He smiles at that.

It's the sixth time Ugly Duckling has been in the area; cat and Co. played a show in Cambridge last year with the Deltron 3030 crew (Del, Dan the Automator and Kid Koala) and has been around here with the Long Beach Dub All-Stars. They've played Worcester a "few times" according to cat. Yet for such incessant touring, for such an unbelievable work ethic, the crowd stood around, barely getting into the abridged Duckling set.

"Yeah, it started off slow, but by the end the crowd seemed to be into it," cat confirmed. The crowd hardly seemed to care, barely popping early for the Duckling's fourth member (an eight pound gold rope), or their "two-hand band," DJ Einstein. "Everybody really got into it later on and everybody's been really nice."

He shouldn't have to be so grateful for so little, but he is. When the manager of the club shows up and offers him a drink, he sheepishly says he doesn't drink, but then thanks the manager anyway for being so nice. He thanks the fans that come up to him to compliment him. He thanked the crowd after his performance.

"We get a good response in Cambridge," cat says. He doesn't want to acknowledge the crowd that just wasn't ready for anything but a Pharcyde medley of greatest hits. The Duckling's definitively old-school flavor (including an extended lecture about the importance of hip-hop and the stupidity of a lot of the image that surrounds it) was playing to a crowd that only celebrated the message when cat danced to a modified version of Michael Jackson's "Bad," mocking the people who are more into the image of the music than the music itself. Poignantly, cat observed that most of those people might be from Worcester, but they definitely weren't from the Bronx.

Part of the Duckling's shtick is its adherence to some sort of old-school approach to the music. It wants the music to be fun; it wants the fans to have fun. They're almost begging when they sing, "...don't believe the jewelry/ don't believe BET/ don't believe MTV..." Who's listening though, especially in an era where the media is endorsing the rapper with the most cars, the rapper with the most iced wrists? Maybe it is the Duckling's relative inexperience.

After at least three years of almost ceaseless touring, recently with critically acclaimed performers like Deltron 3030 (who might have released last year's most under-appreciated album) and Pharcyde this past Monday night, cat says the band is still learning.

"How to perform, how to work a show. I looked up to these groups when I was growing up," says cat. Of course, Nelly never really had to work to release one song that got suddenly huge and popular. Andycat seems to be learning that no matter how hard he works, sometimes the effort just isn't appreciated. He has to shout over Pharcyde, whose performance is wicked professional, but lacks something. Soul maybe. And while cat is appreciative of the support Ugly Duckling gets on the East Coast, he doesn't indicate that he will miss it when he's gone.

"We're going to Europe this summer. We've got a bigger following over there, so we're going to play some clubs, some festivals," cat says. Security's brought a man out of the bathroom and has laid him on the floor. He's had too much to drink or too much to smoke and he's paying for it. "We're hoping to spend the whole summer there."

He shakes his fist at an attendant and says he had to "knock him out." He's smiling, trying to enjoy himself, but he'll be happier when he gets out of Northampton and that won't be a bad thing for him; he'll hopefully find a crowd that cares. For the rest of the night, he sits with his back against that wall, trying to hawk t-shirts or CDs. He only smiles when he's approached.

Oil painting exhibition pits surreal against literal

By Julie Burrell
Collegian Staff

Mathew Margolis and Michael Ellis are roommates with similar mediums, but different philosophies. Both art students, they will be presenting their senior thesis exhibitions beginning this weekend.

"I'm interested in the aesthetic of thought," says Margolis, who is graduating with a BFA and has been painting for ten years. His favorite medium, and the one in which he currently works, is oil painting. The artist classifies his body of exhibition work, entitled "Set Ups," as surrealism, but he paints from life.

Though he is interested in thought, he describes his still life not as meditative, as thought might imply, but engaging.

Margolis cites the band Tool as one of his influences. Though they may not be specifically referenced, the feeling and mood of the paintings are affected by the music.

Another piece of pop culture that sneaks into his work is a plastic figurine that he picked up at Newbury Comics – it has become the main character in his work.

"It's easy for the viewer to identify with, it has a generic quality," says Margolis of the figure. He uses this human representation instead of a real person so that the figure does not become "about a particular human being." Instead, "It's a symbol."

He describes the ideas in his paintings as extending to both the personal and the philosophical.

Michael Ellis, on the other hand, is all about simplicity.

Ellis entered UMass as a graphic design major, but soon found his niche in painting, which he made official his sophomore year. He also majors in Art History.

He describes the theme of his work as "a love for the everyday."

His medium is oil paint on wood, and some of his pencil drawings will also be on exhibition. His work, he says, is "grounded in the tradition of realism."

The "everyday" that Ellis captures differs in subject. He paints landscapes, interiors, UMass landscapes, and self-portraits. There isn't one common subject theme, but it is the light, composition and color that catch his eye.

His influences include Corot, Vermeer and Hulbein, for the light and feeling their work has. Fairfield Porter is another major inspiration. "He paints about normal things, the ordinary," says Ellis. Considering the everyday subjects of his paintings, it's easy to see the connection between Porter and Ellis.

"I hope to do this for the rest of my life," says Ellis.

These oil painters will present their differing approaches to art together. Mathew Margolis' "Set Ups" and Michael Ellis' Exhibition will be on view in the Student Union Gallery, beginning on May 13. Both will have an opening reception at 4 p.m. on that date.

Tony nods cite Producers, Sinise

Nathan Lane and Matthew Broderick star in The Producers.

COURTESY OF MARK LENNIHAN

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

When the 2001 Antoinette Perry Awards for Theatrical Excellence (better known as The Tonys) are given out, the Daily Collegian will already have closed up shop for the summer. Yet in a year where there have been so many excellent and progressive steps in the theatrical world, it would be unfair to give no mention of this season's awards to the students and faculty of UMass.

On May 7th, Reba McEntire (starring in Annie Get Your Gun) and Liz McCormack (taking over in The Music Man) both excited and upset the Broadway community with their announcement the nominations for the 55th Annual Tonys, taking place at Radio City Music Hall on June 3. (Sorry, folks, the award ceremony sold out the day it went on sale.)

Enthusiasm coursed through the crowd when underdog shows like Jane Eyre: The Musical and A Class Act were up for the more prestigious awards of the ceremony like Best New Musical, Best Score, and Best Director. It was expected, too, that The Full Monty: The Musical would garner some nods, as well as the Mel Brooks musical The Producers (based on his 1968 film of the same title). But not even Yogurt himself could have predicted that the show would lead the pack with 15 nominations, including Best New Musical, Best Score, Best Director and BOTH of its leads in the Best Leading Actor category (Nathan Lane and Matthew Broderick). To many, it looks like The Producers will do to this years Tonys what Titanic did to the 1997 Oscars: a complete sweep, obliterating any other candidate's chances at taking home the gold. After such a positive resurgence of theatre this year, it could be considered a shame that The Producers, while a hell of a good production, will overshadow anything else that dares to go up against it.

Perhaps the biggest surprise and disappointment is the absence of Seussical: The Musical from the event – it only acquired one nomination for Best Actor, Kevin Chamberlain, who plays Horton the Elephant. It's a plain shame that his far-from-noteworthy performance is the only trace of Seussical that will be represented. More appropriate would have been a nomination for Janine LaManna as Gertrude McFuzz, or David Shiner's stellar performance as The Cat In The Hat (he has since left the show, being replaced with gymnast Cathy Rigby). The most painful exemption is Stephen Flaherty's marvelous score and Lynn Ahrens' fabulous lyrics. Both are totally neglected.

The shows up for Best Revival of a Musical are more evenhanded. There is the pop culture nomination (The Rocky Horror Show), the cultish Sondheim fare (Follies) and the obligatory theatre "standards" (42nd Street and Bells Are Ringing, both of whose female leads, Christine Ebersol and Faith Prince, respectively, are up for Tonys). It's six-of-one, half-a-dozen of another in this category; they're all worthy contenders in the most heated match of the evening.

Certainly, The Tonys don't consist only of musicals. The plays that are up for grabs share a similar trend to the aforementioned musicals. There's King Hedley II, which recently took on board the awesome talent of Brian Stokes Mitchell (Ragtime), alongside The Allergist's Wife, Proof and the Tom Stoppard crowd-pleaser, The Invention of Love.

Of chief joy was the nomination for Gary Sinise's jaw-dropping, tour-de-force performance in the revival of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. Up against him are the likes are the aforementioned Mitchell, Richard Easton for The Invention of Love, and both Sean Campion and Conleth Hill for Stones In His Pockets. Sinise, however, is a shoe-in; his Hollywood crossover appeal will definitely help him out. Similarly, Mary Louise-Parker for Proof and Juliette Binoche for The Betrayal will more than likely go head-to-head, but Leading Actress in a Play has always been a deadlock, and it looks like this year is no exception.

Director Jack O'Brien is the Steven Soderbergh of the Tonys this year: he's up for two awards, one for the musical The Full Monty and the other for the play The Invention of Love. It's more a curse than a blessing, though, because with a competitor like Susan Stroman, who is the new Julie Taymor of Broadway so it seems, O'Brien is facing an uphill battle.

It seems apparent that the Tonys will come down to one thing: prestige. The positive responses and big box office take of The Producers will result in a sweep so grand it will leave Broadway buffs' heads spinning. Broadway no longer seems to be a place for new talent to emerge, but current superstars to blossom (like Sinise). Shows like Seussical: The Musical and Jane Eyre: The Musical, could have easily conquered had it been better timing, plain and simple.

No one can predict when a theatre season is going to be full of vigor like this one, or dormant like it was in 1998 (cue crickets). What The Producers and The Full Monty: The Musical will usher in, however (in addition to more screen-to-stage adaptations, I'm sure) is a renewed enthusiasm for the theatre, a jolt of adrenaline to one of society's most celebrated art forms. When there are so many upsides to take note of, it no longer matters who wins and loses.

Who will get the chance to meet Lord Stanley? Well...

Brady's Bracket

Well, I have to be happy with my performance in the second round. Three out of three so far with the final TBD after the Pens-Sabes game. Either way, I can't finish behind my counterpart for the second consecutive round. My Devils made it interesting, of course, but the mullet will grow on. (I am not cutting my hair until they're done from the playoffs.) With that said, here are my Conference Finals predictions.

If Pittsburgh wins:

#1 New Jersey Devils vs. #6 Pittsburgh Penguins

The Devs had all they could handle of the Leafs, and were outplayed in at least three of the games. Culo was phenomenal in net, and the stifling Leaf defense kept the big scorers silent for most of the series.

But in the final two contests, the big men stepped it up facing elimination. The big line of Patrik Elias, Petr Sykora, and Jason Arnott came alive, with Elias being the difference between victory and defeat in both games. Scott Stevens found his game again and the Leafs were done.

But the Devils defense was shaky for the second consecutive series and Brodeur looked as sharp as a spoon until Games Six and Seven. This deep in the playoffs, there is no such room for error, especially when facing a winner like Mario Lemieux.

Lemieux carried the team on his back for the second round, but the story has really been the play of Johan Hedberg and the second line of Alexei Kovalev, Martin Straka, and Robert Lang. Of course, Mario and Jaromir Jagr are distracting much of the attention from their opponents, that opening things for the second line a little more.

The bottom line is, the Pens are not as talented as the Leafs are, and the champs made it out of that series alive despite not playing their best hockey. If they get all three major lines going at once, Hedberg will be having nightmares. Give Mario a couple of wins because he's Mario.

Prediction: Devils in six.

If Buffalo wins.

#1 New Jersey Devils vs. #5 Buffalo Sabres

The Sabes continue to impress and silence their critics. Hasek is still Hasek, but everyone thought that without Michael Peca, this team would collapse.

The forwards have been brilliant for Buffalo throughout the playoffs. These are guys who step up to the task – gritty players like Chris Gratton, Doug Gilmour and Stu Barnes.

The scoring has been balanced, though and the Sabes defense has performed up to the task of stopping one of the greatest players in NHL history.

Unfortunately, the Sabres are no match for the talent of the Devils. They do, however, have someone who can stop the big boys in the Dominator. Mind you, Culo played phenomenally in the series with the keeper's of Lord Stanley's hardware and still got beaten. It will take an unprecedented performance for Hasek to shut down the Devils, and the Sabes offense is not skilled enough to penetrate the Devs defense.

Prediction: Devils in six.

#1 Colorado Avalanche vs. #4 St. Louis Blues

Coming into the playoffs, no one would even give the Blues a chance. But they have played some amazing hockey as of late, and they zipped by last year's Western Conference champs like they were standing still.

Pierre Turgeon has finally shaken the playoff monkey off his back and the Blues have plenty of other options up front, such as Scott Young, Pavol Demitra and Marty Reasoner.

They still have two of the best defensemen in the league in Al MacInnis and Chris Pronger, and those two can shut down offenses while contributing in the offensive zone at the same time.

Roman Turek told his critics to "talk to the hand" in the first round and in the second , he sent Belfour and the Stars packing by playing as good as he ever has between the pipes.

On the other side, the top team in the West is reeling. Joe Sakic's shoulder is yet to heal, Ray Bourque is aching, Patrick Roy is suffering from a little red light sunburn and now Peter Forsberg is done for the remainder of the playoffs after having his spleen removed.

Credit the Kings for going seven games with such a talented team. Credit Felix Potvin for keeping them at bay for more than eight consecutive periods between Games Four and Seven. Credit them for keeping the Tanche out of the Stanley Cup Finals.

If both teams were equally healthy and rested, this would be a tremendous battle. But the Blues have had a week off while the Avs have been fighting for their playoff lives, and the Blues are healthy while the Avs are beginning to look more like a hospital ward than a hockey team.

Prediction: Blues in six.

Sacco's Selections

I don't really give a ding dang that I am only 20 years old and still in college. When It comes to hockey I am 100 percent oldschool. So being a Ranger fan to the bone and a supporter of the original six, all the Devils did in those fateful seven games against the Leafs is fuel my utter hatred for their entire organization.

To say that I despise the Devils would be an absolute understatement. So in this round I am going to do myself a big favor: I am going to pick them to go to the Stanley Cup finals.

If the Sabres win:

#1 New Jersey vs. #5 Buffalo

If the Devils draw the Sabres in the next round Larry Robinson will be smiling. The New Jersey coach loves playing hard nosed, rugged hockey in which he can just continuously roll out all four of his lines. So if that is the type of hockes the Sabres decide to play then they may be done in five.

New Jersey is easily the deepest team in the Eastern Conference, especially when playoff time rolls around and Randy McKay decides that he is good.

The Devils are much like the Red Wings were during their two straight cup wins and in terms of strategy Robinson is much like Scotty Bowman. Bowman got his team through the playoffs by playing four lines equally for the majority of the game. Obviously in crunch time guys like Yzerman, Shanahan and Fedorov were on the ice but for 30 minutes each game Kirk Maltby would see the same amount of ice time as the Wings captain. By doing this Bowman kept his players fresh and healthy from the first round all the way to the finals.

The Devils conduct their business in much the same manner. They have two lines of pure guns with players like Patrick Elias, Scott Gomez and Alexander Mogilny. But then they have two more lines of guys who simply step up in the playoffs. Randy McKay is all of a sudden a sniper, while Sergei Nemchinov used some kind of chemical to make his hands soft. When those two guys are buttering the nets on your third line then you know your team is running well.

The Sabres are a fairly deep team as well, especially the way they have been playing in the postseason. In fact, the Sabres are in many ways a mirror image of the Devils, except their players aren't as good.

The variable is Hasek. He has not yet shown his dominant side and it he decides to then , the Sabres could win a game or two.

Prediction: Devils in 6

If the Penguins win

#1 New Jersey vs. #6 Pittsburgh

All things stay the same for the Devils. The Penguins need a dominant performance from Lemieux, Jagr and Kovalev. The first two superstars tend to get whines when they are met with a physical defense but Kovalev has proven that he can dominate the Devils no matter what they do to stop him.

The Russian has probably the best wrist shot in hockey. Sorry Sakic, but anybody who can score neatside, top shelf on six-foot plus Olaf Kolzig deserves my vote. If Kovalev has a big series along with the other two moaners than the Penguins could make it a series.

Prediction: they won t in 6.

#1 Colorado vs. #4 St. Louis

There are so many "ifs" in this series it's frightening. If Peter Forsberg wasn't done, it St. Louis hadn't swept, if the Avs hadn't played seven then I would be so looking forward to this series.

But instead the Blues have every conceivable edge heading into it and they may just leave as the Western Conference champs. The Blues are on an absolute role and I could care less how old the Stars are, St. Louis simply dominated them.

Roman Turek thinks that he is God, and Al MacInnis is making every goalie look mortal with his Mach I slapshot. Chris Pronger is as mean as ever and the Blues have more talented forwards than Hugh Heffner has women.

I know that Colorado is the favorite and believe me, I know that they still have Raymond Bourque, Rob Blake, Milan Hejduk, Chris Drury and Joe Sakic. But Forsberg is honestly the best player in hockey and without him the Avs have no No 2 centerman.

St. Louis is tough and talented up front with Keith Tkachuk and Scott Young while Pierre Turgeon may be on his way to a Conn Smythe trophy.

Prediction: Blues in six.

Soccer skulls prove toughness

By Megan Mitchell
Badger Herald (U. Wisconsin)

(U-WIRE) MADISON, Wis. – Despite rumors that hitting soccer balls with your head, called heading, causes brain damage, a study conducted at the University of North Carolina found you can keep on heading.

Doctors from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill School of Medicine recently researched whether or not heading a soccer ball can cause injury to a player.

Their study indicates that using this method of passing the ball is not as dangerous as once believed.

The study shows that purposely heading a ball does not cause as much injury as accidental injuries including players banging their heads together or falling and hitting their heads on the ground.

David Bernhardt, an associate professor of pediatrics and sports medicine at University of Wisconsin Hospital, said the study's findings are correct.

"It's not heading that usually leads to head injuries," Bernhardt said. "It's very unusual to see ball versus head injuries."

Bernhardt said UNC's research, along with separate data collected from studies performed by Pennsylvania State University, show no change in brain function after head-ball collisions.

"They showed no change in neuropsych scores based on heading frequency," Bernhardt said.

One factor that contributes to the protection against injuries is how soccer players are trained to hit the ball with their heads.

"Make sure they can do it with the proper technique and with strength," Bernhardt said. "I coach my kids; most try to do it with the easier [opportunity]."

Teaching the proper way to head a ball is common in youth soccer leagues. UW junior Todd Sharon has played soccer for 14 years and said that one of the fundamentals taught to him was how to head the ball correctly.

"They said to hit it on the forehead, actually the hairline," Sharon said. "We spent a lot of time practicing it."

Older players in high school and college soccer with more experience in heading typically use heading more often.

"It was assumed that you knew how to head the ball when you got older," Sharon said.

UW junior Jill Cousino, veteran soccer player for 13 years, said that her coaches were not concerned with a debate between injuries and heading a ball.

"People didn't believe it," Cousino said. "No one ever told us not to. Our coaches never said not to head the ball. We practiced headers a lot in high school."

Head injuries attributed to playing soccer have been more commonly found in other collisions.

Injuries such as lacerations as well as concussions can be attributed to more accidental contact between a player's head and other objects.

The Massachusetts baseball team isn't looking to slide back in the Atlantic 10 standings.

Post-season concentration

Baseball hosts Xavier; needs one to advance

By Matt Despres
Collegian Staff

For the Massachusetts baseball team, this weekend – in which it plays a three game series against Atlantic 10 foe Xavier – concentrates a season's worth of struggles and success into a two-day span that, depending on the outcome, can thrust it into the spotlight or essentially put a cap on the 2001 season.

The Minutemen (23-17, 13-6 A-10) are coming off of a powerful week, in which they swept a three-game series against conference rival St. Joseph's, moving them into a tie with Temple for first place in the A-10. That recent success puts them in a prime position to grab the conference's top spot in the tournament this weekend in Ohio. UMass needs only one victory against the Musketeers (21-31, 8-11 A-10) to gain admittance into the four team field.

If head coach Mike Stone and Co. can continue the torrid pace they have been on, the Xavier series should be theirs for the taking. A full ten games under .500 and three down in conference play, Xavier has struggled to find the mid-season momentum that UMass has so successfully attached itself to.

Despite the sub-.500 record, Xavier has a few, key individual strengths. Senior Jeff Crandell is leading the team in almost every offensive category, batting an impressive .410 on the year with 41 runs batted in and 77 hits. Behind him is Ty Brenning at .370, who has chipped in with 35 RBI and 68 hits of his own.

On the mound stands senior righty Jeff Barger, who has compiled a 7-5 record in 108 innings pitched to go along with his 3.93 ERA. The only other pitcher on the Musketeers staff with a winning record is Jarrett Sues, who has worked himself up to a 3-2 record with an ERA of 7.16.

The Minutemen on the other hand continue to sport a roster rich with talent. Senior centerfielder Nick Gorneault leads the team in batting at .388, and has knocked in 38 runs with 12 homers to support his cause. Sophomore first baseman Jeff Altieri, at .356, has remained solid as the season progresses, remaining at or near the top of all offensive categories.

Freshman Cullan Maumus has made a solid impression since his insertion at shortstop a few weeks back; the more consistent his playing has become, the more solid his numbers have been. In 49 at-bats this season, Maumus has driven in 12 runs and maintained a .388 batting average.

While the offense has more or less been paced by the usual suspects all season, the pitching staff has seen more of a shift, particularly with the emergence of freshman right-hander Eric Chown. From the position of closer, to a few starting roles, Chown has quietly emerged as a legitimate force for the UMass rotation. His ERA of 3.74 leads the team, and while a few of his four wins have come from the seventh inning and on, he's displayed a poise this team has grown to count on and a versatility that other teams can't afford to ignore.

Also controlling games from the mound has been the strong veteran cast of Jesse Santos, Craig Szado and Nick Skirkanich. Add to that mix the grittiness of Brian Hourigan, and UMass has a staff they can play around with and adjust to the climate of opposing teams' bats.

The first game of Saturday's doubleheader is scheduled for noon. The third and final game of the series will be played at noon on Sunday.

Softball advances in A-10's

Hadley goes distance to shutout Rhode Island

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

The intensity is stronger and the will to win is higher – it must be the post-season.

The No. 23 Massachusetts softball team defeated Rhode Island 8-0 in the first round of the Verizon Atlantic 10 Championship yesterday afternoon in Dayton, Ohio.

The trouncing extended the Minutewomen's A-10 record to 22-0, pushing their overall record to 41-11. The Rams, meanwhile, dropped to below .500 at 28-29 overall, 10-12 in the A-10.

Junior ace Jen Hadley went the distance on the mound, allowing a miniscule two hits en route to the shutout. The recently named A-10 Pitcher of the Year struck out four and walked zero as she improved her record to 17-6. The Bristol, Conn. native has earned a victory in 15 of her last 16 starts.

The UMass offense got on the board in the bottom half of the third inning when sophomore Emily Robustelli walked and then scored on a Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler sacrifice fly.

Wheeler, the A-10's Player of the Year, ended the day with two hits and three RBI.

The Maroon and White added two more runs to its lead in the fifth inning. Junior Teri Rooney smacked a double and was knocked in on a double by sophomore Brandi Cross. Cross scored the inning's other run on a fielder's choice.

The Minutewomen ended the game in the bottom of the next inning. UMass pounded out five hits and took advantage of a Ram error to score five runs in the sixth. Freshman Jamie Cahalan's RBI single knocked Wheeler in for the afternoon's final run.

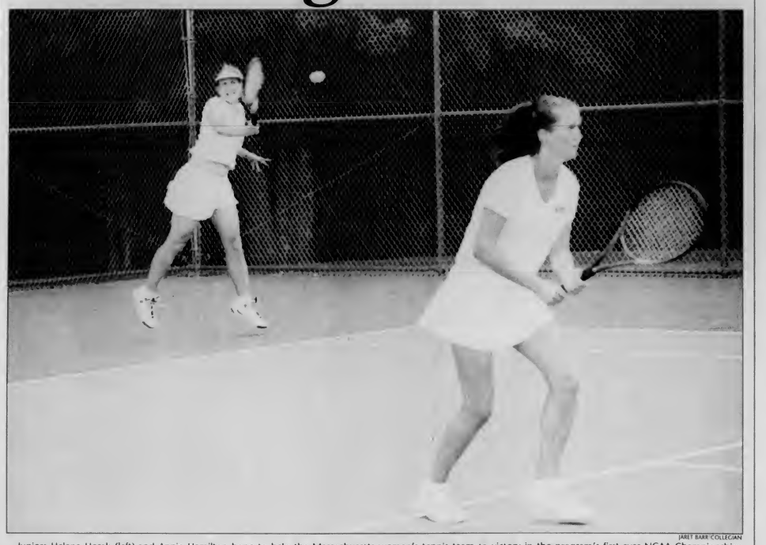
Rooney was superb from the plate, batting 3-for-3 on the afternoon. The All-Conference outfielder added an RBI and a run scored as well.

First baseman Cross, junior second baseman Ashley Bakken, and sophomore outfielder Anna Perey each complimented the offensive attack with two hits.

UMass will return to action at Stuart Field this afternoon against the winner of the St. Joseph's/Temple matchup, with the winner moving into Saturday's Championship game.

Freshman Jamie Cahalan knocked in UMass' final run yesterday in an 8-0 romp of URI.

Courting the Devils



Juniors Helena Horak (left) and Annie Hamilton hope to help the Massachusetts women's tennis team to victory in the program's first-ever NCAA Championships appearance Saturday at Arizona State.

UMass to face ASU in NCAA first round

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team has had almost two weeks to enjoy the Atlantic 10 title it won on April 22.

Now, it's back to business for the Minutewomen as they travel to Tempe, Ariz. for their first NCAA Championships match ever.

However, the team won't be able to ease on in to the tourney by facing a few cupcake opponents prior to facing opposition of a greater quality. The Maroon and White's first opponent will be No. 10 Arizona State, hardly a cupcake.

The Minutewomen have a lot things going against them as they prepare for Saturday's showdown. They're playing thousands of miles away from Amherst on the Sun Devils' home court. Plus, as an added bonus, the temperature in Tempe has the potential to escalate to 115 degrees.

None of this will faze the Minutewomen.

"I think we're going in remarkably loose. The pressure's on [ASU]," said head coach Judy Dixon. "Clearly we have many things to our disadvantage, but we're ready to go."

"I think we're looking for a good experience, since it's our first time playing a West Coast team," added freshman Francesca Mancini. "Whatever we do is going to be good."

UMass finished the regular season 20-7 – its best campaign ever – and in earning its first post-season berth, also garnered quite a bit of attention for the squad.

Dixon spoke about the numerous emails of congratulations from former alumni and players her team has received, as well as the amount of coverage and "hoopla" that has resulted from the A-10 championship. Although she loves her team in the spotlight, the realization is that the Minutewomen still have a job to do.

"We've been surrounded by so much excitement lately, but at the same time we want to keep them focused," said Dixon.

The Sun Devils enter the match with an impressive record of 17-5, and despite finishing fourth in the Pac-10 Conference, they still managed to wrap up their season at No. 10 in the nation.

ASU is led by sophomore Adria Engel who is ranked individually at No. 6 in the nation. She comes in having won 22 of her past 24 matches, and was crowned Pac-10 singles champion for this season. The Sun Devils also have the No. 89 ranked player in Megan Yeats, as well as three of the Top 50 ranked doubles teams in the country.

Still, the Minutewomen are approaching this with a competitive attitude and open mind.

"I'm going out there playing my best, and not thinking I'm going to lose, but just playing to win," said Iafra Depontes.

"I'm not really that nervous, I have nothing to lose, and looking forward to playing a really good player," said Mancini.

Dixon mentioned that the match will be especially tough because of the Arizona weather, not only because of the way it will physically drain the players, but also the effect it will have on the ball. The ball will be traveling at a much higher speed due to the dry heat, coupled with the already hard-hitting Sun Devil squad.

"There aren't any illusions about who we're playing," said Dixon.

But although she knows the cards are stacked against the Minutewomen, she knows that they will definitely put forth their best effort on Saturday.

"We're just going to do the best we can against one of the top ten teams in the country," she said. "My team won't lie down for anybody."

Lead Singer of the Dropkick Murphys, Al Barr, packed energy into the early part of the concert

Despite long delays, concert hits the stage

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

In the wake of funding discrepancies between University Productions and Concerts (UPC) and the Student Government Association (SGA), and talent shuffling to accommodate a revised budget, the show finally went on when Spring Concert 2001 filled the Mullins Center Saturday night.

UPC Event Staff Director Mike Rosenblatt estimated the final turnout at 8,000, but several eyewitnesses place the attendance between 3,000 and 5,000.

Spring Concert 2001 was the first year in which the floor was not open to the general public, and required a ticket for access. 2,000 tickets were given out through promotional activities.

The need for floor restriction stemmed from an incident at last year's concert when an audience member ran on stage, UPC Productions Manager Amanda Paolella said at an April press conference.

No arrests were made at this year's Spring Concert.

"It was pretty calm on our side," said Sergeant Joseph Mieczcowski of UMass Police. Aside from some people fainting, "everything went good."

Following a humid day with brief rainfall, a small group was assembled outside the Mullins Center before the doors were opened at 5:00 p.m.

"Colleges are usually fun," said Matt Kelly, drummer for the Dropkick Murphys. "There's a mix of different people and crowds. You can get high school kids to parents with their kids to people my age."

Southwest Battle of the Bands winner The Missing Lance Project, who "rocked," according to Rosenblatt, and Paynes Grey opened the show to a sparse crowd.

Last year's Spring Concert received criticism from UMass students and the Collegian for focusing too much on hip-hop acts. The show was headlined by rappers Method Man and Redman, and included performances by reggae artist Beenie Man and the Long Beach Dub All Stars.

SPRING CONCERT
with LIL' KIM, UNCLE KRACKER and DROPKICK MURPHYS
Mullins Center
May. 12

Last year's question of diversity was on the minds of everyone involved in the planning of the 2001 UMass spring concert. If nothing else, the show's promoters promised something for everyone. Simply shortening the show and offering the hometown punk stylings of Dropkick Murphys, the rock/rap/blues oriented Uncle Kracker and Gangsta Rap Queen Lil' Kim, the promoters hoped that it would be one the best received shows in the concert's recent history.

Although the doors opened at 5:00 p.m. the show didn't start until 6:00 p.m., when The Missing Lance Project, the winner of the Southwest Battle of the Bands, took the stage for a 30-minute song set.

The Missing Lance Project focused on fusing the energy that is found in today's dominating rock and roll with the sound and riffs of a reggae / punk band. They gave off a Sublime type feeling.

The next act to take the stage was the Boston band, Dropkick Murphys. Their fans came out in droves to support the Irish punk band, and their fans were "punk" to the core. Before the show even started, a few Dropkick supporters began heckling the emcees, and because of the still less-than-great outcome of the show, the hosts could hear them and began responding.

The Dropkick Murphys' entrance to the Mullins Center resulted in an eruption of applause and ovation that only local Boston bands can receive when playing in western Massachusetts. Brandishing a large band of three guitar players, a bassist, a drummer and a bag piper, the Murphys also utilized the Irish sound of an accordion and a piccolo to create a hard, sometimes repetitious sound.

After performing two songs, the guitarist told all of the real fans to move in front of their barrier that separates the floor and the stage. The move is understandable, since the Dropkick Murphy's are used to playing in clubs where there is no distance between the band and the crowd. However, in a venue like the Mullins Center that type of move is usually considered to be something of a kiss of death usually leading to frustrated security and sometimes even injured fans. In this instance though it didn't really matter, in fact it was probably for the best, creating a mosh pit in front of the stage for die-hard fans, and a safe distance for the rest of the crowd to enjoy the music.

The Dropkicks played virtually every song hard and fast, with the intensity you would expect from a hardcore punk band.

Perhaps the most controversial part of Spring Concert was the Dropkicks shameless proclamation of discontent for the other acts lined up for Spring Concert. The drummer dawned a t-shirt that read "Rap Sucks" and the guitarist admitted to never even hearing of Uncle Kracker before. The only point where the entire crowd on the floor seemed to be interested in the show was when the Murphys closed the show with their rendition of the hymn "Amazing Grace" and the Creedance Clearwater Revival song "Forunate Son."

By the time Uncle Kracker took the stage another two or three hundred people had filed in and were getting restless by the emcee's annoying antics. Despite their best attempts at getting the crowd psyched up for the show, the crowd became angry (for apparently no reason) and this anger did not subside when Uncle Kracker took the stage. Uncle Kracker, with the help of his funk/rock band laid down his own version of rock/rap fusion that has been so popular in recent years. However, that didn't stop the few angry and equally stupid people from ruining the show. Between songs one kid yelled, "You're white trash." The true sadness of UMass shined through when one despicable attendee urinated on the floor creating chaos for everyone around him.

UMass reigns supreme

The softball team capture its seventh consecutive Atlantic 10 championship on Saturday afternoon by defeating Rhode Island, 5-1. The win gives the Minutewomen an automatic berth in the NCAA tournament.

Weekend sweep secures No. 1 seed for Minutemen

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Most sports guys will tell you that there is nothing better than being No. 1.

The Massachusetts baseball team (26-17, 16-6 Atlantic 10) knows that as well as anybody, as it wrapped up the top seed in next weekend's A-10 conference championship with a three-game sweep of Xavier (21-34, 8-14 A-10).

The Minutemen took both ends of Saturday's doubleheader 6-4 and 10-8. Senior Craig Szado went the distance in the first game, giving up 11 hits in his seven innings of work to improve to 5-3 on the season. In the second game, junior Mike Kulak went three-for-five with a homerun and five RBI to lead the Maroon and White offense.

In Sunday's game, Jesse Santos pitched 7 1/3 strong innings to shut down the Musketeers and pave the way for the Minutemen to clinch first place in the conference during the regular season.

UMass 6, Xavier 4

The Maroon and White got off to a quick start in the top of the first as Sean Sarno and Kulak led off the game with consecutive singles and were advanced on a sacrifice by captain Nick Gorneault. Jeff Altieri hit a ground ball that scored Sarno and gave UMass a 1-0 lead.

But Xavier responded with three runs in the bottom of the inning. Eric Greenwell and Ty Brenning each hit singles to left field and moved up when Mark Andres drew a one-out walk from Szado. After Jarrett Sues flew out to left, Ace Moss and Ed Bongard hit consecutive singles to put the Musketeers up 3-1 after one frame.

After Xavier tacked on another tally in the last of the second, UMass responded with three of their own in the top of the third. Gorneault, Altieri and Gavin Clark loaded the bases with one out as each hit a single. Aaron Senez hit a grounder to third that was mishandled to bring Gorneault home. Tim Klett then hit a sacrifice to left to send Altieri scampering home, and Cullan Maumus tied the game by singling to center to bring Clark around.

UMass then went ahead to stay in the fourth, as Sarno drew a walk and advanced when Xavier hurler Jeff Barger threw away a pickoff attempt. He would come around to score as Kulak hit a long single to left.

Meanwhile, Szado hit his groove, shutting down the Musketeers through the fifth inning. In the top of the sixth, he received insurance as Klett ripped his third longball of the year.

In the bottom of the sixth, Xavier threatened to put a dent in UMass's lead with two outs. Brenning, Crandell and Andres each hit singles to load the bases. But Szado pitched his way out of the jam by striking out Sues to preserve the victory.

UMass 10, Xavier 8

The second game saw UMass once again play come from behind as Xavier put up three runs in the last of the first. Benning and Crandell continued their threats as they each singled. They moved up 90 feet as Andres drew a walk. Then, designated hitter Matt Tedford knocked in two runs as he roped a single. Sues followed by hitting a single of his own to bring Andres around to score and put UMass in a 3-0 hole. Russ Reyes added a single of his own, but Minuteman starter Nick Skirkanich extinguished the fire by getting Eric Armstrong to strike out with the bases full.

In the top of the second, Klett led things off with a single and Maumus was hit by a Kevin Cave offering. Defense was again the downfall of Xavier, as Cave threw the ball away on a grounder by Tom Ellerbrook to score Klett and move Maumus and Ellerbrook up to second and third, respectively. That was the end of the day for Cave, as Kevin Crowley was brought in to try and cool off the sizzling UMass offense.

But Kulak made it clear that there would be no cooling as he roped a three-run shot to left-center field, his fourth on the season, to put the Maroon and White up 4-3.

Hard work, determination earn Seals of approval for lax senior

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

Nobody has ever handed Jeff Seals anything and anybody who knows him is aware that the senior face off specialist does not accept handouts. Seals is a hunter and like any good gamesman he enjoys the thrill of the pursuit and will gladly decline a laid out meal.

So every Saturday of spring, at around noon, the noble warrior straps on his armor, grabs his weapon of choice and ventures on to the planes of Richard F. Garber Field in search of a reckoning.

So with his eye black soaking in the solar rays, the hunter spots his prey. His sharply squinted eyes stare intently down the body of his weapon as he crouches and prepares for the deathblow.

In an instant he strikes and with the unity of precision and strength the hunter cleanly dismantles his enemy – possession UMass.

Seals once used his prowess in the circle as a means to get his cleats planted firmly on the Garber turf. But now his services act as a weight on the scales of victory and defeat.

"Possession of the ball, especially for a team like us that likes to run up and down is key," coach Greg Cannella said.

The senior did not always play such an integral part in the success of the team, in fact it is by some twist of fate that Seals ended up in Div. I lacrosse at all.

"UMass was the biggest Div. I school that was looking at me," he said.

A far cry from a collegiate career in one of the top lacrosse programs in the nation, Seals grew up as a tri-sport athlete in Long Valley, N.J. Lacrosse however, was never the top priority while football and wrestling took center stage.

"I played football and I wrestled also, but I started playing all three when I was in fifth grade so it was kind of an in between sport," he said.

Long Valley certainly does not ring many bells in the collective ears of the lacrosse community. But luckily for Seals West Morris High School boasts one of the best lax programs in the Garden State, or else Jeff could have been shooting for a different type of scholarship.

"We had a pretty strong program at my high school," he said. "So I really got into lacrosse from there."

With an invigorated passion for the game, Seals' lacrosse career took off into the stratosphere, meeting his football and wrestling accolades at the crescent.

He earned all-state honors in both lacrosse and football while boasting an all-conference mention in wrestling.

Coming out of high school Seals potentially could have competed at the collegiate level in any of his three sports. But in the end he chose UMass lacrosse.

Not blessed with superior physical attributes, Seals had little or no chance to make an impact on Cannella's top-20 UMass squad.

"I didn't really have any blazing speed but I wanted to get on the field.

"When I was a freshman a senior was the starting face off guy so I knew next year I had a chance to get on the field that way, so I really just worked on face offs."

His experience and strength as wrestler and his dedication as a football player ended up helping a younger Seals develop into a talented face off specialist.

"A lot of stuff on face offs, if you are not getting off clean than you are really scrapping for the ball, as far as wrestling you have to stay low," he said. "Everything is hips in wrestling and that's what it takes to box some-

Tennis falls to ASU

By Andy Vogt

They gave it all they had, but sometimes that simply isn't enough to win.

The Massachusetts women's tennis team, in its first NCAA tournament match ever, battled but were overmatched as it lost to No. 11 Arizona State, 7-0 on Saturday. With a number of factors going against them, the Minutewomen toughed out the incredible Arizona heat and the disadvantage of playing on their opponents' home court, but came up short in the end.

Despite her team's loss, coach Judy Dixon was proud of the way the Maroon and White fought. "All I wanted from them was to fight hard," she said. "They certainly did that. Today's match was great for us in the future since we have such a young team."

The Sun Devils' coach Sheila McInerney was also quick to praise the Minutewomen. "I would like to give UMass credit," she said. "They played us feisty and made the girls give everything they had."

UMass had not faced conditions even resembling the ones present in Tempe over the weekend. The temperature soared to 107 degrees on Saturday, however, it reached nearly 140 degrees on the courts. Furthermore, the dry heat made the ball fly off the racket even more quickly, providing an extra challenge facing the already hard-hitting Arizona State squad.

ASU's Adria Engel beat the Maroon and White's Francesca Mancini in convincing fashion, 6-2, 6-1, but Engel was far and away the toughest opposition Mancini had faced all year. Engel came into matched ranked as the No. 6 individual player in the nation, and was named the ITA National Player of the Month in April. Junior Annie Hamilton also was facing stiff competition, as she lost 6-0, 6-2, to the Sun Devils' Megan Yeats, the No. 89 player in the nation. Other Minutewomen were able to win a few games in their match as well, as Helena Horak dropped her contest 6-2, 6-3, and Lindsey Gillooly fell to her opponent, 6-2, 6-1.

"They get every shot," said freshman Jafra Depontes. "Not only do they get it in, but they hit a winner."

In the doubles point, ASU swept UMass in the three matchups, but the Maroon and White made the matches respectable facing three of the top 50 doubles tandems in the nation. The duos of Mancini/Hamilton and Gillooly/Depontes both were able to take their foes to 8-4 contests.

Dixon knew going into the match that the Sun Devils would be a tough bunch to handle, and her expectations came to fruition during the match. "ASU makes you win the points," she said. "They give you nothing cheap."

"They are very confident in themselves and their shots because of their ranking, therefore they are able to hit out on the ball and be aggressive," Hamilton added.

With the loss, the Minutewomen ended their most successful campaign in team history, finishing the year at 20-8. This year's combined fall and spring seasons saw the team go on a six-match winning streak at one point, win its first Atlantic 10 Championship in the squad's history, and earn its first NCAA berth ever. The Minutewomen also landed two members on the Atlantic 10 All-Conference team in Mancini and Depontes, and the freshman from Milan, Italy also garnered the Player of the Year and Newcomer of the Year awards. Dixon completed the UMass trifecta by picking up Coach of the Year honors.

Furthermore, the Minutewomen were able to accomplish all of this despite having a team of half freshmen. With all six starting players returning next season, and with the post-season experience under its belt, UMass is already well on their way to defending its conference championship. The sky's the limit for this young, talented bunch as it approaches next season.

Garage results in mouting trash

DANA EBDE/COLLEGIAN

This sign can be seen in the Boltwood Walk area where the new Amherst parking garage is currently being built Local businesses seem willing to undergo temporary inconveniences for the long-term benefits.

By Karen Madsen
Collegian Staff

Possible loss of patronage to downtown restaurants and stores due to ongoing construction of the new parking garage worries employees in the downtown Amherst area, but they remain hopeful for the advantages that increased parking downtown with eventually bring.

The parking crunch has been more chaotic for business surrounding the Kellogg Ave. parking lot, than for those along Main Street.

"Right now, it's distracting as far as outside seating goes. There's complete chaos in both parking lots," said Johanna Koeppen an employee of Rao's Roastery. However, she joked that the disorder might actually be good for business, implying that it provided customers with entertainment.

"I think some of the people enjoy watching people try to park and navigate in the lots," she said.

Jack Lee of the Panda East Chinese Restaurant said that the garage's construction will continue to disrupt downtown parking, but will be a good thing in the long run.

"It's a problem a little bit. It's hurting business a little bit. [But] so far so good, they're on the right track," he said.

According to David Morini, who works for Newbury Comics, the fencing off of the back lot has caused minor loading and trash disposal problems for the businesses on Main Street.

"It's a change," he said, "We've had to switch stuff around. Lot's of the businesses are having trouble with trash disposal. [It's] our biggest problem," Morini explained that Newbury Comic also used to be loaded from the back, but now it must be loaded from the storefront, which causes heavy truck traffic in the morning.

"You have trucks lining the street up and down out in front," he said.

Lisa Laprade of Bueno Y Sano, doesn't think that the increased loading traffic is a problem, though she said it has caused some changes.

"Our deliverers have to come earlier," she said. "It's been a little loud. A couple of days there's been noise." But Laprade didn't see the noise as too detrimental to business either, explaining, "Business has been excellent."

In fact, most of the shops and restaurants agreed that the benefits of constructing the parking garage outweigh the cost, and believed that both for their own businesses and the economy of the town as a whole will profit. "We haven't lost any customers," Koeppen said. "It's going to be good for the town in the long run."

"The absence of parking is one thing that could keep customers from visiting us," said Todd Palmer of Oxford Bleu Inc. "We'll get more customers once the garage goes in. It's good for us."

However, some of the employees of these businesses doubt that the garage will be completed by the suggested date of next December.

"I think it's going to be more like a year," said Koeppen. Palmer was also unsure, saying, "It probably won't be done until next spring."

Prof's Hughes book returns in paperback

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

Steven C. Tracy's reissued version of his 1988 book, Langston Hughes and the Blues, premiered today in paperback. Tracy, a University of Massachusetts Afro-American Studies Associate Professor and a blues musician, will read from his work tonight at 7 p.m. at Food for Thought Bookstore in Amherst.

For the past 20 years, Tracy has studied the work of the African American Harlem Renaissance poet, Langston Hughes, and the music that inspired him.

He recalled how his interest in the poet stemmed from his childhood love of blues music. In college, he said, he was introduced to Hughes' poetry, and his fascination grew from there. After one of his colleagues from the Afro-American department held a recent book signing at Food for Thought, Tracy agreed to a book signing in the same bookstore when his reissued book was released.

"We're just going to wing it and see what the people want," said Tracy. "We've been talking about either me reading from some of my work or playing some blues music, since I am a musician."

Tracy, who in fact led his own blues band in the 1980s, believes Hughes to be an important figure in today's society, claiming that his works have provided African Americans and people from all over the world (since Hughes considered himself a world citizen who sought to transcend racial divisions) with inspiration.

He explained how Hughes was one of the early writers of the 20th century who wrote for people in general using a comprehendible language, as opposed to befuddling an audience with an arcane language geared solely toward those who were college educated.

"[Hughes] saw the value of paying attention to average people," stated Tracy, "and he very intimately communicated with human beings."

According to the Associate Professor, Hughes, a descendant of noted abolitionists, told Americans to think of their heritage in its broadest terms, to value their elders, and to open themselves up to the many possibilities of American democracy.

"He valued freedom and diversity, but also celebrated unity among people," added Tracy, noting that Hughes completed 16 books of poetry, 20 plays, novels, short stories, musicals, operas, and scrips for radio and television over the course of 40 years.

As Hughes incorporated the structure, rhythm, and spiritual essence of the blues in his work, he performed readings with some of the most famous jazz musicians of his day, including Charles Mingus and Red Allen.

"Hughes believed poetry should provide a window on a culture. That's why he expressed the complexities of the African American experience through the musical elements woven into his writing," said Tracy. "In a way, you have to understand the blues to appreciate Langston Hughes."

"Going to Cincinnati: A History of the Blues of the Queen City" is among some of Tracy's other works, and thus provides readers with an opportunity to further understand blues music.

Tracy is currently working with the University of Missouri Press as a co-editor of an 18-volume series of Hughes' collected works, specifically editing two of the volumes on Hughes' works for children.

The first of these volumes will premiere this fall, while the second volume's release is tentatively scheduled for next spring.

In addition, Tracy is working on an Oxford University Press literary guide that places Hughes in his historical context.

"The Oxford press has a series of these historical guides on poets such as Ralph Waldo Emerson and Henry David Thoreau," explained Tracy. "Hughes, I believe, will actually be the first Afro-American in the series," he added with pride.

Library extends hours

By Mark Ramirez
Collegian Staff

In anticipation of the need for study space before and during finals week, the W.E.B. Du Bois Library will add hours to its schedule beginning May 13.

That Sunday, the library will be open from 10 a.m. to 2 a.m. From May 14 to May 24, the library will be open from 7 a.m. to 2 p.m. Staffed services will be unavailable during the added hours. The library shuttle service will accommodate the new schedule. Hours for the science libraries remain unchanged.

In other news, the Du Bois Library is presenting a book artists' exhibit called "Growing Books." The exhibit features artists' botanical books and books about the philosophy of botany and, according to organizers, "explores the relationships between books, plants, and the human mind..."

The exhibit opened April 30 and runs through May 25 in the Special Collections and Archives Reading Room on the 25th floor, on the garden level, and in the library garden itself.

Student creates billboards for senior thesis to promote Everywoman's Center awareness

By Chanel Dubofsky
Collegian Staff

When was the last time you really looked at a PVTA bus, other than to see it fly by just as you arrive at the stop? Well, the next time you're enjoying the comforts of the bus, take a look around; you might actually learn something.

For her honors senior activity, Carolyn Ruskala, a Women's Studies major, created a series of billboards advertising the Everywoman's Center. There are a total of 15 boards, five on the exterior of the buses and ten on the interior, all featuring the Everywoman's Center logo and listing its programs and services.

Ruskala has been involved in the Everywoman's Center for three years, and currently works as a Counselor/Advocate. Counselor Advocates are trained in crisis intervention and provide short-term counseling on the center's 24 hour hotline (413) 545-0800, the MASS Toll Free Hot-line is 1-888-337-0800), as well as work with support groups for survivors of rape and child sexual assault.

"People often don't know about our services until they actually have to use them," said Ruskala, whose main goal in developing the billboards was to let the area know that the services are available. She struggled with the issue of how to address the community, and to let it be known that the Everywoman's Center's services are not just "for survivors. They are also for allies, family members and partners. We encourage anyone who has been affected by violence to take advantage of our services."

The billboards were displayed at the 7th Annual Undergraduate Research Conference, held in Sturbridge, Mass., where undergraduate students from across the state exhibited their creative, scholarly and public service activities. Ruskala received "a lot of positive feedback" at the conference, in addition to making people aware of the center and its community activities. Ruskala used the money from her Honors Research Fellowship, along with funding from the Everywoman's Center to run the billboards for two months, and the PVTA agreed to run them for free for the month of May. Ruskala hopes that the bus service will continue to exhibit the billboards in September.

In addition to housing the Rape Crisis Center for Hampshire County, the Everywoman's Center provides a variety of services. The Educator/Advocate Program facilitates free local workshops in middle and high schools, community organizations and in the workplace on topics such as building healthy relationships, gender roles and sexual harassment. The Women of Color Leadership Network works with community, Five College and University women of color in advocacy, mentoring and training around issues such as women's health and economic and social justice. The Network also links students with internships in these areas. The Resource and Referral Program provides services to the entire community, such as a job bank, child care, support group and local housing information. Other resources the Multilingual Volunteer Interpreter's Project, allowing women whose native language is not English to have their needs addressed by interpreters.

Matthew Zielinski, a senior at Umass, assisted Ruskala with technical support, and the Translation Center writing. The billboards are written in English and Spanish, and will run until the end of May.

Student carted out of dorm

By Erik Haan
Collegian Staff

A call was made to police from Crampton Hall in Southwest Residential Area, just before 6:00 p.m. yesterday. Two police cars and an ambulance pulled up to the scene a few minutes later.

Upon arrival medical technicians, accompanied by police officers, rushed into the dormitory pushing a stretcher. Several concerned onlookers were present outside of the dorm to witness the occurrence.

Several minutes later the officers and EMTs emerged with an unidentified African-American male, who was strapped down to the stretcher, which was in an upright position. His eyes were closed and it was uncertain if he was conscious. Also emerging from the dorm was an African-American female, also unidentified, who was walking under her own power.

The male was carted into the ambulance accompanied by the officers and EMTs, where he was tended to for several minutes. The female, who was visibly distressed, was escorted to one of the waiting police cars, which she stayed outside of while talking to the officers.

Most of the gathered crowd refused to comment, for fear of "invading privacy," as some were quoted as saying, but one woman claimed to see the man "just screaming at the top of his lungs." Police refrained from comment as well, citing "privacy issues" because it was classified as a "medical issue and not criminal activity."

Taner Okatan, Area Residential Director of Crampton, also claimed that releasing any information about the incident would be an invasion of privacy.

California

Officials in California turned off the power again on Tuesday night after grid managers said the public once again ignored requests to safeguard electricity.

California has now had two consecutive days of blackouts and yet they still did not heed warnings, according to the grid managers.

Unusually high temperatures for this season in the Southwestern portion of the state caused much of the population to jack up the power on their air conditioners. The alert was ordered around 7:00 p.m. after the reserve capacity dropped. The blackouts were in full effect a half hour later. Furthermore, many power plants continue to be off line because they are in need of maintenance and upkeep.

Despite the eventual dropping temperatures the Californian still managed to use more than the suggested amount of power. The public was warned and pleaded with to cut back their power usage by ten percent. Yet, according to Jim Macintosh the director of grid operations, the people were employing approximately 1,000 megawatts more personally on Tuesday than they had on the previous day.

"There is not enough generation in the state to supply loads with the ten percentures we're seeing," said Macintosh.

Officials from the state of California do not feel that the situation will be stabilized throughout the summer and predict that the state will have further power problems. To this point, President Bush has refused the majority of the aid that was requested.

Illinois

As gas prices soar up and up throughout the US, Chicago is getting hit hard with the highest gas prices in the nation. The payments for gas are reaching a record high at the $2.a gallon mark in Chicago. What's more is that even as the prices rise there's discussion about the prices even reaching up to a possible $3 a gallon sometime near the end of the month.

At a gas station in San Francisco customers complained after filling up their tanks for $2.64 a gallon. "This price is gouging," grumbled Jacqui Van Keuren, after she filled her tank.

"It's ridiculous," Cedric Norwood said Monday as he fueled up in downtown Chicago. "The oil companies are going to suck us dry."

No blame has yet been laid for the soaring prices. The raised prices however, may be connected to the scant quantity of supplies. A current Federal Trade Commission report on the prices for gas last summer has revealed no evidence of oil industry collusion.

Even though U.S. motorists still pay less fos gas than those in Europe and Asia, this offers little consolation to drivers.

However, despite complaints of the prices that Americans have to pay to drive their cars President Bush has not spoken of cutting the 18.4 cents-a-gallon federal gas tax and will not do anything to help the citizens even if the prices break the $3 mark.

The stress of the amounts of gas that people use has taken its toll on the gas refineries. Infrastructures in the refineries have broken down due to aging and yet no new refineries have been built in the past 15 years.

Nonetheless according to Phil Flynn the senior energy analyst for Alaron Trading Corp. in Chicago, things may not get much worse. "The bad news is that we don't have one extra drop of gas to fall back on."

He further alluded to the fact that if another refinery does indeed go out of service the prices for gas may raise again up to another 75 cents a gallon.

Secretary sentenced to serve time for stealing from employer's clients

Linda Otero-Otrstein, of Dracut, was sentence to three years and five months in prison for pilfering $2.7 million from her boss's clients. She then used this stolen money in order to but for herself and friends furs, jewels and other such indulgences.

This secretary to attorney at law Robert Lappin of the law firm Lappin, Rosen and Godlberg pleaded guilty to 14 counts of mail and wire fraud. Also added to the list, were interstate transportation of stolen property and tax evasion.

She accomplished these crimes by setting up bank account under her own name and then instructed investment firms to transfer the money into these accounts.

She has been ordered by the U.S. District Court Judge Robert E. Keeton to repay over $2.6 million that she laundered from one family trust fund into the account with her name on it.

So far Otero-Ortstein has repaid $50,000 and has been granted bail for three years.

Girl not allowed to fly on U.S. Airways?

A Massachusetts family is suing U.S. Airways claiming that the airline denied their mentally challenged daughter a seat on the plane on their return trip from Orlando.

After telling the attendants that Katherine, the girl, may need help on the plane because he felt she was having a bad day, Thomas Leary, who is a Needham police officer, said that the airline flat out told them they could not allow his daughter Katherine to board the plane.

"They were pretty cold people," he said to a Boston Herald reporter. "There was no basic human understanding or compassion or consideration of our situation whatsoever."

Leary however can say how as a result of this he then had to take his daughter home on a 30-hour bus ride back to Massachusetts, while his wife and 15-year-old son flew back to Boston.

"We were just totally taken aback and shocked," Leary proclaimed. "We were literally dumbfounded and didn't know what to do."

On the ride home because of the fact that Katherine, his daughter, was afraid and worried about bus bathrooms, she had to endure the trip sitting in a pair of pants that had been stained with urine until more garments could be purchased. Incidentally, their luggage had already been boarded on the plane.

However, the U.S. Airline had another story to tell.

US Airways spokesman Rick Weintraub alleged that despite what the family says the airline did not deny them passage onto the plane. However, the company did state that they "had sympathy" for the family and were well "aware of the circumstances" that had to be suffered.

"Our perspective throughout has been that this is a very sensitive situation for all concerned, but there was no attempt to deny boarding," Weintraub declared to The Associated Press.

Leary went on to say further how the airline gave no justification as to why they would not allow Katherine to board. And after further grievances to the airline by the family upon returning home to Dover, they have given them no response.

President Bulger questioned about his fugitive brother

University of Massachusetts President William Bulger has recently been requested before a federal grand jury in order to shed some light on the subject of any contact he may have had with his brother, according to a report on WCVB-TV Tuesday.

After facing charges and accusations about James "Whitey" Bulger and his connections to the "mob" and the organized crime ring he is accused of running in South Boston, he disappeared in 1995.

Currently Bulger is charged with nineteen murders and has been added to the FBI's "Ten Most Wanted" and a $1 million reward to go along with it.

Bulger, the former president of the State senate, was brought in for questioning and concerns were brought up about telephone calls that were monitored by electronics phone surveillance in 1994. Furthermore, examiners believe that the devices were tampered with once a former state trooper Richard Scneiderhan told a member of the Bulger gang about the surveillance and exploration.

The FBI, the Bulger brothers and their attorney's either declined to comment or could not be reached.

Defense Secretary Rumsfeld instructs space programs consolidated

On Tuesday Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, as Chairman of the Space program, ordered on Tuesday that a four-star Air Force general would be responsible for both military satellites and other space programs.

Rumsfeld stated in an announcement, "Space issues are complex and merit a renewed focus. A more compressive management and organizational approach is necessary to assign clear responsibilities and accountability for national security space programs."

Rumsfeld also went to say how these changes are brought up to the public in order to make space take a place in the public mind because of it's growing importance to both civilian and military projects.

It's only logical to conclude that we must be attentive to these vulnerabilities and pay careful attention to protecting and promoting our interests in space," he stated.

However he did not mention any suggestions or propositions on the idea of new defenses for satellites or other space-based systems despite the fact the discussions have arisen recently about space defenses and tracking with satellites Furthermore, Rumsfeld added that the United States remains dedicated to the peaceful utilization of space.

"These proposals have nothing to do with that," Rumsfeld said. "These proposals have to do with organizational arrangements within the Department of Defense that put a focus on the important issues relating to space which have been spread throughout the department in a way that has made it difficult to get the right kind of focus and the right kind of emphasis."

However critics of Rumsfeld's propositions proclaim that he has indeed taken the first step toward weapons in space.

Tom Cardamone, Executive Director of the Council For a Livable World Education Fund said in a statement, "Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld has formally established the Pentagon infrastructure that will lead to the weaponization of space."

Furthermore after the Space Commission warned of a "Pearl Harbor in space. Sen. Bob Smith, R-New Hampshire, one commission member, stated, "There are nations out there that are hostile to us and they are in space. They have such weapons as lasers, anti-satellite weapons and electromagnetic pulse weapons and we have to be ready to recognize that threat."

Cheney advocates for a nuclear power makeover

According to Vice President Dick Cheney, implementing nuclear power can solve the United State's power and energy troubles. He also stated it will help safeguard the environment.

Cheney stated that nuclear power needs a "fresh look" with a new program that will increase the supply of energy sources. "It is a safe technology and doesn't emit any carbon dioxide at all," the vice president said in an interview with CNN's John King. "With the gas prices rising the way they are, nuclear is looking like a good alternative."

However, Robert Kennedy Jr., of the Natural Resources Defense Council, felt otherwise, rebuffing the fact that nuclear power could be a wise decision.

Kennedy stated that the reason why there hasn't been a proposal for nuclear power since 1974 was because it is just not economical. "Eventually there ought to be a permanent repository. The French do this very successfully and very safely in an environmentally sound, sane manner. We need to be able to do the same thing." In order for the demands for this proposal to be satisfied Cheney predicts that 1300 to 1900 new power plants will have to be implemented over the next twenty years. Furthermore, adding numerous refineries to process oil will also be necessary.

ALANA enrollment: its history and current situation

By Gyasi McClarence
Collegian Correspondent

As the University of Massachusetts Amherst forges ahead in the new millennium, a thriving economy, welfare reform and anti-affirmative action policies have sharply curbed enrollment and retention of certain minority groups.

Retention of minority students is the job of Enrollment Services. African American students are given priority at the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students, an Enrollment Services program. However, in the words of Floyd Martin, director of the CCEBMS, "Remember [minority students] exist within a larger university community."

Programs involved in helping minorities achieve thrive outside CCEBMS. In CCEBMS' annual report, Martin stated, "The program exists as a parallel structure to the undergraduate deans' offices and the chief undergraduate advisors." Martin believes that CCEBMS, located on the second floor of the New Africa House in the Central residential area, is the host visible program.

The program began in 1967 with 125 students enrolled.

"We currently see some 800 students of color on campus," Martin said. "The amount of students that we see every week varies in the semester." The number of students allotted to each full time advisor varied between 193 to 146 In 1999-2000 academic year.

In the report Martin suggested "some students perceive CCEBMS as replacing family-based support for the short period of time that they are at the University."

According to Martin, even white students look for advisors here. In a 1999 Student Affairs, Research, Information and Systems (SARIS) survey, African Americans were about twice as likely to go to the CCEBMS program to complain about racial or ethnic harassment than other ALANA to go to respective programs. CCEBMS outdistanced the dean of students and the university police more than four to one. Latino students preferred the Bilingual Collegiate Program less than two to one to the police or dean and Asian students showed a slight preference to the United Asia Learning Resource Center.

The kind of support minority students receive in the CCEBMS program is unique to other support programs on campus. The CCEBMS program supports advising, tutoring, mentoring and advocacy functions on campus.

Due to budget cuts in the program, however it will be harder to properly handle to its support functions, Martin explained. Graduate students that used to welcome ALANA students during the summer New Students Program will have to be let go. Students at the graduate level were integral to the other programs such as tutoring, said Martin. However, CCEBMS reduced funding must go elsewhere, though undergraduate tutors outnumber graduate tutors two to one in the program. The CCEBMS annual report shows that tutors barely matched the number of tutee requests. In the fall of 1999, 244 requests for tutoring were given to the CCEBMS Instructional Review and Tutorial Services or CIRTS. 234 students received tutorial help.

Yet ALANA students at the graduate level pick up many of the advanced courses in demand, with few undergrads to take up the slack once they go. Out of 234 students in the Fall 1999 CIRTS program, 154 passed the course in which help was needed. Of the withdrew from the course, seven received incompletes and only four failed.

Since its inception CCEBMS ruled through thirty years on a limited annual appropriation of $54,000 for operating expenses. The Goodell Takeover and the subsequent agreements succeeded in raising the amount to about $71,000 in 1997. However, Congress's recent decision to cap fiscal increases for 2002 to five percent has led state legislators to cut increases to state funding of its public schools respectively. Finance administrators likewise withdrew funding from university support programs. It cost the CCEBMS program about 23,000 dollars in funding according to Martin.

The decrease in minority enrollment has been felt in the CCEMBS program as well.

"Over the past two years since the Chancellor made his decision in regard to affirmative action, the numbers of students of color has dropped," Martin elaborated. "This past year in the fall of 2000 we brought in 126 freshmen students into the CCEBMS program, 85 of them or about 67 percent were black students."

However, the 1997 the number of freshmen entering the CCEBMS program amounted to 300 students and 80 percent were African Americans. The shift is also attributed to actions taken before the administration decided to officially end the affirmative action program. It began behind the scenes after a unit of admissions officers had been removed from the university office in 1997. The added minimum grade point average of 3.0 for all entering freshmen resulted in ALANA students with a GPA below a 3.0 being refused after the affirmative action ended.

When the University ended the Affirmative Action program on campus, the results were immediately felt. According to an Office of Informational Research fact sheet, from fall 1997 to fall 2000 56 percent fewer black high school students came to Amherst as freshmen. This same trend was reflected in other freshmen minority students. From the fall of 1996 to the fall of 2000, the rate of entering Latino freshmen has dropped 60 percent and the number of Cape Verdeans entering the school as freshmen have decreased from 31 to 12 students.

According to the 2000 United States Census, the median household income in Massachusetts is $43,015. Nationally the median is $37,005. Statistics tabulated for the 1990 census show the median was $36,952 in Massachusetts. An estimated 48 percent of white households made below $35,000 in 1989. Black households came below $35,000 at a rate of 64 percent.

Graduate student and activist Tom Taaffe gave a startling figure in the November 2000 issue of the "Voice," a newspaper that carries the slogan "The Pioneer Valley's Corporate Free Press" on its masthead. Taaffe told readers, "Admissions administrators believe 50 percent of the African, Latin, Asian and Native American population have either threatened to withdraw from the University or have withdrawn."

Taaffe put the lack of financial diversity in terms of average household income at the university.

"Those making less than $60,000 declined 40 percent between September 1985 and May 1998... 88 percent or 805 out of 911 of student parents on some form of public assistance disappeared in one year thanks to welfare reform," Taaffe wrote. "Affirmative action created a mechanism for low and middle income ALANA students to attend college. In its collapse, the ALANA population has come to mirror the white population in terms of income."

The University created a unit of students, faculty and administrators in the spring of 1999 called the Task Force on Undergraduate Admissions. Its function was to study the problem of maintaining a diverse student body without an active policy of affirmative action. Later the task force's goals were further refined to three separate but interconnected issues: review admissions criteria, study how other universities have dealt with the general problem and suggest ways to encourage the retention rate of minority students. On the matter of student retention, the task force issued its report with input from other administrators, faculty, and students on campus. It reported on four short term and nine long-term strategies.

Among the strategies, the short-term goal of expansion of ALANA support programs was recently denied inclusion in the University budget.

Providing pre-college experience to students, identifying students who need help and monitoring their progress are the other short-term strategies proposed for ALANA enrollment and retention. It challenged administrators to make the first step toward insuring ALANA students' success with pre-college experience. The short-term plan of pre-college experience also is given voice later in its long-term goals.

The long term plans of developing and implementing a pre-semester program for students with fewer academic skills, establishing private scholarships for ALANA students and developing and implementing an academic summer program for undergraduates directly involve ALANA high-school students before they reach the Amherst campus. Many other long-term goals pose the creation of a climate in which ALANA students would want to study, such as creation of an ALANA resource center, increasing financial-aid for all students and increasing recruitment of ALANA graduate students.

But, where do students go if problems occur at home, with financial aid or academia especially being minorities? Mr. Martin illustrated the problem against his own undergraduate experience with a professor. At a college with only a handful of African Americans, Martin failed a required course in his major. Taking the course again, Martin went to the professor who said, "You don't need intelligence because your personality will get you through." Undaunted Martin took the class twice more, with the same results. On the fourth try, he received a 'B' with a different professor.

"Some people would say that It was since I took the course three times before, but it was a totally racist situation," Martin explained.

He assured that while CCEBMS bears the burden of a support function, the student's course instructor, faculty member or department head may also step in.

"Sometimes they'll call them up. You've still got a structure in there. Some professors would do that and some won't. Some may call the student after class and ask if something isn't going right," Martin said. "Depends on the professor, of course."

The 1999-2000 CCEBMS annual report shows such a trend. The CCEBMS staff each semester sends mid-semester evaluation forms to courses in departments where CCEBMS students are registered, who are either starting their first year or have academic difficulty. In the fall of 1999, this amounted to 1,305 forms. About half that number were filled out and sent back. Those that were sent back reported primarily on students who were doing well in each department. The 750 of the 758 returned were favorable evaluations. Martin saw the pattern as "when faculty members are willing to work with academic support programs students of color benefit substantially," in the annual report. He continued, "Students generally improve their academic performance when faculty members are willing to go the extra mile to help their students.

In trying to do a better job, Martin regarded the task of restructuring for the upcoming academic year.

"We try to hire advisors who have had experience in different positions on campus," said Martin. "When we hired Sabaur, it was because we knew he had experience in the engineering department.

"We decided to hire Marva Cuffee because she is a veteran in the financial aid office," Martin continued. "She used to be an advisor before he went to work at the University Store, now he's back here as assistant director. Have you seen the store now? There used to be a problem there, now minorities are on the cash registers."

Mori Freshman students entering the university in 1997 left a year later for three major reasons according to a SARIS survey, which was released this February. Former University students who were mandated to leave due to poor academic performance were not included in the survey. The majority, 187 students, said they either left for financial, academic or home/family issues. Though the survey warns that among minority students who reported, African Americans were underrepresented, the information seems to suggest a basic trend.

Deerfield: a historic perspective on the Massachusetts town

By Laura Leonard
Collegian Staff

Late summer of 1703 was a time of great anxiety for colonists in the Massachusetts Bay Colony settlements. Native American raiding activities in the late spring had once again brought forth the fear that the conflict known as Queen Anne's War would spill into the Connecticut Valley. New York Governor Lord Cornbury sent word that French soldiers and Native American allies from Canada were heading for Deerfield, MA. As of September, a stressful summer has passed peacefully. But in October, a small Native American force struck, capturing two Deerfield men. Tensions heightened; the town strengthened its fortifications; the Massachusetts General Court sent soldiers to help protect the town. Cold winter snow promised a respite; in 1704, wars were not fought in the depths of winter.

Two miles north Deerfield were allies of military forces of 200-2300 French and Indians. These men had traveled close to 300 miles to reach the spot, and now they were ready to attack. Silently they crossed the river and traversed the first two miles of open farmland toward the sleeping town. Heavy drifts piled snow against the walls of the fort, so high that the attackers easily scaled the walls. Without a night watch to contend with, the warriors quickly moved in.

At the battle's end, the survivors grimly assessed the town's losses. Fifty-six Englishman, women and children lay dead; another 109 had been captured. In all, three-fifths of the townspeople were gone, and almost half of the houses had been burned. Unlike the villages of 1664, in 1675, Deerfield had not been abandoned, so almost everyone was killed.

Canadian John Sheldon was an essential figure in the efforts for the recovery and redemption of the captains. His wife and baby, his problem loan, and daughters had been a burden. For his own children, his wife's brother with a large family, suffering under captivity on the 19th of December, he announced that Capt. John Livingstone of Albany, who was acquainted with the route by the lakes, was in town and was willing to give Sheldon 100 pounds and his expenses.

Their route was over the Housac Mountains to Albany, and then northward through the wilderness slowly. They traversed Lake George and Champlain, down the Sorel to the St Lawrence, and thence to Québec, where the worried travelers arrived without having been molested by the savages.

Rape education: we must open our eyes

This year during the Orchard Hill "Bowl Day" festivities, there was fun, food, music, a little disorderly conduct and the occasional acquaintance rape. Wait a moment. Let's come back to that last one.

For obvious reasons, the name of the young woman and the exact details of the incident have been kept private for the protection of all parties. Unfortunately, her story is one that is becoming all too common and is part of a disturbing and continuing trend.

According to current statistics, nine percent of all women have been sexually assaulted and about 25 percent have been subject to an attempted or completed rape. Probably the most disturbing aspect of all these stats is that more that 80 percent of the women who are assaulted know their attacker. In fact, less than 16 percent of all rape incidents involve total strangers. The numbers are disturbing, to say the least. Violence is rarely condonable, but violence against women is truly abhorred.

What makes acquaintance rape especially heinous is not only the fact that it is the outright desecration of a woman's body, but the contravention of the trust. Many of the young women are close enough to the attacker so as to let their guard down as part of having a good time. Often they are under the influence, sometimes they are drunk, and on less frequent occasions, they are passed out and unconscious.

By its very nature, acquaintance rape is reported less frequently. Fear of social rejection, scarred reputations and outright disbelief by friends and family keep those who have been victimized from saying anything at all. As absurd as it may sound, it really does happen. Meanwhile, feelings of guilt and dirtiness consume the unfortunate young women, creating feelings of isolation and compounding the problem.

Most rapists are never caught, partially because most are not reported, but also because there is not enough physical evidence in the cases that are reported. Emotional trauma and general lack of education as to what to do in those situations prevents these women from ever seeing their day in court and facing the man who did them wrong. Just because the evidence is not there, however, it doesn't mean that it didn't happen.

Though education and preventative measures work, raising awareness and understanding about what makes rape so vile is the best thing that can be done. If a young woman comes to you for help, believing the woman is the first step to helping her recover. Listening to her, and helping her come to terms with the situation are equally important. But under all circumstances, make sure you remind her that it is not her fault.

Rape is not sexy, nor fun, and despite accusations, is never the fault of the woman. Despite any vibe she may be putting out, or reputation she might have acquired, there is nothing that could possibly justify sexual assault. Though it seems like we hear about it all the time, it bears repeating, and as an ever-expanding community that values its open-minded and socially forward attitude, we need to take a stand and make sure we stay vigilant.

'Evolving' into something better

ELANA PREMACK

In high school, my friends called it a cult. And I guess, looking back, it was.

It made me believe things about myself that weren't true. I learned how to engage in ritualistic behaviors. There were others, so many of us, who submitted to our leader.

We submitted by meeting deadlines, learning to write proper leads and keeping our stories concise. These were our rituals. We believed that if we followed these rules, we would be saved from the sad fate that awaited the others, the non-newspaper types. We would be good writers, and we could be journalists, those renegades who loved their jobs and could change the world.

Journalism is the "safe school" for those creative souls who are good with grammar, love language and want to make a difference. It allows us to be behind the scenes, unaware that we are directing sometimes, pawns at other times.

I found journalism and held onto it, the thing I was good at. It is a great thing to be good at something. It gives you a direction, something to major in, an extracurricular activity.

So I chose you, University of Massachusetts, with your picturesque mountain views (I read that in some college guidebook), special sewage smell and steam vents. And I chose you, Campus Center, with your concrete waffle exterior and basement that lacks air circulation and windows, as my home.

I began writing for the Collegian my freshman year. This newspaper became my way into UMass. Those rituals I learned in high school became my way into this newspaper.

I was good, so I got to stay, and I got to move up. I got to teach other people how to be good, and I got to see them move up. I got to be an editor, twice, something that was never in the original plan. Somehow, breaking from that plan of just writing began to deprogram me. I started to see something wrong with the rituals.

I started to think about what I would mean if in 10 or 20 years I got a phone call from an editor telling me that serial rapes made good copy. I thought about the idea of being on call all the time, because news happens all the time, and I didn't like it. I thought back to the pool of blood I looked at objectively my sophomore year. That blood belonged to someone who was hit by a car, someone who died. And I wrote about it for the Collegian. I have the clips to prove it.

Those clips I had been collecting started to matter a lot less. I decided that there had to be something else I was good at other than writing about other people's lives. Also, I got scared about who I was becoming. I officially left the Collegian newsroom a the end of the first semester of my junior year.

Now I do other things. I work for an organization that helps people make sense out of what's happening in their lives and refers them to people and resources that they can use to make things better for themselves. I do the same things I intended to do as a journalist, but couldn't remember to do between all the rituals.

My mom says that my goals have "evolved." I think, maybe, that what was a simple snake that stuck on its belly has grown legs to run in a positive direction. And as we, as humans, keep some of the traits of the ape, I will never forget what it was like to slither.

Thank you, UMass, for being the place that let me grow legs.

Thank you, New England's largest collegiate daily, for being a great lab for journalism experiments, and a better place to meet really passionate people.

Thank you, brain and heart, for working together to help me express four years of fingers covered in newsprint. For a while, I have wondered what it would be like to stop being "that girl who works for the Collegian." Now I know.

Elana Premack will spend next year working to create meaningful Jewish experiences with students at the University of Illinois Urbana-Champaign as a fellow with Hillel's Jewish Campus Service Corps.

'Sub' Senior: A look back

NATTY YAGUDIN

So there was Tony, on the other line, asking me what to do about $59] of spoiled meats, cheeses and vegetables. I could already imagine what the Sylvan Snack Bar must have smelled like. The rotting salamis probably stunk up the whole basement floor of McNamara Hall.

Nothing in my business classes had prepared me for this. I had joined the Center for Student Businesses (CSB) as a Student Business Consultant five semesters before, hoping to learn more about how to make financial statements for the student-run businesses on campus.

And here I was now, clueless about how to re-open the small snack bar, after a blackout during Thanksgiving last semester had warmed the fridges and wiped away our chances of selling sub sandwiches for the last few weeks left of school.

At the next staff meeting, we decided to close. The snack bar would not open till the next semester. We had to swallow the losses and move on.

Tony didn't show it, but I knew he was very upset. Then again, I couldn't expect anything else.

If you ever came down to Sylvan Snack Bar when Tony was working, you knew your sub was in good hands. He was one of those employees that any business could only dream to have. His passion was reflected in the quickness of his hands. He knew how to make a sub.

Once while he was preparing a sub, one mushroom fell out. He caught it in mid-air and returned it to its place. He then wrapped the sub up and handed it to the customer with a dead serious look.

Heather, another co-worker, always had a smile on when she worked, even when she was stressed out and had an exam the next morning. Somehow, being at the snack bar transformed her. Noting down her experience, she wrote a new employee handbook for the snack bar.

Heather, Tony and a few other employees asked me to drive them to Stop and Shop during the storms this past March to buy bread, since we had run out the night before. They dug my car out of the purple parking lot and we drove slowly, in the middle of the storm, to get the big cardboard boxes full of warm buns. Few employees ever love their workplace and their customers enough to do that.

As financial organizations, the eight student-run enterprises on-campus are disastrous: I have had to beg, coax and threaten bookkeepers to get reports done on time. My work was a nightmare. By the time I got to the income statement, I was so confused that I didn't even have a clue whether we made or lost money. I still shrivel when I remember my mistakes.

I'd lie if I'd say that the student businesses were the only good thing that happened to me at UMass. I could have written about a myriad of defining experiences: the tight-knit Jewish community I spent a good part of my time involved with, writing for the Collegian, international dorm living, an unforgettable semester abroad in Mexico.

But somehow, the student businesses sticks out in my mind as a shining symbol of UMass, for good or bad: their warm sense of community, their pseudo-hippie culture, the hyper-energy of their young people, the tired bureaucratic institution that bogs them down.

I had made real friendships at the student businesses between my meetings with purchasing committees and planning boards. Some of those friendships involved my co-workers lending me sixty bucks and helping me get my car from Amherst Towing, after I illegally parked at the Campus Center Intersection on Friday afternoon. Others changed my life.

When the chancellor congratulated us for another good year at the annual student businesses dinner last week, he exclaimed how he was "basking in the reflected glory' of the student businesses. Although Tony couldn't be there and Heather didn't get to speak on the stage, I thought about them. For a moment, my throat became stuffy.

It is people like Tony, Heather and Katja – the director of the CSB – who carried me through my insane yet strangely addicting part-time job at UMass. They loved me and my work unconditionally, for all its faults. They taught and inspired me to be the best at what I want to do. Which is, after all, why I was at UMass in the first place.

They are the unsung heroes of that dinner, and of the student businesses, and of my short years at UMass.

That's why I think the best damn subs in the world are made at Sylvan Snack Bar, under the walls where past employees graffitied their signatures. Maybe, after all, the snack bar was never really about the subs.

What I learned in College. I learned that random sentences about nothing can sometimes entertain people. It explains Seinfeld at least. Well, I learned that stars can sometimes drive themselves. I learned that St. Bonaventure is a tough place to play. I learned that trolls can go out in light. That fries from the hangar have a spartan quality. Stick figures giving oral sex is wrong. Stick figures having sex is comedy. I learned that corporate hegemony is bad. But that Britney Spears is good. Oh so good. I learned that paragraphs are a waste of time. I'll just have to p tag this thing anyway.

Okay, for real, I forgot to write this, I'm hung over and Despres called asking for it, so now I am writing it and drinking coffee at 2:30 in the afternoon instead of being at class, which brings me to this point. First of all, the last sentence is a run on, something we like to call "generation Jones" in Friday afternoon. Others changed my life.

Technical error. Thanks for everything. There is too much to write, but since I'm on a favorite moment tip, how bout you puking on me. Classy. Despres. Thanks for the reminder to write this, and let me say this, it would be a tragedy to run this. The newspaper just dropped three notches. Grrr, Despres called again. Benny. Hit it. Hit it. Hit it. Only you know what I'm talking about, but still, just hit it. Rob. The double wife-beater flip cup challenge still holds a special place in my heart. Ken. Dude, you're a republican. Throw me a fricken bone here. Christen. I am not afraid of your big fat knife, but you should be scared of Helsinki. Bacorn. I've been hearing naughty things, hope they're true. Sabrina. My first ever duty with you and Laura and all I can remember is "save the drama for your mama." Laura and Greg. Thanks for being such wonderful RA's, winning awards and shit. Thanks to Abby, Gabby, Becky, Melissa, Theresa, Rob, Toya, Rehana, Smith, Robin, Saran, Emma, Allen, Kenny, Amy, Paulina, Chozi, Rupal and Nygard, for helping me get through a whole year in Southwest. Didn't think I'd make it through SW week. Good looking out Greg, especially with that bigass flashlight. 7th floor Coolidge. We've had floods, heat waves, pool parties, and everything on our floor broken this year. But we all made it through. Good luck to all of you. Debbie. You said to mention you even though you aren't gonna see this, so I am. Ed. How are you still alive man? Crazy. Kara, Kara, Kara. See, I mentioned you three times. Impressive. I will miss you and our conversations in Jhally's class... wait a second, you never go. Sarah I was sad you didn't come to the last party. So now the last moment in my life that I saw you, you were dressed up like Alice in Wonderland, hair drenched wet, sitting on an examination table, getting prescription for all kinds of drugs. Is that the lasting impression you want me to have? If you don't get the irony of the giant paragraph, you aren't a copy editor or on web staff. Chris, thanks for the time man, and don't settle for that mock-up. You da man now dog. Despres, I swear I'm almost done. And you I would like to also thank for the wonderful walks to Rao's we've had. See ya, peace out cub scout, bling, bling, etc.

The end has come, and for me it hasn't come soon enough. Normally in this space, one of two things happens. Either someone writes some metaphysical comparison to his or her life in college to a flower growing or something like that or they right a shout out column. I should have asked Koenig for advice, cause he's written three of these.

But this very newspaper has a life of its own. There are stories behind the stories, that most of you will never see. It's about people, people like you, except they work for close to nothing because they enjoys newswriting or the environment, but no matter the reason, we have a special bond. Now, I know you just pick up the paper for the damn crossword or the fricken horoscopes, but there is actual work being done. And for my part in it, I thank everyone else I didn't name specifically. It's those of you that make this very column possible. And for that you should be ashamed, so very ashamed. So final thanks to my peeps in the Comm department for keeping it real, or at least really interesting. It's all the same. And I'm spent. 'Yo Despres, I did it.

Bastard Sons of Johnny Cash off to solid start

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

THE BASTARD SONGS OF JOHNNY CASH
Walk Alone
Ultimatum Music

The Bastard Sons of Johnny Cash might be the best name in music. The music isn't half bad either.

A crooning group of San Diego country players, the Sons have Johnny Cash's approval of the name and that in hand, they've released Walk Alone, an alt-country fusion in the same vein as a BR-549 or Junior Brown or the Mavericks. But there's something more about the music, something more about the presentation. Their music is a soulful sort of smooth.

For a debut album, the Sons are remarkably polished. Walk Alone sounds like the work of a band considerably older and more experienced; perhaps the only obvious drawback is lead singer Mark Stuart's insistence on riffing while singing, repeating lines again and again and again. It gets very old very fast.

But when Stuart isn't country scat singing, the Sons' music is sultry country, lonesome and sad. "Trains Gonna Roll" is an up-tempo song about a girl becoming a woman. "She's got the body of a woman/but inside she's another little girl," croons Stuart. His lyrics are sparse and bare; his voice is pure country. He sounds like a country Chris Isaak.

"Crying Over You" is a fast paced song that, like all good country songs, is depressing. Upbeat, offbeat, no beat or slow beat, country songs are depressing things and "Crying Over You" is no exception. A song about an evil woman who treats her man (popular theme) poorly; the musicianship is excellent, if not restrained, featuring pedal-steel player Chris Lawrence, a welcome addition on the album. Nothing's more genuine to the Sons' music than the only instrument that seems to be specifically played within one genre. The same critique applies to the album's opening track "Texas Sun," a song of tribute to a beautiful woman and a warm drive under the sun.

But perhaps the most meaningful song on the album is "440 Horses," a tribute to the man in black himself. "The lonely lights/ of another lonely town/ the lonely highway/ I keep on rushing down/ there's a hundred miles til I sleep tonight/ and I've got to put the hammer down" Stuart sings, referencing Cash's lonely life, later singing about sitting with the devil himself.

There's a cover of Merle Haggard's "Silver Wings" thrown onto the album for good measure, but the Sons' real talent is in their ability to produce country music that a purist could love. There's a very dusty, a very lonely feeling in the music that the Sons make. The band's first album is a phenomenal debut and the future is bright for a band that's paid considerable heed to a man whose life has been spent in a dark existence. A strange irony, but one that makes for wonderful music.

Ruby Dune's debut LP mixes sonic joy with (too) long jams

By David Troupes

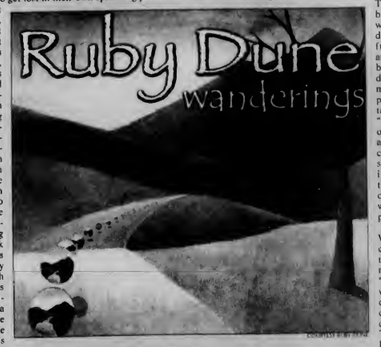
RUBY DUNE
Wanderings
self-release

Ruby Dune recently celebrated the release of their first album, Wanderings, at the Iron Horse Music Hall, and the album, a long time in coming for a band that has been turning over the same material for several semesters in a constant process of improvement and refinement, demonstrates both their obvious instrumental talent and tightness as a band, and their propensity to get lost in their own sprawling jams.

The first two tracks, in the best and worst traditions of Phish, are less interested in songwriting than in providing its musicians, especially guitarist Vim Tingle, a simple structure in which to solo. The album opening title track moves quickly through two verses before settling into a two-minute showcase for Tingle's fluid and soaring guitar licks: and as excellent a musician as he is, sitting through passage after passage of his deliriously happy soloing gets tiring. The second song, "The Ball," falls into the same trap. Both are fun songs in doses, with great hooks and highly danceable beats, but both suffer from lack of contrast to their endlessly cheerful postures.



The debut release of UMass' Ruby Dune

Tingle's lyrics spend most of their time guiding the listener through hippie reveries – "The trees begin to sway/ and dance in the swampy breeze/ and the moonlight casts their shadows upon ground" – and although not particularly interesting, they work well as set pieces for the band's sunlit musical textures.

Thankfully, Ruby Dune doesn't spend all of its time on such joy-benders; the third track, "Heyoka," takes a minor key acoustic stance which, some trite lyricism notwithstanding, expands the listener's understanding of the band's capabilities.

It's on "Jay's Theme," however, that the band truly begins to shine. Keyboardist Jason Zubiel takes over lead vocal duties, his more direct, soulful delivery a much-appreciated changeup after three tracks of Tingle's gentle crooning. Zubiel also takes center stage instrumentally, propelling the song with a thick, moody keyboard figure supported by a rhythm section that never oversteps its bounds; the trippy guitar break that's connected from the rest of the song and could have been shortened, but otherwise "Jay's Theme" is the most coherent and compelling piece of music Wanderings has to offer. Even the lyrics are several notches above average, painting an intriguingly gritty narrative.

The rest of the album continues with this mixture of sunny hippie overtones and more angular musical stances. "Worm" is a slower iteration of "Wanderings" and "The Ball," good but already feeling tired; Tom Thoe moves between wah-wah-driven funk, soft and viscous breakdowns, and manic-paced guitar soloing; "Tide" offers more acoustic-centered songwriting, this time fleshed out gently with reed pipes.

Wanderings closes with the instrumental "Icicles," which boils down to one last chance for Tingle to let fly his incredible soloing, Tingle's lyrics spend most of their time guiding the listener through hippie reveries – "The trees begin to sway/ and dance in the swampy breeze/ and the moonlight casts their shadows upon ground" – and although not particularly interesting, they work well as set pieces for the band's sunlit musical textures.

Duchovny's career evolves

By Chris Terry
The Towerlight (Towson U.)

(U-WIRE) TOWSON, Md. – David Duchovny spent eight years hunting monsters and chasing little green men as FBI agent Fox Mulder on the hit TV show "The X-Files." The 40-year-old actor, who recently left the show to spend more time working on films, is now seeing his career evolve. But his strong sense of irony hasn't left his side.

The New York-raised Princeton University-educated actor stars in director Ivan Reitman's newest project, "Evolution," which follows an unconventional team of scientists as they investigate a meteor and the alien life forms that crashed to earth with it.

Duchovny said he may still be investigating paranormal activity in "Evolution," but working on Reitman's sci-fi-influenced comedy is a nice change of pace from "The X-Files," and certainly a different kind of challenge.

"Anything different is a breath of fresh air," Duchovny said. "But comedies are probably harder. In a drama or any other kind of film, you can walk out and say, 'Well I kind of liked it.' With a comedy, if people don't laugh, that's it. It's actually very nerve-racking making a comedy."

Though it's still a challenge to bring his witty, yet dry sense of humor to the big screen, Duchovny said he was primed for comedy by the two opportunities he's had to host "Saturday Night Live," and he hopes he can do it again in the near future.

Duchovny, who has been a part of the real "Celebrity Jeopardy" as well as the popular "SNL" parody, said the comedic version was more difficult. "[My impression of Jeff Goldblum] was really subtle and I didn't know when I was doing it," Duchovny said. "When you're doing a really extreme accent you kind of know when you've got it, but I could have gone out there and done Goldblum and it would have been nothing at all. 'Celebrity Jeopardy' [wasn't as difficult]. I think they dumb down the questions pretty severely."

Working on "Evolution," however, has given the Duchovny a great opportunity to work on his comedy as he pairs up with Orlando Jones ("Double Take").

"[Working with Orlando Jones] was great," Duchovny said. "When he shows up on time he's fantastic. He's got a lot of energy."

Jones, who has actually never done stand-up, started his career on the sketch comedy show "Mad TV" in 1995. Since then he has appeared in films such as "The Replacements" and "Bedazzled" and may be best known for his recent series of 7-Up commercials.

"Usually I do movies solely based on 'Would I go pay money to see this?' " Jones said. "I'm not a big special effects guy and I thought this is probably the only special effects movie I'm going to want to go see. It's more of a comedy than special effects."

Jones admitted that "Evolution," a comedy about unconventional heroes who save the world from supernatural destruction, bears a similar context to Reitman's "Ghostbusters." But Jones said he took to the film because he knew he wouldn't be typecast as "the black guy."

"The first words out of my mouth were, 'I will not be the black Ghostbuster,' " Jones said. "And I was serious. But this was the first time I've ever seen a black guy and a white guy on film and one of them wasn't in jail, or their relationship wasn't about the fact that they were different races, they were just friends. To me that was important."

Along with Jones, 25 year-old Seann William Scott, who Reitman met while working as a producer for 'Road Trip,' serves as the films second source of comic relief. But, unlike Jones, Scott never expected to get into comedy when he moved to L.A. right after graduating from high school.

"I didn't really feel like comedy was my strong point when I was auditioning for things," Scott said. "I would turn down comedy auditions. Then I got 'American Pie' and I thought, 'This looks so funny, I got to try and get a part in this.' "

With the success of "American Pie" and Scott's memorable portrayal of Stifler, the pretentious party-driven jock, comedy has become his staple and Scott said he enjoyed filming "American Pie 2," which is currently in post-production.

"We all made the decision to come back because we believe in it," Scott said. "We thought we could really fix and make this funnier than the first one. We didn't want it to be 'Speed 2.' We didn't want people to say, 'Why? Why'd you make that?' "

And while Scott is trying to choose his roles carefully, he was thrilled to get offered a part in "Evolution," though he admits he had to put up with a lot of pranks for being the young guy on the set.

"I would go in my trailer and all my shit would be gone. They would hide it," Scott said about Duchovny and Jones. "I'd put a sweatshirt on and there'd be meat and vegetables in the pockets. So I felt like I was the little brother always getting picked on."

Reitman said that the chemistry between the actors was evident both on screen and off, and one of the best aspects of making "Evolution" is the unique ensemble cast, which also includes Oscar nominee Julianne Moore ("Boogie Nights").

"It was a lot of fun because all four of the principle actors are just great," Reitman said. "I've worked with terrible actors, but this was a genuinely good group; guys with real talent. It was fun to come to work everyday."

"Evolution" is scheduled to open nationwide on June 8.

Indie artist Monc gives suits the finger with new unique release

By Chris Moriates
Daily Bruin (U. California-Los Angeles)

(U-WIRE) LOS ANGELES – A revolution is coming. Monc can feel it. The U.K.-born indie artist is more than ready for something to come along and turn the current corporate-run music industry on its head. Not only does he expect it to happen, but he is also doing his part to start it.

With his second five-track EP/CD-ROM, "Guilty," released on his own label, Conglomerated Industries, Monc once again steps off the beaten-path of the mainstream music industry. The EP includes a video of a day in the life of a "lo-fi-cuddly alien" as well as MP3 files of all five songs, which are roads and encouraged to be freely traded. Take that Sony and Metallica!

"Made with no corporate interference," the green economy-style cardboard album cover clearly boasts in white writing. In true guerrilla fashion, Monc fights to carve his own unique path in the music world.

"The whole structure is so corporate and weighed down," Monc said as he sat on a bench at the Sunset Recreational Pool on a cloudy spring day. "So we decided to use the Web primarily to get the music out independently."

The 28-year-old artist, who now resides in Hollywood, raised enough money to put out two albums, start his own label and develop a creative Web site (www.monc.net).

The Web site is as interesting as Monc himself, including a strange interactive trip to "Planet Monc," where a visitor can explore the virtual musical world and even try their hand at mixing their own Monc song.

Trying to put a label on Monc's style of music is like trying to use a fake ID to get into the 21-and-over bars where he regularly performs: it can be done, but you sure don't want to be caught attempting to do it.

"The English trip-hop style has a big influence on me," Monc said. "And then there's a lot of 60s sort of guitar bands that I like. I sort of put it together."

He claims that his inspirations are anything "that's got soul." When pinned down to name a few of his musical heroes, he unloads a laundry list ranging from Radiohead and Bob Marley to John Coltrane.

Originally composing all the songs completely by himself and hiring studio musicians to record, Monc has now assembled a full band comprised of American musicians. He will, however, continue to arrange all the instruments and maintain creative control over his music.

Armed with a mini-tape recorder in one hand and the steering wheel in the other, Monc can be seen stuck in L.A. traffic, working on a new album.

"When I'm driving, I hardly listen to music because I am always writing it," Monc said, citing the trip to the Sunset pool as no exception. "A little tape recorder is the best way to get down ideas, especially for drum 'n' bass type of stuff."

Currently he is planning a double-album to be released. Monc also has plans to tour college campuses throughout the U.S., where his music has become popular on college radio. Some 200 college radio stations have added Monc's first EP, "Virtual Reality Spacesuit," to their programming, and the record is receiving between 600 and 700 spins per week. He will continue to fight the battle to do things his way and not give in to industry control.

Monc's previously unreleased track "Stone" has been included on the "Memento" soundtrack. The album will be released on May 22 and also features tunes by Björk, Radiohead, Moby and David Bowie.

"The key thing is to try and keep it as indie as possible without selling-out," Monc said. "I'm trying to feed it into the machinery without losing the autonomy."

Iceland's own Björk will also make an appearance on the Memento soundtrack.

'Diary of Anne Frank' miniseries

By Jennifer Fogel
Michigan Daily (U. Michigan)

(U-WIRE) ANN ARBOR, Mich. – It can be hard to be objective when it comes to reviewing entertainment based on historical fact; even worse when it is a story that you have understood your entire life. As May sweeps draw to a close, ABC presents another biographical-based miniseries this time taking up the challenge of accurately presenting the life of Anne Frank.

"The Diary of Anne Frank" is the most read non-fiction work in the world after the Bible. Anne's diary has become an Introduction to the Holocaust for many, and continues to challenge even the most pessimistic of us to accept that there is hope in the midst of great tragedy. This young girl, a complete stranger, has imposed her story onto all of us; now ABC is not only bringing you a visual representation of the novel, but filling us in on what became of Anne after she left the "secret annex."

The movie is not based on the diary itself, but takes its story from Melissa Müller's own biography of Anne. The miniseries takes us to Amsterdam before the beginning of the war, revealing a childish and naïve Anne whose only care in life was her dreams of becoming a modern women. Eventually these dreams turn into hope as Anne and her family went into hiding. Hidden away, Anne lives out the most important years of her life confined in an attic with only her diary as an outlet for her pain.

Of course we all know the story and how it ends, but like many of the previous ABC miniseries ("Me and My Shadows: The Judy Garland Story," "The Three Stooges") "Anne Frank" takes on a life of its own. We tingle at Anne and Peter's first kiss. We shiver as Anne's hair is shorn. We laugh at the jokes. We smile at Anne's defiance. Yet, we never seem to forget that tragedy is looming. Besides, just when we think that it's over, we are pelted over the head with the realization that for the first time we are actually going to see the end result. The distance once held between the words on the page and us is now depicted on the screen, provided the answers that we longed for yet didn't want to believe.

For those who are expecting another cheesy miniseries, you are in for quite a surprise. Hannah Taylor Gordon ("Jakob the Liar") portrays Anne with such conviction that you often forget she is just a girl posing in someone else's shadow. "Anne Frank" tries to present us with an overall picture, one created from the nuances of "trivial" events in a teenager's life. The struggle to be seen as a woman in the eyes of adults, the rift between mother and daughter, the blossoming of young love and the closeness of a father and his daughter, Anne's faith, and her constant struggle to stay above the sadness and trauma that surrounded her, center the movie and make it more than a standard screen adaptation.

Performances by big-name stars like Ben Kingsley ("Schindler's List") as Otto Frank and Lili Taylor ("The Haunting") as Miep Gies top an entire cast of great performers, each bringing their own emotion to their characters and giving us one more reason to sit back and just be taken in by the story.

The miniseries will air in two parts starting Sunday, May 20 and concluding on Monday with a special commercial-free final hour. The movie not only delves into the lives of Miep and other friends of Anne's, but will reveal the identity of the Franks' betrayers as well.

It is an amazement to behold the courage and faith that one little girl could bring to life. Her story may only be but one of many that are still untold, but Anne's seems to stay with us. This miniseries not only faithfully depicts her story, but improves our own understanding of a beautiful and innocent girl that lost her life among six million others.

Another A-10 crown

With conference title, Softball on to NCAA's

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

It is hard to believe that Geena Davis, Rosie O'Donnell and Madonna do not play for the Massachusetts softball team because after winning its seventh consecutive Atlantic 10 championship over the weekend, it has put the Minutewomen in "a league of their own."

Saturday in Dayton Ohio, 23rd-ranked UMass continued its dominance over the rest of the conference and defeated Rhode Island, 5-1, to win the 2001 Verizon A-10 Championship. With the win it finished conference play with a perfect 24-0 record and earned an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament.

This Thursday the Minutewomen will travel to Norman, Okla. to duel with the North Carolina Tar Heels in the first game of the NCAA Regionals. UMass earned the fourth seed in the bracket and UNC is the No. 5 seed.

DAN SANTELLA-COLLEGIAN

The Massachusetts softball team went undefeated this season in Atlantic 10 play.

Other teams in the grouping include Seton Hall, Lehigh, Washington and the No. 5 ranked team in the country, Oklahoma.

"We are finally a collective unit and we are ready for the challenge," said co-captain Jen Hadley. "This is the best place we've been in all season long."

In the last 50 innings, the Minutewomen have let up only three runs – an amazing feat. Like many games before, the excellent pitching and glove work was the catalyst in the victory over URI.

Hadley got the start in the title game and was a complete force on the mound. She scattered four hits and fanned five to improve her record to 19-6.

"I started off well but I got a little comfortable in the middle innings," the junior said. "I started giving it all again in the seventh inning."

Behind the confidence of coach Elaine Sortino, Hadley pitched every single inning of the A-10 tourney. According to Hadley, she was surprised that she started every game but was happy to see that her coach feels confident in her abilities.

"Anyone of us could have pitched," she said, referring to her fellow pitchers – sophomore Kaila Holtz and senior Carrie Jeffries. "It was a great confidence boost."

In 20 innings of work, the Bristol, Conn. native went 3-0 with only one earned run and eight hits for the weekend.

"I struggled with my location at points but my defense made up for a lot of my mistakes," she said.

Hadley also got help from the offense. And it came from an unlikely candidate.

With two women on base and with UMass winning 2-0 in the bottom of the fifth, senior Debbie Tomoguchi hit her first career home run to soften the cushion and make the score 4-0.

Tomoguchi finished the day 1-1 with three RBI and a run scored.

Always consistent Teri Rooney added to the UMass hitting attack by continuing her blistering pace at the plate. The junior second baseman went 3-4 for the day with three singles.

UMass had four players named to the All-Championship team following their victory. Shortstop Emily Robinelli, third baseman Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler, Hadley and Rooney were awarded for their performances in the three-game tourney.

"Everybody is sticking it out and getting the job done now," Hadley said.

UMass comes into their contest with high confidence but they know it is going to be tough playing against some of the top teams in the nation.

"We know we have to play really well to win, so our mind set is different for than it has been all year," Hadley said.

"We were up and down with some of the weaker opponents all season long," she added. "However, the thing is we have not reached the best of our abilities.

On to Greener pastures

By Elena Panesis
Collegian Staff

When he first stepped onto the Massachusetts campus three years ago – after transferring from the University of Texas – Bill Greenler didn't exactly planned to have a full college experience.

He did not, however, plan to play tennis for coach Judy Dixon and serve as the Massachusetts men's tennis team's captain and inspirational leader.

Sometimes the best things in life are unplanned.

"I didn't think I wanted to play tennis in college," Greener said. "I didn't really pursue any college programs and I didn't get recruited. I called coach Dixon and she gave me a tryout. Then the assistant coach, at the time, put in a good word for me and I made the team."

Greener's journey to success at the collegiate level began at age nine when he began taking lessons from the ultimate coach – his father.

"My dad was the only true coach that I had," Greener said. "He was a great hitting partner. He taught me so much and really got me motivated to play tennis."

His father also taught him the importance of a well-rounded lifestyle. The son of two teachers, Greener's academic record would make any parent proud. The Commonwealth College scholar has made the Athletic Honor Roll and the Dean's List a countless number of times in his three-year tenure at the University. He also served in the Student Government Association (SGA) senate in Northeast his sophomore year and in Southwest his junior year.

"I like getting involved," Greener said. "I love this school and I want to give back to it in any way that I can. With the SGA, I was so involved with campus affairs. I worked on the finance committee and we helped get funding for RSO's [Registered Student Organizations] that needed money for events. It was so rewarding to know we could get them that money just to get them over the hump."

In his final year of college, Greener moved off campus and decided to focus more of his attention toward his first and foremost love – tennis. The Walpole native played solid tennis at UMass with a tough work ethic and commitment to both the sport and his teammates. During the fall 2000 season, he posted a 5-3 record at the No. 5 and 6 spots. It was a solid follow up to an impressive junior year as he went 13-6, leading the team with nine singles wins in the fall season.

Yet, Greener will treasure his senior year most of all as the Minutemen went on a wild ride all the way to the finals of the Atlantic 10 tournament. With some thrilling wins against tough opponents like Boston College, Duquesne University and Temple University, Greener and his teammates have a lot to smile about. They placed second in the Atlantic 10 conference – their best finish in Massachusetts men's tennis history.

"My senior year was so great," he said. "First, in the fall, we beat Boston College 4-3 at their place. Then we killed Duquesne 7-0 after they shut us out last year. Then we went and beat Temple 4-3 in a really close match."

Though Greenler has a competitive fire and loves to battle on the court, his off-court memories hold a much deeper place in his heart. He enjoyed some of his best days with his teammates and developed a brotherhood that will not lose its strength even after he graduates.

"I'm really going to miss my teammates," Greener said. "If you asked me what my record was, I couldn't tell you. I remember road trips and going out with these guys on weekends. I feel like I formed a real fraternity or brotherhood. That's what makes it so special."

The rest of the team agrees with Greener. They respect him not only for his play on the court but for the incredible character and dedication to them on a personal level.

"He plays with heart," freshman Brent Davis said. "He always gives you one hundred and ten percent. He just always pulls through in the clutch."

"We get along great on and off the court," junior Todd Champeau said. "On the court, he's a tough competitor and he's one of the people that we built a program around. He set a standard in practice that definitely rubs off. Off the court, he'll bend over backwards for you."

Though it will be tough for many to see him leave, Greener, a Finance major, has a bright future ahead of him in the investment world. This summer he begins training in New York for his position at Goldman Sachs, an investment bank in Boston. It's a three-year program with a focus in investment research.

"I really wanted to focus on getting a job my senior year," Greener said. "And a couple of alumni were really influential in helping me get the position."

In his years on the UMass campus, Greener has set a precedent as the ultimate student athlete serving as a leader on the court and in the classroom. His never ceasing smile and heart of gold touched so many on the campus and will be sorely missed.

"Bill is my best friend," Champeau said. "He's the greatest kid I know. It's going to be hard to lose someone with his character. It really won't be the same without him."

that you were rising up to falling back down."

Yet DePaula did not let the setback get her down and she once again showed herself to be a key component in the UMass attack in 2000. She scored four goals and added two assists for six points during her junior year. Also that year Barnes took over the head coaching reigns from McClellen and led the Maroon and White to its first ever A-10 title, a title DePaula played a major role in.

"She came off the bench in the A-10 semifinal against Virginia Tech and played some big minutes for us," said Barnes. "She was a key to that win and really defined who she was as a player."

While Kara showed flashes of brilliance during her first three years in Amherst, she never really put it all together on a consistent basis. That is, until this year.

In 2001 DePaula tallied career highs in goals, assists, points, games played, games started and shots. Her 22 points tied her for fourth on the team's scoring chart with Leslie Pollock while her 15 assists ranked second behind fellow senior Fay Naber.

"She was a more consistent attacker this season and started to perform up to her capabilities," said Barnes.

Yet not all of 2001 was rosy for DePaula as she struggled during the early stages of the season and quickly found herself back on the bench. The benching served as a wake up call to the senior and she quickly turned it around and regained the form that she had shown flashes of before.

"The amount of scoring opportunities for both Kara and the team improved [following the benching,]" Barnes said. "She started to contribute and really take charge of our attack."

Throughout her career DePaula, who will work as an account manager for Renaissance Inn's after graduation, has overcome obstacle after obstacle. But through it all she has asked for is a chance to shine.

"All I ever wanted to do was prove it to people that I could do it. I just wanted the chance to prove it to people that I could play and I will be able to look back on this and feel satisfied that I did it."

■ Kunkel

incredible, it's the best feeling you could possibly have."

If it's true that flattering the net is an instant surge of bliss, then Kunkel gave himself a 14-game pass to sheer ecstasy.

The senior capped off his UMass career with his best season to date. Kunkel ripped of a 33-goal performance while compiling 13 helpers for a team-high 48 points.

His best game of the year came against regional rival Yale when Kunkel out-dueled the nation's top scorer (at the time), Brian Hunt.

He had the Bulldogs jawing at thin air as he dusted keeper Adam Oppenheimer for six tallies in a 14-7 win.

Quick to deflect the attention, Kunkel directed the credit of his career- best season toward his teammates.

"This year was a lot different," he said. "We had a bunch of other kids who could score the ball as well."

While Kunkel may prefer to pass on the title of best offensive player on the team, his coach for the past four years is just as quick to praise his top scorer and note the expectations he brought with him.

"Richie has been a big time goal scorer since he's gotten here," Cannella said. "That's what he did in high school and that's what he did here. I expected nothing less from him and he's done that his whole career."

Following in the footsteps of legendary UMass scorers such as Mark Millon and Jeff Spooner, Kunkel etched his own place in history this past year.

"I think he's been the most focused and the most driven this year than any other year," Cannella said.

His 124 career points place him in the top-20 all time at UMass, but the 89 goals he has scored make Kunkel one of the most prolific snipers in the history of the program.

In his final year of collegiate lacrosse, Kunkel moved up the goal scoring charts with the same adroitness that he used to fill the nets of Richard F. Garber Field. In 14 regular season games, he surpassed both Rochester Rattlers professional Tim Soudan and Bridgeport Barrage attackman Tom Carmean to move into 12th place all time on the UMass goal-scoring list.

Kunkel's lacrosse career, if he chooses, may be over, but his appetite for scoring may never be quenched. So, if anywhere a net flutters, or somewhere the twine is tickled, don't be shocked to see number 14, poised and silent, with one arm raised toward the sky.

I never know what mood I'll be in.....

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Take care you don't lose track of your own financial standing today. You cannot afford to increase spending indiscriminately.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – What you've been searching for may prove especially elusive today – after you have made such progress over the past days and weeks.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You mustn't be too impersonal today. A friendly approach can get you more in the long run than an overly serious, businesslike strategy.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You mustn't let you won inhibitions put a strangehold on your desires. Today, you can surely break through a few stubborn obstacles.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Your concern for your own financial security will be on the rise at this time – and, perhaps, not without reason. Avoid unnecessary risks.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Contract negotiations and other financial concerns are highlighted today. You may have to make a sacrifice now in order to reap rewards later.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Focus on the finer points of behavior today and you'll surely impress all those who have it in their power to do an important favor or two.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Talk is cheap today – but it can serve you well as you attempt to get to the bottom of a particularly stubborn problem. Communication is the key.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – This is a good day to refine your own appearance, surroundings and lifestyle. Make changes permanently if you are so inclined.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – What begins with fireworks may not end in a bang at all today – but rather with the proverbial whimper. Don't let the energy die out too soon!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You can especially enjoy any sign given to you today that you are "one-of-a-kind" – and you may get more than your share before the day is out.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You may have to work with someone more closely than usual today before you will get the results you are after. A few compromises may be necessary.

New recruits may provide cutting edge for Minutemen

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

After a season in which it finished just shy of a spot in the Hockey East playoffs, the Massachusetts hockey team has bolstered its roster by signing nine incoming recruits from in state and beyond.

The Maroon and White will have to replace a talented senior class that included star goaltender Markus Helanen, captain and second-leading scorer Jeff Turner and a host of other key players.

In net, the Minutemen expect to get continued strong play out of senior Mike Johnson, but coach Don Cahoon has also signed one of the top netminding prospects in the region. Tim Warner, brother of UMass forward Mike Warner, is viewed as a strong skater that plays with a lot of confidence in the net. Warner was named the MVP of the prestigious New England Prep School Tournament last season after leading Avon Old Farms to the title.

"I expect very much that he'll challenge Mike [Johnson] for time in net next year," Cahoon said. "He'll be involved as a player. He was obviously a critical recruit for us because of the position he plays."

There will be a wealth of talent coming to the team up front next year as well. Cahoon has already signed five forwards, four of which hail from the Bay State. In addition, the coach is hosting another recruit this week, reportedly a center from Ontario.

The one signed forward not from Massachusetts is Justin Rafferty, a quick, good skating forward who played last for Capital District Selects, in Albany, N.Y.

"Justin's a very clever player," Cahoon said. "He's more of peripheral player than the other kids we've signed. He's clearly a skill player used on the power play, and when he has room, he can make plays."

Craig MacDonald, Greg Mauldin, Matt Walsh and Peter Trovato are the four frontliners who hail from Massachusetts. MacDonald is a tough forward who also passes the puck with precision. The 5'11" 190-pound forward from Canton, Mass. has drawn attention from scouts across the country.

"He's the type of player that you would use in power play situations. He's someone that will get people the puck on a very consistent basis," said Cahoon. "I think if physically he can get in great shape, he'll be a very good player at this level."

Mauldin, a 5'10" 175-pounder who played last for the Junior Bruins, is a quick, explosive skater, who plays well in all three zones. The Holliston, Mass. native shows a defensive prowess, and his speed should be helpful for the offense.

"Out of all the players we watched, he was the one getting the most puck touches," Cahoon said. "He's on the puck constantly. He has real good skating skills and real competitive instincts."

Trovato, a big, powerful skater who is in great physical condition, plays with a lot of passion and is not afraid to get down and block shots. The 6'0" 200-pounder from North Attleboro, Mass. is a grinding forward that has been known to wear his opponents down.

"He is the consummate checking forward," Cahoon said. "He's strong on the forecheck and strong on the defensive side as well. He will really be good in the grind."

As for Walsh, he hails from Arlington, Mass. and is viewed as a big, physical player who can also skate well. The 6'1" 185-pound winger attended Northfield Mount Hermon last year, and is a penalty-killing style forward who plays hard and works the puck very well.

"He's very unselfish with the puck, almost maybe to a fault," Cahoon said. "He's a good solid player with a good physical presence. We really like his competitiveness, and he's a real team type of player."

Cahoon has also added three defenders to the mix of incoming players for next year's squad. Dusty Demianiuk and Sean Regan are two blueliners who grew up locally, but attended high school in other states. Additionally, Jeff Lang from Tabor Academy will bolster the defensive troops.

Demianiuk is a 6'2" 185-pound defenseman who has drawn attention from across the nation for his crushing body checks. The Franklin, Mass. native attended high school at Mount St. Charles, where he racked up 36 penalty minutes and 15 points in his 18 games as a senior.

"He's a real raw kid who should grow to about 215 pounds," Cahoon said. "He absolutely disassembles people when he hits them, and is one of the meanest body checkers I've seen in high school in a long time."

Regan, a defenseman from South Boston, Mass. but attended the Pomfret School of Connecticut, is somewhat raw in makeup. In addition to his hockey skills, he is also strong in boxing and karate.

"I like the discipline and toughness of any martial arts," Cahoon said. "He sees ice real well, but it's going to be an adjustment for him to go through. Regan and Demianiuk both have a lot of upside."

Lang is an extremely mobile, strong skating defenseman. His speed and poise should be an asset to the experienced defensive squad. His 5'11" 175-pound frame makes him small for a defenseman, but he makes up for it with his skating and decision making.

"He's a transition type player who can jump into the offense," Cahoon said. "I would call him neither offensive nor defensive – he's something in between. He's a good all-around hockey player, a good decision maker, a good competitor. He's the most finished of three defensemen – his overall game a bit further along."

Despite the influx of talent, Cahoon still thinks the team will need another few years to become a blip on the national radar screen.

"The incoming class is not the answer to all of our issues, it's the start of what will be an ongoing progression to make a program that will compete with the best teams in country," Cahoon said. "We still have to get more quality kids in here, but we're well on our way to having back to back strong recruiting years."

Lax senior ends bumpy career

DePaula utlimately triumphs

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

Since arriving in Amherst four years ago, Kara DePaula's lacrosse career has seen more ups and downs than the stock market.

The senior Hotel, Restaurant, Travel Administration major came out of Saratoga Springs, N.Y. and Albany Academy highly recruited following a very distinguished high school career. DePaula, who was also a four-year letterwinner in soccer, was a first team all-star during her senior year and second team all-star her junior year, and represented the Empire State at the USWLA National Tournament both years. Yet despite all of her success in high school, DePaula was still forced to walk on to the UMass squad.

"My school wasn't really athletic based and it was hard to figure out how to get recruited by coaches," DePaula said. "So eventually I ended up calling Francesca (former UMass coach Francesca McClellan) last minute and I ended up being a recruited walk on."

Immediately upon arriving in Amherst, DePaula was shocked to see the difference of quality between the high school and college game. The fact that she was unprepared for the higher level of play almost led to her not even making the team.

"I came in thinking I was the best player ever and I got out there the first das and almost didn't make the team during tryouts," she said. "They've told me repetitively that one good play I had on the Thursday of tryouts was the only reason I made the team. I was in shock that whole first week from how different it was from what I thought it was going to be like."

Joining the UMass program the same time as "KD" was then-assistant coach Phil Barnes. Barnes was brought in by McClellan after two successful years as the head coach at Holy Cross and he instantly recognized DePaula's potential.

"Kara is an extremely hard working player and she's very intelligent," he said. "Her effort ever since freshman year has been that of great passion."

DePaula spent most of her freshman year on the bench, seeing action in just three of the Minutewomen's 15 games. However, despite being one of the last players off the bench and seeing limited playing time she did manage to score her first ever collegiate goal against Connecticut.

"I was the last one off the bench and there was about a minute left in the game. I got the ball and took about 15 shots in a row. I was so scared and I kept picking up the ball and shooting it and eventually I scored and I felt like Rudy. I think we won like 26-0."

However, unlike Rudy, DePaula got another chance at glory and came through big time during her sophomore year. With a year of experience under her belt and a rash of injuries in the Maroon and White attack, DePaula was forced to play a much larger role during her second year. She saw action in 12 of the Minutewomen's 15 games including the first two starts of her collegiate career.

Kara is very intelligent and knows what she wants. She came back her sophomore year with a new approach to lacrosse and played in some big games for us because of it," said Barnes.

As her playing time increased so did her scoring numbers. In the regular season finale against Duquense DePaula notched her first three-point game, notching two goals and an assist in a 9-5 victory. Despite narrowly losing to Virginia Tech 12-11 in the semifinals of the Atlantic 10 tournament that year, DePaula had gotten a taste of the big time and did not want to let go. She finished the year with four goals and three assists for a career-high seven points. But despite the vast improvement over her previous season – disappointment lay on the horizon.

Known for his lethal offensive style, senior Rich Kunkel helped the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team reach new heights.

Prolific lax sniper leaves silent legacy

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

Don't worry about Rich Kunkel – he won't bite you – that's not his style. He would much rather methodically break down your defense, sneak unnoticed into the slot and wire a due-shelf rocket to the embarrassment of your goaltender.

Save the flash and the trash talk for someone else. You'll know when Rich Kunkel burns you because all you'll hear is the whip of his stick and all you'll see is the number 14.

The role of silent assassin suits the man, as well as his game. He has a quiet confidence about him as he hovers around the crease, waiting for his mark to blink before he breaks to the hall and calls down the thunder.

Opposing coaches just never understood how to stop UMass's satin smooth scorer. Defensive coordinators would gladly let their most blood thirsty dogs loose on number 14 every time he crossed into the zone with the rock on his stick. But Kunkel would coolly shed the scent and the defenseman would get bored and lose interest – big mistake.

With the ball Kunkel is as dangerous as any attackman in the nation. Without it the senior becomes more lethal than a vampire in a blood bank.

"It's all instinct," he said. "For me, being off the ball is what gets me my shots. I don't really dodge many people."

Kunkel's stealthy talents can sometimes be mistaken for lack of production. But a quick glance at the score sheet will almost always reveal dominance.

"You think you shut him down and after the game he's got three or four goals on the score sheet," Boston College coach Dave Curnick said before the senior dropped a hat trick on his Eagles.

Kunkel always seems to avoid the spotlight, but coming out of high school, the Centereach, N.Y. native was highlighted, circled and underlined on nearly every recruiting hot sheet.

"I was also talking to Virginia, Loyola and Maryland," he said. "But I came here [to UMass] because of coach [Greg] Cannella. This was actually the only visit I went on and the day after, I knew I wanted to go here."

He played his high school lax under Joseph Cuozzo at Ward Melville, but Kunkel learned how to fill the net and conduct himself on the field from a former goaltender.

"He just told me not to think about things, just shoot, not to try to get in a goalie's head or anything," he said.

Never one to indulge in the arrogance of competition, Kunkel smartly mended his game to exclude trash talking and excessive goal celebrations. Instead the senior conducts his business with the precision and meticulousness of a stockbroker. Although he prefers Garber Field turf to Wall Street pavement, it is a rarity to see an upsurge of emotion from the man who wears 14.

It is much more likely that Kunkel will simply raise one fist in the air, as a signal of his consistent professionalism. Some may confuse his reserved method of goal scoring for a lack of passion, but if anyone has a hunger for the net – it's Kunkel.

"There's nothing better than [scoring a goal]," he said. "For those few seconds after, you just feel

3 sought in Sat. stabbing

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

A stabbing this weekend left one individual with a wound to the arm and three others wanted by the University of Massachusetts Police Department.

On Saturday night at approximately 1:30 a.m. the police responded to a call in lot 21 indicating that an individual was stabbed in the parking lot. The incident occurred following a verbal argument that eventually escalated to a physical encounter and allegedly there was a knife involved. A 20-year-old visitor to campus was taken to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield where he received six stitches to his upper arm and was released.

Police are looking for a black male approximately 5'9 in high with a small build and a dark colored baseball hat, a white male 6'0-6'1 in high with brown eyes and hair wearing a plaid shirt and a dark baseball hat (possibly Detroit Tigers). The driver, a white male operating a older model red vehicle, similar to a Ford Escort, is also wanted for questioning in conjunction with the incident.

There were reports of a male exposing himself to several females in the W.E.B Dubois Library on separate occasions.

"There were two separate incidents, different days, different times," Jim Lyons spokesman for the UMPD explained. "But the descriptions were sufficient enough to lead us to believe that it was the same person."

The individual was described as a 6 ft. tall white male with a thin build and a beard. He was wearing very short black shorts, a maroon baseball cap with a UMass logo, a t-shirt and was carrying a shoulder bag.

In Coolidge Dormitory, police received reports that an individual was entering several dormitory rooms at night.

"People reported that someone came into their room and accosted them," Lyons said. "It happened to a number of people."

All of the incidents occurred early on Sunday morning, Lyons explained that one woman reported being awakened by the individual who "put his hands on her," and then left.

The incidents are still under intense investigation by the police.

Officers were called to Patterson Dormitory after two women living in the dorm returned to find an individual that they did not know passed out on the floor of their room. Police took the 19-year-old non-UMass student into protective custody because he could not care for himself. He was later released.

A 25-year-old student was found passed out in the bushes outside of Franklin Dormitory due to alcohol on Friday at approximately 12:00 a.m. He was taken into protective custody until he was able to care for himself.

Vihn X Le an 18-year-old of Weston was arrested for an outstanding warrant on Wednesday night. He had previously had a warrant taken out against him for drugs.

There was the report of an assault in Baker Dormitory on Friday evening. Lyons explained that there was the potential for a simple assault to have occurred but it was not witnessed by a police officer. The alleged victim will seek court action regarding the incident and the altercation will be followed up with housing.

THE YEAR IN REVIEW

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

The resignation of men's basketball coach Bruiser Flint was a key event that occured last year.

The past year brought a flood of news through the media outlets of the country. From the WTO protests and presidential election debacle last fall to the China spy plane incident and Timothy McVeigh stay of execution this spring, those in the information business were kept busy scrambling to keep up when the big stories broke.

The same held true here at the University of Massachusetts. The fall 2000 – spring 2001 school year presented the student media with a wealth of exciting, high profile stories, ranging from an alleged resource abuse scandal to increased surveillance of students and three highly scrutinized resignations.

There were headlines that grabbed our attention: "Big Brother is watching," "Cover-up on Pine Street" and "Police brutality under fire." There were images that stayed with us long after the papers had been put down: the football cat from Southwest, the pizza delivery guy panhandling to get his car back after it was towed, the Minuteman mascot wrestling with the hated Husky of Connecticut at the annual U-Game.

We said goodbye to a dapper young coach named Bruiser and prepared to bid adieu to both our Chancellor and our Provost. We opened our doors to Ralph Nader, Al Sharpton and David Horowitz. We laughed along with David Chappelle and the Upright Citizen's Brigade. We cried with Judy Shepard.

Through it all, the flashbulbs never stopped popping and the presses never stopped running. What we are left with now is a printed record of a sometimes-turbulent year; what we are left with are the 10 biggest stories of the last year.

Adam White

1. Big Brother is Watching

Students in the Southwest living area came back from their summer break to find that they had a lot less privacy.

In order to try and eliminate the high amounts of crime that occurred in the living area, the police worked in a conjunctive effort with the University to place video cameras in the living area for extra-added safety.

But where was the camera? Both the police and the administration were mum on the issue in order to more effectively patrol the living area via video. Barbara Pitoniak from the News Office finally revealed the location when she verified that the camera was placed on the side of John Quincy Adams Dormitory in what was made to look like a light on the side of the building.

"As I understand it, the camera is placed on [John Quincy Adams]," Pitoniak said. She went on to explain that the camera had been placed in the living area in order to curb crime on campus.

"What's important here is not that people know the exact location of the camera," Pitoniak said. "What is important is that they know that there is a camera on them and it is viewing that particular area and taping what is occurring in the courtyard."

The camera turned out to more of a threat in daylight than when the lights went down, or in one case went out completely. The new surveillance equipment failed one of its first jobs when, during a blackout that caused a riot in the living area, the camera too lost power and was rendered useless in the incident.

The University plans on putting in additional security cameras in other living areas on campus.

2. Cover-up on Pine Street

When allegations were made last year that Jim Coopee, the University of Massachusetts Personnel Administrator, had used campus employees to repair his home, Coopee maintained that he'd done nothing wrong.

The University agreed. After a brief investigation, UMass absolved the administrator of all responsibility in the incident. The allegation was made after two UMass employees, Bill Hebert and Christopher Thornton, went to Coopee's residence at 449 Pine Street to replace a rotting joist underneath his front porch. After the work was completed, both employees returned to the University Physical Plant.

The two employees, Arthur Warren and Ricky Bellefleur, confirmed the allegations. Bellefleur maintained that he had built a new joist and Warren, a communications dispatcher, said that Hebert and Thornton back to the worksite to finish the job.

After the pair was photographed by an unknown individual, they returned to the plant. According to Warren, one hour of personal time was then put on Thorton's timecard by supervisor Howard Cleveland. The original joist was cut in half and discarded, but was recovered, and now sits in the Collegian's Hall of Fame.

Bellefluer says that Hebert told him "he didn't see anything."

"I told him I wouldn't lie for him," Bellefluer said.

The internal investigation was conducted by Assistant Director of Building Maintenance Eric Ness, involved more than 30 people, and resulted in some startling findings.

"Their long history at the plant has been one of similar situations of abuse going on for years, with nothing being done about it," Ness said. "If a supervisor is knowingly misusing state resources, that is a substantial situation."

Arthur Warren has since been released from his position at the University of Massachusetts.

3. Flint resigns as head basketball coach

Less than 48 hours after coaching his last game of the season, James "Bruiser" Flint resigned from his position as head basketball coach for the University of Massachusetts on March 12.

A statement from the University's media relations department announced Flint's decision, after the coach reportedly met with Chancellor David K. Scott and Athletic Director Bob Marcum.

"We sat down, and they just wanted to pretty much go in a different direction," Flint said. "I said I'd resign the position. They wanted to get somebody else in there, and that was it."

Flint followed the announcement with a final appearance on his weekly radio show, in which he expressed optimism toward both his 12 years at UMass and his future.

"I'm not going out of here bitter; I think I'm going out of here better," Flint said. "I'll be able to go down my road and do my thing... I'll land on my feet."

The Minutemen compiled a 15-15 overall record in this, Flint's fifth season as head coach. After a 3-9 non-conference start over the first six weeks, the team won 11 of 16 conference games to finish the regular season in fourth place in the A-10. The Atlantic 10 tournament saw UMass upset top-seeded St. Joseph's en route to the championship game, where the team fell 76-65 to defending champion Temple.

Flint leaves behind an 86-72 overall record as head coach of the Minutemen, including a 52-28 mark within the A-10. Three of his five teams saw postseason action, twice in the

4. Massive Changes in Administration

The announcement of the Chancellor's resignation rates among the top news stories of the year for a simple reason. Chancellor David K. Scott is an important figure on the campus, and important figures are always news.

The seemingly sudden announcement in late November wasn't actually sudden: administration insiders had been rumoring Scott's departure for over a month. Scott, leaving behind a turbulent career at the Amherst campus, was the third Chancellor to leave a UMass campus since William Bulger's ascension to the Presidency.

Scott's achievements, including a massive fund raising campaign and 'strategic' initiatives, were marred over his seven-year tenure by building takeovers, labor relation problems and affirmative action activist protests.

His resignation, however, was not the last. Provost Cora Marrett resigned earlier this semester, and coupled with a vacancy in the Vice Chancellorship for Research, a huge gap now persists in the upper tiers of the campus administration.

However, pressure from the Faculty Senate has resulted in swift action from the Board of Trustees. Soon, a search committee to fill the vacant Chancellor position will be formed and names will be accepted. It is still a long road to permanent leadership. Until that time, current Deputy Chancellor Marcie Williams will serve as interim Chancellor.

5. SGA sacked

"The interests of the students were pissed on," Senate Speaker Jim Eltringham said. And with those words, the beleaguered Speaker seemed to sum up the frustration that had mounted both in and around the Student Government Association.

Eltringham's comment was made mere moments after the Student Judiciary and Chief Justice Gabriel Tavares ruled that the Senate branch of the SGA and the September elections which installed it were unconstitutional. Among the Judiciary's contentions with the election were the misrepresentation of the electoral districts, the failure of Eltringham to obtain a proper apportionment schedule and the failure to replace election commissioners.

Eltringham was ultimately charged with violating the Student Code of Conduct and asked to step down as Speaker. On one of the few positive moments to come out of that night, Registered Student Organizations were allowed to keep the money allotted to them, even if it was given by an "unconstitutional body," according to the Judiciary's decision.

And regardless of what SGA officials said then or what they say now, a select few people were happy with the decision while most were visibly upset. Student Trustee Seth Avakian vowed that he would not return to the SGA early last semester because it did not represent the student body. He was likely happy with the decision. President Jeff Howe was, along with Rebecca Austern, the petitioner in the previous week's judicial hearings. He was likely happy with the decision. The 32 Sigma Phi Epsilon members, who were removed from their Senate seats and who felt that their presence was one of the main reasons for contending the elections, were not happy.

Had the Greek community members been unfairly discriminated against? Possibly. Did the SGA do what was best for its constituents? Probably not. Did the SGA lose a lot of credibility in many people's eyes? Absolutely.

A year later, with new President John Shoehan and new Trustee Jon Laughbinger, as well as a new Speaker Aaron Saunders, the SGA looks to move forward. However, the controversy that surrounded the Senate's trial and dismissal undoubtedly made it one of the top stories of the year.

6. RAs attempt to unionize

It seemed like the University of Massachusetts Resident Assistants had just woken up one morning and decided that they wanted to be part of a union. Of course, that's not how it happened, but that's how it seemed. The story came, made a lot of noise and just kind of fizzled out.

Perhaps trying to continue the UMass traditional of liberalism or perhaps trying to perpetuate its myth, the RAs made a bid to become the first ever undergraduate labor union at any university.

Exactly what kind of bid it was or is remains to be seen. On April 9 of this year, Provost Susan Pearson categorically denied to recognize the RAs as an official bargaining unit. That same day, Chancellor David K. Scott made remarks in a statement reiterating the University's position against the union notion. And seemingly that was the last we heard from the disgruntled employees. To date, they have not appealed to the Massachusetts Labor Relations Board (MLRB), which has the power to grant them status as a union.

So what was the big deal? Well, according to the RAs, quite a bit. Their complaints ranged from unfair compensation to an unfair RA judicial system to extended hours beyond their contracts.

"We've tried so much to improve our conditions and we've been rebuffed," said David Synott, an RA in John Adams dormitory and one of the people responsible for the union push. "We've been not listened to. Talking employment to management hasn't worked. We aren't going to be objectified and treated as thrown-away employees anymore."

Strong words and maybe the RAs really do have the mobilizing power to back them up. If they did, then they would make undergraduate and, indeed, labor history.

7. Republican Club brings controversial speaker to campus

When the UMass Republican Club announced that they were bringing controversial conservative speaker David Horowitz to campus many people immediately expressed their displeasure. The club brought the speaker to campus in order to raise awareness about a variety of issues on campus.

"We see him as a great person to bring to campus. We wanted to bring someone that you wouldn't normally have the opportunity to see here, now students will be able to ask questions first hand," Zack Spilman, Director of Lectures for the club said about the event. " We are not so much trying to promote a viewpoint as we are want to promote thought and discussion."

What followed from the Horowitz talk included angry protestors, students walking out during the speech and increased security on the part of both the police and the club themselves.

"We have to tell him he's wrong," Andrew Spagnos, a protestor outside of the event said. Anyone who tells you slavery is over, that exploitation is over, is wrong."

However, Horowitz survived the event unscathed and interested students learned more about his views on slavery reparations and his controversial advertisement that rocked the world of college newspapers. He explained to those present that it was far too late for reparations for slavery and that often times conservative views are not represented for fear that one would be labeled a racist.

"The world is full of assholes and you can't outlaw them, it just isn't going to work," he said. "Believe me there are racists everywhere and there always will be."

8. Degnan remains critical following Butterfield fall

Capture the flag was a game that nearly every child enjoyed playing. But if it's played wrong, it's a game that can become dangerous. This semester we learned just how dangerous in one of the more tragic of the top 10 stories of this year.

The skull and crossbones flag was the acclaimed object that sophomore Thomas Degnan was reaching out to attain when he suffered critical injuries following a life threatening fall off of Butterfield Dormitory.

"It was a prank," Chief John Luippold said. "The flag belonged to a student or students in that building."

Students at Butterfield indicated that there is a rivalry between their dormitory and residents in dorms in the surrounding area to capture and keep the flag.

"The skull and crossbones flag is not the flag of rape, pillage and piracy." Ben Sandrof, a former Butterfield resident told the Daily Hampshire Gazette. "It is a symbol of cooperative dormitory's independence and community."

The prank went wrong and Degnan is still listed in critical condition after his 35-foot fall from the slate roof onto a concrete patio below. He was exiting through a forth floor bathroom window when he slipped and fell. He was transported a half a mile to the North Fire Station by ambulance and then he was airlifted to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield, MA and remains in the intensive care unit.

9. Parking Garage comes to Amherst

Many years from now, the Amherst parking garage will seem as permanent a fixture of downtown as Antonio's pizza, Club Sidewalk or used CD stores. The controversy, political wrangling and ultimately resolution of the garage issue over this past year will be forgotten. It will all fade from Amherst's memories like the people who worked so hard for it and those who had their reservations.

2001 saw the completion and the beginning of something, which had been in the works since 1947. The final $1 million of funding for the garage was approved by the Town Meeting and the physical construction actually began. Whether the construction lays dormant, missing completion deadlines, as the cinema complex in nearby Hadley did recently or not remains to be seen. The main point is that something that had long since been only a vague notion took one giant step closer to becoming reality.

And for that most people seemed happy. Sure, some petitioners wanted to put the garage on a ballot as a referendum question, but even they were not completely opposed to it.

"I think 114 [the number of people at Town Meeting who voted 'yes' on more funding] out of the population of Amherst is a very, very small percentage," Vincent O'Connor, one of the petitioners, told the Daily Hampshire Gazette at the time. "I don't think [the referendum] is going to change things frankly, but if it does, isn't that fair?"

Local businesses seemed happy at the time and, even now, seem willing to put up with the inconveniences that the garage's construction may be causing them. And why not? Employees have dreams of constantly accessible parking and owners have turned their thoughts to increased business.

Will it work? Can Amherst be Northampton? Does it even want to be? Only time will tell, but 2001 was the first big step to answering these questions.

10. GEO organizes frequent protests

The near constant protests of the Graduate Employee Organization provided content for several days' papers. However, as contract negotiations drew near in mid February, GEO stepped up its picketing of the Whitmore Administration Building and other demonstrating activities.

On the afternoon of February 19, GEO members and allies marched and chanted their way through Whitmore, up the long front ramp, through the stairwells, and into the Chancellor's office reception area. Still chanting, the crowd moved through the hallways that connects the Chancellor's office with the Provost's Office.

James Shaw, a GEO member and Sociology graduate student, passed several large pieces of paper on the walls. Combined, they listed over 50 points that GEO wanted to negotiate at the bargaining table.

Whitmore was not amused.

"My concern remains the issue of civility," Provost Cora Marrett said shortly after the incident. "Some of the actions and language did little to garner support from the from the staff."

Shaw, and GEO, were apparently happy with that reaction.

"We're going to go in there [Whitmore], we're going to make a statement. There's going to be no hiding from us anymore," Shaw said. "It's certainly aggressive. And we want it to be aggressive."

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian.

The year is over we all move on

And so another volume of the Collegian comes to a close.

And so another finals period approaches, with the University's oh so generous day and a half of reading before the nightmarish examinations begin.

And so, another summer approaches.

Thank you, UMass.

Our final majority opinion of the Collegian Editorial Board is that every student should study hard and have fun this summer.

It's probably the first time we all agree on something.

Finals are rough, but just think of that sweet three-month respite that awaits you. Whether you work, intern, or lay about the house watching reruns of Scooby Doo, keep a smile on your face. It will be three months before you sit in another stuffy classroom, or a moldy lecture hall. It will be three months before you have to drop outlandish amounts of cash for text books.

It will be three months before you'll be able to read the fabulous back to school issue of this glorious newspaper.

But seriously, have a good summer. Good luck on finals. We'll be here when you get back. Of course. We actually don't leave here. We just live in the newsroom all summer. Actually, we just stay in a large freezer, semi cryogenically, in a suspended state of animation.

Okay, really seriously now.

Use your time well. Make a study schedule, and stick to it. Try to avoid all-nighters. You're not going to learn all a semester's worth of class in a single night, so don't even try. Study as much as you can, get plenty of sleep. Breakfast is the most important meal of the day.

Try not to get too stressed. Exercise helps. Play Frisbee, or wiffleball, or run. Just get the blood moving. Not only will it keep you healthy, but also it may even help you think.

And don't forget to pack if you live in the dorms. Nothing makes a stressful time even more stressful than having to throw everything into boxes the night before you are forced out at write-up point by the RAs. And packing makes a useful break from studying.

When someone leaves, don't forget to say goodbye. Keeping in touch with people is one of the most important part of the college experience. College does not end when the last final is over. If you are returning next year, there are still no excuses for not keeping in touch with friends during the summer.

More importantly, do not lose touch with those that are leaving for good. There are some wonderful people departing from this university who will move on to do tremendous things. Treasure the amount of time you have spent with them, but certainly do not let it slip away.

To the graduating seniors, the Collegian sincerely sends out its deepest wishes of luck and hopes for prosperity. Your experience at UMass should have no doubt left you with a much healthier understanding of the free world than you had upon arrival. Use that knowledge wisely.

Give me the Vegas odds

Does anyone think that he or she is invincible? Probably not, but when it gets down to the nitty-gritty all college students think they are.

Harsh realization – we are not.

A lot of things have happened in my time as a student at UMass, but none have shaped my life more than memories of lives that were lost or altered by death or near-death experiences.

Lives are shaped by the people who surround you – whether close or distant. There are certain things that stick in your head – you do not even think about them until they hit close to home.

A couple of weeks ago I found out that former Collegian editor-in-chief Casey Kane has cancer. The key word in that sentence is HAS. She was diagnosed a little more than a year ago, but doctors thought they had put it into remission – and they did, but only for a short time.

This is important to me because Casey was the person who told me to live while I can: you are only in college for a short time and soon you will long for those days. Now, a mere two years after she left the University, I find myself longing for those days that Casey told me about.

Most students live their college years relatively carefree. They live moment-to-moment, day-to-day, never really knowing what the future has in store for them. Upon graduation Casey didn't know what was in store – I don't know what's store. I wish there was a crystal ball that told the future but I guess that would not be fair.

It would not be fair because there is always something negative – but Casey found the positive.

Even in the email that she sent to nearly everyone she came into contact with, she joked. Some people just do those things – not me. I find nothing funny with potentially fatal illnesses. Give me Vegas odds of a million to one and I will always take the one. That one person will be me.

BRYAN SMITH

Hardly anyone in college really thinks in the long term, especially at this time of year. Everyone has interests that have short-term affects. Student are scurrying around campus to study for an exam, getting one more source for that monster term paper or just wondering what the summer holds in store. The end of the semester, for all it does in the short-term, really does not matter. The long-term is much more important. The grade you get in that upper-level communication class is not going to matter – the friend you may have pushed away will.

Things can change in an instant. Lives can change even quicker.

This happens as a result of thinking that we are invincible. We take driving a car for granted. We see it as part of our everyday life. The question remains of how many people have had someone close to them perish as the result of everyday life. I will take the Vegas odds on that one, too.

Invincibility is a scary thing.

It scares me more than anything, but still some people can see through it as if it were an open window on a sunny spring day. Casey even goes outside to soak it all in. She always had a way of doing that: taking it all in was her thing. She would not push a friend aside for schoolwork – she would tell them to live life to its fullest, the same way she practices.

People say that practice makes perfect, but you cannot practice invincibility… that is what makes it so scary. There is no practice. In a moment's time things change, lives change.

Nobody thinks that it will be him or her. They shrug it off as if it is nothing. These things are not nothing; they are everything. The greatest gift ever given is that of life. The greatest thing that can be taken away is life.

Life is more precious than gold. Life is more painful than a dagger in the side – at times life is a dagger in the side.

Casey got a dagger in the side with the news of her cancer coming back. She took the dagger out, wiped it off and remained positive.

Life sometimes deals you a bad hand. Give me the Vegas odds on something like this happening to someone close to you and I will take the million this time. It happens, whether we want to believe or not.

Believe it or not, Casey is one of the biggest Red Sox fans you would ever want to meet. This one is like facing a Rick Ankiel fastball – never knowing where it is going to go. Let me call it Casey at the Bat, but I will have to change the ending this time. She will stay positive through it all even though that this one hurts more than any Bucky Dent homer or Bill Buckner error. This time the Red Sox will win.

Bryan Smith is blessed with health and was honored by his time at the Collegian.

Memories of a sexy man

BRYAN MCALLISTER

I feel like this senior column should write itself. I shouldn't really have to do anything, so that I can just eat my handi-snacks and watch reruns of the "Cosby Show." Oh, that Rudy, she sure was precocious!

But, after trying about a million different opening paragraphs, I've found this is the hardest column to write. Perhaps because the goal, ideally, is to explain my college experience, and give advice and stuff like that. Honestly, I really don't think I'm qualified. Nothing that I, or any of my friends, have experienced, can be easily bottled up into a cool Cherry Coke bottle, and then put into a vending machine and… man, this is a HORRIBLE metaphor, and not really a sentence, either. See, I haven't learned anything. And I'm an English major.

The difference between a freshman and a senior, I think, is simply a lack of the wide-eyed naivety that is the hallmark of the freshman. That's both good and bad. It's good to have the wide-eyes, to approach everything as if you've never done it before. But it's also good to be here, now, having greater knowledge of what you do and how you do it.

So even though I wouldn't go back and be a freshman again, I would like to have that sense of wonder and adventure carry over into the rest of my life. You have to approach things almost as if they've never happened before. So the following things, people, and places never happened:

My first day at UMass, moving in, meeting my roommate, my floor, this girl I had a crush on straight from orientation. My first frat party, and all the frat parties and "parties at the white house" that followed. My first time getting really, really drunk and my first time getting sick. Flag football – we lost horribly, and I sucked. Hooking up with an ex-girlfriend from high school over the winter. Chicken finger nights, "pastabilities," Tower wars, getting stuck in an elevator for an hour in John Adams. Antonio's.

I remember coming down to the Collegian for the first time, wide-eyed and innocent, scared and nervous. I had no idea journalism might be a career option – I just wanted to write about movies. It was the only thing "extracurricular" that I could do. So I wrote a movie review, and the film editor at the time, Adam Levine – does ANYONE remember him?? – liked my stuff.

Second semester, I found myself as the film editor. Thank you to Seema, Laura, Marty, Casey and all those who actually thought some little freshman kid could go places with the Collegian.

I know, I know, the Collegian isn't the most popular thing on this campus. Say you work for the Collegian and people will invariably say, "Oh." It takes a lot of courage to put your stuff out for 25,000 people to see, and I applaud everyone who does it.

Moreso, though, the Collegian was an opportunity to make friends and have experiences so typical and crucial to the college life. So I won't tell you to "get involved," or "write for the Collegian," but please, just try and find your niche. It's easy to do if you look hard enough.

Thank you to Hampshire Dining Hall subs, the swans, TAU's, Golden Bay sandwiches at the Coffee Shop, 6th floor Dickinson Spring 99, all my old, crazy roommates, Bowl Day 99, games of basketball by the Hill, The Collegian parties, the April Fools Issue, Brittney Spears, Scotland and all the people there, the American football team in Scotland, the Study Abroad office, the English department, the 7-11 in Sunderland, Charlie's and all the places and people I've met over the years. Thank you to crazy summers with the boyz and sloshy, windy UMass winters. Thank you to round robbins, late-night movies, endless video games, "The Simpsons" and "Dawson's Creek," "Saved by the Bell," "South Park," arts covers, endless weird parties, Papa John's, creative writing class and a class actually entitled "European Intellectualism in the 20th century." It was actually good.

Thank you the people that have passed in, out, and through and around my life (in no order of preference): Brian J., Adam, Megan, Shannon, Michelle, Seema, Marty, Mike M., Trenkle, Trenkle, and Trenkle, Kristi, Emily, my arts staff Kevin and Rob, Angela, Ali, and basically everyone in the world named Jen, since I know about 55 of them, Terry, Laura, Mary, Lauren, Jeff, Rachel, Alistair, Mikey, Marguerite, and all of the American football players, my roommate, McDevious, Amanda, Tina, another Rachel, Lisa, and man, I'm probably forgetting a lot of people as I rush to finish this. You know who you are though.

These people, these places, these things – they happened, and I couldn't be more proud or more satisfied. Enjoy your college life, everyone. Mine, like yours I'm sure, has been a series of ups and downs. That's cool with me.

Bryan McAllister is wildly pursuing the idea that he will write stuff for a living, or possibly direct a sequel to "The Goonies" movie.

Scrawny kid grown up

This is the last hurrah, a day that I could have never envisioned four years ago. The scrawny kid who walked onto this campus is now a man who has "filled out" – maybe even a bit more than I bargained for in the first place. The real world awaits with its endless possibilities and is the next obstacle that I will attempt to take on.

I'm at a point where I really don't know what I should be feeling. Excitement? Maybe. Sadness? Probably. A sense of accomplishment? Definitely.

But all the while, I am faced with the reality that my time at UMass is running out. The workday will soon start at 8 or 9 a.m. and not with some cheesy 11:15 a.m. class that I don't even need to attend on a regular basis. Maybe it will be a bit of a reality check.

MICHAEL KOBYLANSKI

I look back at it now, and I can't believe some of the stunts that I successfully pulled off, or some of the challenges that I took on in addition to my regular schoolwork. Monday nights have been filled with exorbitant amounts of stories. The rest of the week has been a mess most of the time as well, running around in an attempt to find an even keel between class, schoolwork and other activities.

I can say this, though. If I had to do it all over again, I would. No questions. No regrets.

Maybe I'm one of the select few who can claim that he or she knew that UMass was the place to attend from the moment he or she stepped on campus. All it took was one crisp, fall Saturday afternoon during my senior year of high school to make that decision.

The acceptance letters filed in but that didn't make much of a difference. New Hampshire, Maryland, Boston University and even my beloved Conn yes, I know it's an oxymoron – wanted me to head off to their schools, but I knew that UMass was the only place for me.

I hope that all of you feel the same way that I do about this place – an overall love affair with an unwelcome tendency to become aggravated with the administration for causing me to make far too many trips to Whitmore.

The road that leads through Amherst can be a bumpy one at times. For every high, there will be a low. Annoying roommates, poor DC food and Saturday morning hangovers will always be on the flip side of your own room, the Dove's Nest pot roast and Club Sidewalk.

Trust me, there is always a treasure when all is said and done. Whether it takes you four years, five years, or even longer, just enjoy the time that you spend here. When you finally get into the workforce, you will never be able to get those precious moments back.

Before I go, I have some words of wisdom and other random thoughts about UMass.

Smitty, contrary to your beliefs, Communications is not the easiest major here.

The Harp - easy place to get harassed for ID, even if you are 21.

You don't have to be a grad student to drink beers in the Grad Lounge. Take advantage of that.

Hey journalism majors, have some pride and come down and write for the Collegian. How are you going to get a job when you graduate with no work experience?

Don't be afraid to sample the wide array of food uptown. Although Antonio's remains the staple of many UMass students' diets, check out Pasta E Basta and the New India Restaurant.

Watch out for the UMass hockey team. The Minutemen should be in the NCAA tournament within the next four years. Fans, make an attempt to show up for games other than just Boston College and BU.

It is going to be tough to move on from this place. I'm sure that I will have Club Sidewalk and Antonio's withdrawal by the first of June.

Of course, this column wouldn't be complete without a few thanks. To my family, thanks for all of your support throughout not only the past four years, but for everything along the way.

To my friends from the Collegian and from other UMass endeavors, it's been a great ride. I hope that you've enjoyed this time as much as I had. All of the people that I have come in contact with here – students, coaches, teachers, etc. – have only enriched my experience even more.

By the way, anybody who wants to give me a job, feel free to e-mail me at mkobo30@aol.com.

Take these shackles off my feet so I can dance

In 11 days I will be graduating college. Traditionally Collegian employees are given the opportunity to write about their time at the University of Massachusetts in a no-holds-barred editorial. However, I don't want to write about UMass the school. I want to write about everything, and I am going to do it in 70 lines or less.

PAUL RAFELSON

First of all living, in Amherst, from the point of a Philadelphian/New Jersey Boy like myself it was a hell of an adjustment. The first time I saw Amherst it looked like the sweetest most innocent little town of Western Massachusetts. Now when people ask me to describe this town, I generally refer to it as the perfect setting for a Stephen King novel. There are some crazy characters in this town. I have never seen so many old hippies in my life. It's like when Woodstock ended all the hippies that didn't get into the yuppie scene all moved here. Not only did they move here, but also they decided to press their Ralph Nader-style, ban-everything-fun, Earth-Day-bigger-than-Christmas, town-council-more-important-than-presidential-election views on everybody. Honestly, I am sick of it. I used to be really environmentally conscious, not active but I cared. Now these people have made me want to pollute the environment just to get back at them for the years of headache they have impressed upon me. Enough is enough!

Why won't these 50-year-old hippies go eat a goo ball, or find a Wide Spread Panic show and just leave me alone? Now, hopefully, if I wrote this well, I'll have a bunch of hippies protesting in front of my house, whereas if this were Philadelphia, they would just come over kick my ass.

My other problem with this town is why South Amherst and North Amherst became the unofficial Mason Dixon Line. I mean everyone in South Amherst seems to sound like they are from South Carolina but they are actually from a northern New England town. It's bad enough that Western Massachusetts is preceded with the reputation of being "Nowheresville" from its Eastern Massachusetts counterparts, but when you talk like the Beverly Hillbillies all day is it any wonder? What makes it worse is that when you take the hillbilly accent and tie it in with the general unfriendliness toward students its enough to scare a Yankee (I hate the New York Yankees - Go Red Sox / Phillies) like myself especially after I saw Deliverance, which I considered to be physiological research for my neighborhood. Every day I would watch the news and listen for a combination of words such as "hunting accident," "accidental shooting," "resident of South Amherst," "student." Now my days of living in fear are over!

As scary as all this has been for me, living next door to the official mechanic of the Dukes of Hazard has had its benefits. This semester was a laugh like every other. Whether up-town, downtown or mid-town I always managed to find comedic moments somewhere. I would like to take this time to thank everyone especially Brian D. Terry G. Dan R. and E.T.G. for all of our comedic moments. I want to thank Kate D. for her persistence - if it wasn't for you our weekly Sopranos pasta parties this semester would never have been a hit. I would like to thank Bono, for inspiring me to sing at A.B.C. Do you want Apples?

I have had a great time at UMass. The boundaries for opportunity here have been limitless. Even though I have taken advantage of many of these opportunities I still have regrets. Going to a school this size has great advantages. You can do a lot more with the resources available to you, but you never feel lost. Thank U-Mass (PUN GET IT!) for everything. I know I am leaving but you will hear from me again. You will really hear from me if you keep calling me and asking for money every day. Just kidding Annual Fund people are good people and all seniors should start showing their support. Thanks again, Paul.

A final farewell

EMILY VACANTI

Two and a half years ago I did not even have an intention of writing for the Collegian, and yet here I am, two and a half years later, writing my final farewell column.

My four years at this school have taught me so much, including to expect the unexpected. Almost nothing went as I planned it the summer before I came here, yet it all worked out exceptionally well. I originally came here to study biology and start my journey to find the cure for both cancer and AIDS. Then I attempted chemistry, and well… I'm now going to be an advocate to end violence against women, which is my true calling.

I wanted to meet someone my freshman or sophomore year, date him for three or four years, and then get married right after I graduated. Well, that did not happen. If it would have, then I would not have experienced some of the feelings that I have. I would not have had the chance to love, be loved, and then know what it is like to lose that person. I am glad to have experienced that.

I have also experienced a wide variety of friendships, ones that ended shortly after they began, and ones that will last forever. Some of those have been on rocky ground at one time or another, but the true friendships have pulled through. "I'm better than evil" Brian Corbin, I will never forget that.

During my four years here, I have learned the value of self-expression. Without it, everyone is just a clone of one another. It's the little differences between us that make us who we are. Whether she's both a dancer and a writer or he's a reporter and a hero, little differences make them who they are, and that's why I care so much about them. They are not exactly alike. Instead they are the most unique and lovable people I have ever met.

Academically, this school has more to offer than the vast majority of students could ever imagine. It does depend on what Department you are in, some are better than others, but you get out of it what you put into it. For example, last spring I wrote a terrible paper. My teacher would not even accept it. So instead of trying little things to fix it, I threw it out completely and started over. My final grade for the paper was either an AB or an A. The point is that you get out of your education what you put into it.

Also, your education is more than just academics. It is all of your experiences, both good and bad, and how you handle them. It is how you treat and are treated. It is everything that you learn from, whether you realize it or not. For me, part of my education did come from the Collegian. I learned how far support can get you and how much lack of support can hold you back. I also learned tolerance of people that I do not get along with and how to force things to work out.

Over the past couple of months, I have been telling my friends that I would not date until September, but I did not account for meeting the perfect boyfriend. That's right. I found the most amazing guy that I've ever met (aside from my dad and some other male relatives) through a friend. I was supposed to be writing a paper, but I chose to procrastinate and stop by where my friend Tanya said that she'd be. There I met someone who has changed my life forever. I skipped writing a paper so that I could meet him, and I've put off writing numerous other papers just to be with him, to be where I feel at home and comfortable. Thank you, both Tanya and Ping.

As much as I want to give a shout out to all of my friends a final time, I hit everyone quite well in my "Notes from the Campus Center Basement." But I do have to admit that after everything me and Rich have been through, he deserves a better shout out. So here's to you Rich. I'll never forget the long and deep conversations that we had in your room, or the number of times that you held me when I cried. I'll never forget that trip to the Sit Down Diner with you and Robin. And most of all, I'll never forget how much you meant to me and how much you have changed my life over the time that you have known me. I became a better person because of you. For that I will be forever grateful.

I also have to give a shout out to the Whore Benny. That night at M.L. when you whipped out your notebook to take notes, was unforgettable. You will always have a place in my memory.

I can't give a shout out to everyone that I care about in the Collegain, but you all know who you are and why I care. Trenkle, I do care about you and will never forget you. Same with Benny, Rose, Mannes, etc.

The end of the year party at the Harp was…unforgettable, though someone else had to tell me what happened. Despite what I thought, I had a great time. Yes, I only had two, and yes, I was drunk. But I did end up having a great time.

Well, with my semester work ending tonight, and a summer with two classes to go, I have to give my final farewell. I may be in the area over the summer, but I will officially be done with UMass at the end of August. Thank you everyone for the wonderful memories and good luck!

My own obituary

RYAN BENJAMIN HARRIS

It's not everyday you're given the chance to write your own eulogy. Apparently part of being included in tradition at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian means you must allegorically stand up in front of 25,000 people with a pen in your hand and deliver your own last rights.

That's all this is. Sure, in some of the columns you see surrounding me comes in the form of, "Since I'm saying goodbye, I'd like to thank so and so for such and such." Or maybe it's, "What I'll miss most about UMass…" or "Remember the time we…" In essence everyone wants to do the same thing. They want to grasp one last memory to hold onto before they walk into the valley of the shadow of the real world: A scary place no smaller than the heavens, yet no bigger than a tomb

As I sit in front of my computer, meditatively pondering, so incredibly deeply what I could possibly say about the four most incredible years of my life, I feel the construction of a tear beginning in the pit of my stomach. I know I won't be able to squelch it by the time I'm done.

It's disgusting how easy it is to look back on such wonderful things, without any idea what specific emotion it will trigger. You think about the time you fell and broke your leg, and you laugh. You think about the time you fell in love, and you cry. Recollection is such an awful thing if it wants to be.

With reminiscence comes the fateful thrill of learning. Everything you've done has a meaningful moral. Do not forsake this, and never ignore it. You just have to discover the perpetual greatness or prospective dread each situation has to offer.

Discovery comes from millions of different places so take chances. A challenge will certainly engulf everything you will do. Select courses that you may think are too hard for you. Find an activity you have never envisioned yourself a part of. Become an RA. Tell your best friend you're in love with him/her.

Find someone to love. Do not be alone! Next time you kiss someone, press your lips so firmly to their mouth that not even imagination can find its way out. Look beyond outer beauty. Everyone has some amount of perfection inside them, find it and treasure it with every one of your senses. If you think you love someone, tell that person. Don't let suspense kill you.

Live life to it's fullest. Happiness is such a beautiful thing that, when it is gone, life is not worth living. Happiness is not something that comes naturally. It's created. For me, being happy is making someone else happy. Looking deeply into the eyes of someone I truly care about as they tell me they are content produces the most real form of pleasure possible. That's what life is all about. It's about taking care of each other.

Along with living life to its fullest comes taking the good with the bad. We're all sad at some time or another. It's okay to be sad. I have been sadder in the past nine months that I have ever been in my entire life. I'm a totally different person that I was my junior year in college, and I can't figure out why. I used to be so much better than this. But, I don't wish for it to go away, or look for a quick fix. I've just learned to deal with it until another opportunity to be happy comes along.

A journey much greater than you already endeavor will no doubt wait for you around every corner. College is just a highway tollbooth, collecting your money. Only instead of tickets, it hands out wisdom. College feeds you knowledge when you least expect it. The life lessons taught here activate ways of thinking, and turn scared high school seniors into full-fledged adults.

Feel an accomplishment with every ounce of your soul, and respect the magnitude of success. This past Sunday night I watched two of my closest friend's faces fill with what appeared to be tears. It wasn't tears though. It was blood, sweat, memories, heart, friendship, sacrifice, devotion, hope, and love blended together into something physical. Those two people were simply the messengers of what we all wanted to do. Some source from a higher pedestal of life chose those two saints of human beings to display a piece of how each and every one of us were feeling.

So this is the part of the eulogy where I say, "It's time for me to depart." I have to go. Even though I know there is something much bigger for me out there, I want nothing more than to slip peacefully back into the life I'm so accustomed to. But, I can't. That life is over. And I will miss you all so much. I love you all so much. Here come the tears.

Ryan Benharris was a Collegian columnist. He wants to thank every person who has ever taken the time to read something he wrote. Each personal comment has been taken to heart, and your responses are what kept him alive. A million years would not be enough time for him to express his gratitude.

I didn't write a senior column, because frankly all I would talk about would be how infatuated I am with Teapot dumplings. Mmmmmm. I will truly miss them. But Alan wants me to use this space to say something nice about him so here goes….

Kara Stokes is a collegian fill-maker

UMass, I'll miss you

So this is it? Four years come and gone so quickly, and I find it so appropriate that this last day of school is my birthday. I am now 22, a true adult, so I guess it is time to graduate. In the four years of college a lot of great things have happened, and with 11 days left I can honestly say that I have no regrets and this has been the best 4 years of my life.

MEGAN CLARKE

I came here knowing no one and with no real idea of what I wanted to do and now I am leaving with a life that I am sure I will be happy with. Even though I think I have it all set for myself it is going to be hard to leave this place. On one hand I am excited to start my new job, have money, be an adult. On the other hand, why would I ever want to leave and grow up? This place is so much fun. I am going to miss a million things about this town. The way UMass looks in the middle of fall and it feels like you are walking through a postcard, and the first real day of spring where everyone just appears from nowhere. Keg parties and the crazy times in the dorms. I am going to miss Bueno's veggie chili burrito and Antonio's chicken and blue, McMurphys on Wednesdays and doing nothing (I mean nothing) on Sunday. I am going to miss Puffer's Pond and the way the sky is so clear at night you can see the stars. Lying by the Campus Center when it is warm and watching everyone go somewhere. I am going to miss my professors who have taught me way too much. I am going to miss wintersession when UMass is quiet, traffic is not bad and everyone is completely laid back. But most of all I am going to miss my friends. They are the people who have made UMass the best place on earth.

UMass has become my home and my friends have become my family. This one and only column that I get to write is for them because I never would have been as successful in life without them. So here it goes.

Cara, you are my best friend. Hey we've been roommates for practically 4 years. I honestly don't know how I am going to live without you. Heart tag, ballet in 139. My forts, the kids in our back seats, LBI, the boat down but, fighting gravity and all the other random things we've done. You have taught me to live each day to the fullest.

Em, I still remember the first day of school freshman year when we met. I was Angel back then though. It has been a long ride together, from Kennedy to this year. I can count on you for almost anything. Especially picking up boys. Have fun on your cross-country trip.

Dani, you've been there through thick and thin. WHY? WHY is there a potato in the toilet? I miss not living with you this year. Hey, why is there a tiger in the tree and a broken chair in the bathtub? AIA Beachfront Ave. in a U-Haul. Dude this S is like ice on my teeth. Can you please wash my wine glass out with shaving cream?

Matty Bones, you had a lapse of judgment this year but I am never going to let you not be my friend again. Tom Petty, the Bills game, the heat storm and the stadium, duct taping the door shut and getting stuck. Our hiking trips and our screaming matches, love it all. Oh and you still owe me a birthday present.

To my Kendrick girls, you have made this year EGG-celent! Flipper babies, pile of piss, sex yes please, sloth days and barfing in your sink, you can't kill me with my hands, we are CLASSY. Michelle you are always there to listen to my problems and help me drink 'em away. Too bad the alcohol usually ends up coming up again. Meg you look so hot in JBJ. We are the MEGS. Take these shackles off my feet so I can dance. Sara my SGM buddy, we may be nerds but we know how to party. SB 2001, if we were drowning, the coast guard was there to save us. Ish, my mocha darling, your antics make me laugh. Lisa thank god you are 21. Isbell, we did not hook up, Club Sidewalk rules. Latini, Crappy, Poo, Teens, who the hell answers to names like those, see you in the Pitt. Dan, I swear you make me crazy but you are a good friend to have, I really do appreciate all you have done for me. To all the friends I didn't mention, thanks and I love you all. To all the kids at the Collegian, we all know we have the best jobs in the world. I am going to miss the basement more than you know.

It is hard for me to sum up my life here, actually it is impossible, there are so many other people that I didn't mention but have touched my life tremendously and then there are others that aren't in my life anymore but have had am impact on me. I miss those people, but as Cara always says, it was meant to be. I also have to thank some people that were behind the scenes but supported me through tough times and happy times. Mom and Dad thank you for supporting me financially and emotionally. I am glad you trusted me with my decision to come here. Erin and Casey, I love you both. To my friends from Buffalo, you may be few and far between and will never read this but the fact that you are still in my life makes me feel very lucky. To all the people who have some time in here, enjoy it. The gravity at UMass might be 7 times more than anywhere else but it is the BEST PLACE ON EARTH!

Megan Clarke was an Advertising Representative.

Goodbye from the ultimate business man

It's hard to believe I am graduating in 11 days, and there are many things about this school I will never forget. Sure, I'll never forget the huge lines at the Bursar's office, or the rally and protests that took place. But most importantly, I will never forget my friends.

ERIC FABER

My friends taught me a lot too; I think they taught me more than what I learned in my classes. They taught things like how to setup Instant Messenger, how to use Napster, and how to play flip cup and they taught me was how to stand up for what I thought. Even thought they taught me a lot, there was a lot I learned myself. I learned that 8 Oatmeal shot in less than two hours makes you drunk and most importantly you shouldn't use the pickup line, "You probably get this from a lot of guy, do you want to go out sometime." These things might sound like small things, but these are things that I didn't learn before coming here.

There is something, though that I am extremely thankful for though, and it is that I got a position at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. I have been working down in the basement for almost four years, and it was hard to believe that I worked my way up to the Advertising Manager here. Mind you that I work with a lot all business majors, and those your time you can do anything. This job has introduced me to many nice and not so nice people, some complaining about ad mistakes and some complimenting me on our paper. I just want to say thank know me know that I have never taken a business course in my life. This shows that if you work hard and devote job has introduced me to many nice and not so nice people, some complaining about ad mistakes and some complimenting me on our paper. I just want to say thank you to Jane form food services. Marc from the Harp (you should go there its really nice inside), and Kim form the Career Network for all they faith in what we do.

As I mentioned before my friends was a major part of my life here at UMass. First and foremost I need to thank Ryan Benharris for being the main man. He was always been there whenever I needed him. He would hear all my grips and bitching. He taught me about music, I will never forget the Eminem concert we went to. This boy is going to go somewhere in life and when he does I am going to say, "I knew him." Next I want to thank Josh Smith for his words of wisdom and kicking out for me. Even in the times of my drunken rage at Charlie's he was there to watch me and tell me that, "I had enough for the night." The times that Josh and his friends would ask me if I wanted to go to Applebees for dinner and the whole night he would make fun of me about my Animal Management course in which some people had to castrate sheep with their teeth (it's true).

Thursday nights at Kahunaville were one of the best time Chris and myself had. Oh, and Chris you don't have to make fun of me anymore about me drinking Malibu and pineapple, I think a new drink that is much better, a "Blind Mexican," three of these and it seems like I am on my ass, well when the girls at Charlie's make it that is. To everybody that I met at Club Sidewalk, I don't remember you because I never remember anything when I get there.

There were not only friends that I thank but also, Marty and Maureen, for those who don't know them they are the only adults that for the Collegian. They both acted like second moms to me. I have learned a lot from them. And I hope they have learned a lot from me. I want to thank Marty for her ears to hear my gripes and the many debates we had about politics. To Maureen I have a special relation; she is the only other person that I can talk to about gambling, and but not least best of luck to everyone in graphics, you guys make this paper look the best everyday. To Sue and Sage, I see two people that are the best in what they do. Oh, and Sage, your thesis project was really nice you put a lot of time in it and it shows. Sue, I am sorry that I couldn't make it to your project, but I know it is equally just as good.

There are probably many more people that I am forgetting now. For all those I missed saying bye too, I am really sorry. So this ends my four years here at UMass, and my first, last, and only article in the Collegian.

Waterdown newest is part sentiment, part rant

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

WATERDOWN
Never Kill The Boy On The First Date
Victory

"Impress me," demands Waterdown. The opening track is an arms-folded request of hardcore music: what have you got?

"You're nothing new to me/ and all the things you say/ have been traced out for you." A far from subtle indictment of punk/hardcore would be much for effective coming from a band that could escape such criticism.

Waterdown is not one of those bands. They're not bad by any means, but they're not blazing any new trails.

This German band consists of drummer Jorg, guitarists Claus and Holger, bassist Christian, and screaming and singing vocalists Ingo and Marcel, respectively.

The content on their debut Never Kill The Boy On The First Date is split pretty evenly between sappy emo core about girlfriends and quiet lament, and anti-social rants about life's big problems. The lyrics (by Ingo and Marcel) are very elementary, but for all their simplicity it's kind of nice to know quickly what the songs are about. It creates immediacy with the subject matter, a practice reinforced by the by-the-books hardcore/emo sound.

The sing/scream split is often divided on a song-by-song basis; rallying cries against capitalism ("Corporate Identity") are handled by screams, while sweet love letters like "Your Shadow" are strictly Marcel territory, who actually contributes some very memorable vocal harmonies. His voice isn't terribly distinctive, but a smooth and confident delivery suits the band's no-frills approach nicely.

Waterdown is at its best when they bring both vocalists in on the same track. The strictly Ingo material is bland, but his minor contributions on "Impress Me" and "Lessons" are an asset. In the end, though, Marcel's forceful singing and soaring chorus on "Impress Me" makes the strong case that he can carry the vocal load himself and Ingo's cliched growl is just holding the band back.

The lyrics are sharpest when they don't give completely to either melodramatic schmooze ("would you call me at midnight/ just to let me know you're there/ to hear your breath on the line/ gets me to sleep tonight") or overbroad political rants ("under the heels of the corporations/ your small world is crashing down/ under the laws of a worldwide market"). "Lessons I Can't Learn" is a serious introspective look into the personal responsibility for the end of a relationship. "From A Different Angle" examines how time distorts once familiar places.

'Death to false emo' is the writing on the wall of the Waterdown website. These guys certainly mean it, but authenticity is the least of their problems. Like their brothers in spirit Shelter and Glassjaw, whose most recent works have been highlighted by a couple good tracks and lots of the same, Waterdown needs to exploit their strengths to come up with something more creative and outstanding. That way, the answer to the "Impress Me" question "two years from now where will you be?" will be a lot more impressive.

Shrek soundtrack awash in Smash Mouth

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

VARIOUS ARTISTS
Shrek: Music From the Original Motion Picture
Dreamworks Records

The soundtrack Shrek, a promising summer animated feature boasting the talent of Mike Meyers and Eddie Murphy, wreaks of insecurity and executive-ordered adherence to the middle ground; it's a safe and soulless romp through every flavor of bland pop. The album kicks off with "Stay Home" by Sell, the sort of hookless commercial pop-rock song that can't even cut it in the world of commercial pop-rock. Things get a little better at times across the album's 13 tracks, but never so much that the Shrek soundtrack would be worth even bargain-bin prices.

Two appearances by Smash Mouth provide an early warning sign that something's gone wrong in putting this collection together. The presence of "All Star" is a little odd considering the FDA's categorization of the song as a toxic substance, but far more troubling is Smash Mouth's cover of "I'm a Believer," the classic Monkee hit. The rendition is deeply and profoundly bad, and listening to it is like watching the English tear the roof off of Tintern Abbey.

Most of the songs fall through your head like so much CVS-brand candy through your teeth. It's possible to tell at times why a certain song would make a decent soundtrack piece to an animated comedy, but without the benefit of any visual aids all we're left to enjoy is the music itself, and at times it's pretty damned awful. "Bad Reputation" by Halfcocked sounds like a Runaways song on stupid pills; "Like Wow!" by Leslie Carter is every bit as off-putting as its title suggests.

Even normally good bands are at their worst here. The Eels, usually good for their quirky charm and novel production merely go through the paces on "My Beloved Monster," sounding like a bad rip-off of their own early material; thankfully, the song lasts only 2:10. The Proclaimers (you know, they sing that "and I would walk 500 miles" song) tust out "I'm On My Way," whose jangly country-pop sound is fun for about 30 seconds. Their accents add another 20 seconds, but we're still talking less than a minute of entertainment.

Sandwiched between two of these forgettable bits of tripe is this album's one moment of true greatness. Rufus Wainwright's beautiful rendition of "Hallelujah." Admittedly, it's perhaps difficult for any competent vocalist not to sound amazing with such a wonderful piece of music, but Wainwright's performance is excellent regardless, to the point of blurring the rest of the album out of memory when listening to it.

Jason Wade provides some solid acoustic material with "You Belong to Me," and Eddie Murphy's vocal stylings on "I'm a Believer (reprise)" make the song actually sort of fun for the track's 1:13 running time. The final track, "True Love's First Kiss," is a piece of original score and therefore has nothing to do with the rest of the album. It's not half bad, as original score goes, and an album of it would certainly have been better than the album we do have: a pile of stale candy purchased from a massive 25-cent vending machine off somewhere in Hollywood, with only one or two gems to break up the monotony.

PVTA premiers poetry

By Jillian Waskiewicz
Collegian Correspondent

Poetry isn't limited to English classes anymore. For the next four months the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) will be putting 'poetry in motion'.

"Poetry in Motion" is a program that was developed by the Poetry Society of America and the MTA New York City transit in 1992 to make bus and subway riding a more pleasurable experience. Today most of the Pioneer Valley buses carry poems in the spaces usually reserved for advertisements.

"We are excited to be able to bring a new round of poems for commuters," said Christopher Janke, one of the UMass student coordinators. "All the positive feedback gives us a sense of satisfaction."

Some poets whose work now ride above the heads of local bus patrons include: William Carlos Williams, Elizabeth Bishop, Derek Walcott and James Wright.

Gary Shepard, PVTA Administer, said he is pleased to help bring poetry to the passengers and hopes they will develop an appreciation for this form of expression.

Along with the Poetry Society of America, the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority and the University of Massachusetts, Massilive is also a proud sponsor of the program. Northampton graphic design firms—Impress Inc. and Titanium, Inc.—have donated their time and graphic expertise to create striking visual presentations for the poems.

"What a thrill it was to help put 'poetry in motion'," said Hans Teensma, Art Director of Impress Inc. "Like a class assignment, we each put aside our daily routines of designing books and magazines, and carved out a little place of creative space to read, think, dream and play with these wonderful words. We're a changed group."

"In the Poetry Society of America's ninety-year history, no program has ignited the public's imagination the way "Poetry in Motion" has. We are thrilled to be extending the program to the Pioneer Valley, where so many colleges thrive and support endeavors of this type," said Elise Paschen, former president of the Poetry Society of America.

The Pioneer Valley joins cities including Baltimore, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, Dallas, Atlanta, Chicago and Portland in the Poetry in Motion program.

"Poems love eyes," Janke said, "and eyes love these poems. The poems themselves are fantastic, and the designs are amazing—it's worth a ride just to take a look!"

Local bar events to be had

By Shara Rosen
Collegian Correspondent

The bars on North Pleasant Street in Amherst are known for their event nights and a place for college students to unwind after a hard week of classes. But try to get in with a fake ID or with drugs and you might find them to be less welcoming.

"Not many people even try to get in here with a fake ID. It is well known that no one under 21 gets in. We have scanners and systems that check ID's," said Mauro Aniello, the owner of The Monkey Bar.

Carl Swanson, the manager of Atlantis said, "we have our fair share that try to get in, but we have an ID scanner and we're tough about fakes."

Many students are aware that the bars uptown have become stricter with their identification policies. A second form of picture identification is required at most places for out-of-state licenses.

"I wanted to go into McMurphy's last Friday, and I didn't bring my UMass ID with me because I am 21. The bouncer refused to let me in," said Julie O'Connor, a junior at the University of Massachusetts.

The Amherst bars do not tolerate drugs either. "If we catch someone using drugs we throw them out. We try to remember their name and face so we won't let them in again. We do not condone drug use," Swanson said.

Aniello said, "Drugs are non-existent here. People come to have a good time, dance, and socialize. I work the door, I know why they are here. I can see it in their eyes. We play great music. It's a staple here."

Music is what draws the crowds at the different bars, and special theme nights correspond to the different types of music that is offered.

"I like how the bars have different themes each night," junior Kara Beaudet said. She added, "it keeps it fun when you have options."

"Events are a good draw for the bars for that particular night. It would be good if during the week there was more variety. I would go to the bars if they had something interesting going on, like on a Wednesday night," senior Bill Varela said.

Atlantis is open every night except for Mondays, and each night there is a different event that draws in the crowd. On Tuesday there is no cover charge for Karaoke night. Amherst College students attend the bar every other Wednesday evenings, and on alternate Wednesdays Ben Taylor hosts an event called the Underground Lounge.

"Thursday night at Atlantis is hosted by a couple of brothers from Sigma Alpha Mu who play Hip-Hop and R&B," Swanson said. Atlantis plays house music on Friday nights and the cover charge is $2. "Saturday night, DJ Trendz spins Hip-Hop, R&B, and reggae. Ladies get in free, and guys pay $2," said Swanson. There is an open microphone and turntable on Sunday nights and all are welcome to participate.

"Most people know Atlantis for its décor. It is the only place in town that has DJ's playing records. There are no fights and everyone is pretty happy," Swanson said. This Wednesday Atlantis will be hosting a "Pimps and Hoe's" party for the last day of classes.

The Monkey Bar "wears different hats," Aniello said. He added, "it is well known in the community for the high quality food and service. There is a mixed crowd for lunch and dinner. On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday nights I'm creative. I'll improvise to do what's in style and what people are looking for."

The Monkey Bar offers a formal dinner nightly until 9:30 p.m. "The food is great here, it has the best Cajun and Mediterranean," Aniello said. On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday nights a DJ spins at 10:30 p.m."

Jam bands hit road for summer concerts

By David Siegel
Collegian Staff

As the warm weather arrives and the flowers begin to sprout, I begin licking my lips for yet another jam-packed summer of great music. With summers like this one coming, I am very thankful for being in the Northeast. Only a mere three hours drive from any possible band or venue that I would want to see. With Phish still on hiatus, there is plenty of room for some great bands to shine and create a following for themselves. For some bands, it will be an opportunity to play some larger venues, while for others it will simply be another trek around the country.

For those of us moving back into the Metropolitan Boston area for the summer, we really need to save our money because there are many great shows coming real close to Boston. Starting out in June is Dispatch, headlining a big gig at the FleetBoston Pavilion (formerly Harborlights) on the 8. Coming off a huge concert last week in the Southwest Horseshoe, this local band is planning on hitting it big this summer as they will be hitting up some big venues across the country. On the 13 at the Fleet Center in Boston is the legendary Eric Clapton. Although these tickets are quite steep, beginning at $50, it will certainly be a great show. On the 22, Deep Banana Blackout will have a chance to show what they are made of as they open for the Allman Brothers Band at the Tweeter Center. The following evening, the music returns to the FleetBoston Pavilion with a huge triple bill with the great jazz trio Medeski, Martin and Wood playing with the legendary John Scofield. Opening for this super band of sorts, is DJ Logic's Project Logic, which in my opinion has one of the greatest new sounds on the jamband scene.

Coming into the month of July, we will really have to make some decisions as to which bands we want to see the most. Back at the Pavilion is Widespread Panic on July 13. Having played at Harborlights two summers ago with G-Love & the Special Sauce, they certainly have experience in jamming away in the beautiful summer breeze coming off the Harbor. Moving over to the Tweeter Center, Phil Lesh & Friends will be playing on the 20. Playing mostly Dead songs, this show should be a lot of fun, as Ratdog will open up. For those willing to road trip a little bit, the weekend of July 19 could be amazing. Playing at the Central Park Summer Stage in NYC on the 19 will be the String Cheese Incident. Then on the 22, String Cheese will be traveling to Beantown for a show back at the FleetBoston Pavilion. For those willing, this weekend will be amazing. String Cheese Incident is probably the biggest major venue tour of the summer. It will be a good chance to see what kind of following they will have with a little competition from Phish's frontman Trey Anastastio's solo tour playing at the Tweeter Center on August 8.

In August, the FleetBoston Pavilion will again host a great jamband show as Bela Fleck and the Flecktones make there way to town on the 11. One of the most wholly talented bands on the scene today, BF&F bring a very unique blend of jazz, bluegrass and rock to the table. With my favorite musician around today, bassist Victor Wooten be sure to check them out as they too make the rounds from Central Park on the 10 to the Pavilion on the 11.

Mark your calendar for the weekend of August 10 through the 12. This weekend will be the Berkshire Mountain Music Festival at Butternut Ski Basin in Great Barrington, MA. Although the line-up that has been announced thus far can not compete with last year's festival, this year's should be pretty solid with music Strangefolk, Galactic, Percy Hill, Mike Clark's Prescription Renewal, the Steve Kimock Band, Leftover Salmon and the Yonder Mountain String Band.

A sensitive subject:
Collegian diversity coverage

By Chanel Dubofsky
Collegian Staff

Oh, diversity. How over-rated some think you are.

It was with a lot of hesitance that I accepted the position of Assistant Diversity Editor. Recently, I overheard someone on the bus referring to the good old days, "when there used to be diversity on the Collegian." Well, my fellow escort van riding friend, I'd like to take this opportunity to thank you. Because of your completely uneducated remark, I realized how important it is to have a capable person in this position that understands how many different ways diversity affects the population of this campus.

From ALANA affairs to Holocaust Memorial Week to the Everywoman's Center, the Diversity editors and writers have worked hard this semester to illumine multiculturalism and diversity issues at UMass at a point in time when many people considered diversity to mean how many Canadian students there are on campus. We've done this without confining groups to one page every two weeks, which most of campus ends up skipping over anyway if they aren't Jewish, gay, female or African American. Instead, we've brought everyone to a common place, giving them the coverage they deserve. Read. If you think for some reason this doesn't apply to you, please come down to the Collegian basement and voice your concerns. You are more than welcome to join the Diversity staff.). The accomplishments of the diversity reporting this year have been demonstrative of what needs to happen at this University: equal access and a voice for every student.

Chanel Dubofsky will be working in Boston at the Women's Educational and Industrial Union as a fellow for the Jewish Organizing Initiative in Fall 2001. In the meantime, she can be found gazing through her yellow plastic kaleidoscope somewhere in the library when she's supposed to be writing her thesis on Virginia Woolf.

Women's Issues, Black Affairs, Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual/Transgender Issues, Jewish Affairs, World Issues, Multicultural Affairs: the list goes on and on.

Went on and on.

These were the names of special biweekly pages in the Collegian, begun in the past decade in response to demand from the UMass community. The pages thrived for a while, then struggled with a host of problems that threatened to strangle and marginalize coverage of these vital issues.

Despite valiant recruitment efforts each year by the Managing Editor of the paper, there tended to be little, if any, competition for editorships of the so-called diversity pages. In fact, many times positions went unfilled, though they had been advertised to the UMass community as well as within the newspaper itself.

Fewer and fewer writers were willing to write for pages that were text-heavy and ran once every two weeks. Because each of these pages had a biweekly slot, the news on them was often outdated by the time it ran. And yet we would run the content because there weren't enough pieces to fill the space as it was. Two years ago, I remember reading a GLBT page written entirely by one writer. She tried to vary the style of the bylines, but it was embarrassingly obvious that nobody was writing for that page. This was not unusual.

This year's Managing Editor Sam Wilkinson spearheaded the admittedly unpopular – at first – campaign to eliminate the diversity pages. The Executive Board approved the decision after some heated discussions. Although Wilkinson had originally not intended to retain any staff specifically to cover these "special interest" issues, the remaining diversity editors convinced him that he should do so.

Thus, my position was created: Diversity Editor, with an Assistant Editor, Chanel Dubofsky. This semester, the first for these interdisciplinary positions, we have run pieces by a variety of writers about local events and issues within a day or two after they happened. We worked closely with News Editor Adam Martignetti to distribute assignments to his writers. The entire photo department of the Collegian, especially Scott Eldridge, did their utmost to provide quality photos to run with the articles.

We attempted to create liaisons with Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) in order to recruit new writers to ensure coverage for events in their communities. I attended meetings with the Haitian American Student Organization (HASA), Pride Alliance, and other RSOs, and visited the Stonewall Center. Chanel maintained alliances with Hillel House and the Everywoman's Center. Though we did not get many new writers by these methods, we did foster dialogue about these issues with a new group of people.

Sometimes the tone of our talks turned hostile. I understood the sense of displacement many people felt, and attempted to explain the hard work that would ensure continued, improved coverage of issues important to them.

The Collegian has never had a semester with as timely and provocative coverage of Women's Issues, Black Affairs, Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual/Transgender Issues, Jewish Affairs, World Issues, and Multicultural Affairs as this one. We have pushed for investigation of declining minority enrollment at UMass. We wrote about lectures on subjects from Latino stereotypes to Sufism to GLBT-friendly sex shops. We ran a hilarious article about the difference between latke and hamentasher.

It's been a super semester, and I won't be returning soon. If you want to find me, I'll be writing obituaries at the Globe for my co-op from June to December.

Tanya Mannes was the Diversity Editor this semester.

'Good job by us' getting sentimental for the final time

A lot of things have happened in the world of sports this year, but there may be none more important than the bonds that were made in a department that started off with five people on Sept. 1. Look at the list and see what the staff had to say of the year passed by.

Bryan Smith – Sports Editor, The Cam Neely Award In-and-out of Retirement Award

Three years ago I got involved – that makes me misty-eyed. I do not know whether it is the fact that three years have come and gone or the fact that I did not get involved enough.

Many people have come and gone in my time here, but there was no one that was more special to me than my former partner Brett Mauser. I barely knew the kid when we decided to take the reigns and by the time it was done I never loved a colleague more. This kid made my laugh and he made my cry. He is off in the real world doing his journalism thing right now, but to my jigga – you are the man, and always will be.

As for those that fall close behind…

Adam White – we came down here at almost the same time and share many of the same tasks. I will not miss the late night calls from Turley, but wingman nights at Ohio State will go down in infamy.

Eric Soderstrom – the kid I pass the torch to, the kid that Mauser and I anointed, best of luck. You have visions and no matter what happens stand up for them. I know you will. Shed a tear for me, son.

Justin Pearson – I can remember when you came to looking for a story. I gave you the Boston Sports Awards and you jumped at it. I will remember many nights at the bars chatting it up and you keeping you pants on. I love you, kid.

Matthew F. Sacco – I need a ride. We need a ride. I need a story. Can you go 2 million? Not enough, how about 3 million? Keep it up kid.

Matt Brady – Late nights at the Collegian dot-comming each other, Zane and all those times that we helped one another. I am indebted to you good luck next year on the other side kid.

Matty Bencal – All I can say is if I never told you you are sexy then I will now.'

David Rose – I cried, too. We are even. All the jokes were all in good fun and it takes a strong man to handle them the way you did. Even though you went to sleep every night in Vegas you still got to come. Consider yourself lucky.

Thomas 'The Razer' Frazer – "I am geezer." "You are a geezer." You are one that I will truly miss because you are going back to 'Jolly 'ol England. Overseas does not matter for what we have. I took you to your first baseball game and the Boston Marathon, in the same day. Even though JB liked you more than me, we met there… good job by JB.

To all that did not get an individual recognition, it is your fault. If I wrote first then you would have been squeezed out. I guess it was one last way of showing me who is in charge for next year. Kick my bottle of Vo while you are at it. I love you guys, too.

Adam White – Editor-in-Chief, The Jimy Williams Senile Genius Award

Since this is the sports section of the paper, I'll try my best to stay away from the mammoth assortment of obscure personal references you'll find elsewhere in this issue (that means no "hey so-and-so, we drank a lot, huh?" or "hey so-and-so, way to get so much ass this semester"). Instead, I'll stick to sports (what a concept) and provide my favorite memories from a wild year of covering UMass athletics.

Football – The food in the press box, particularly the clam chowder and the Big Kats, made even the worst losses a lot more bearable. Special thanks to Jeff O'Malley for being the "voice of God" and keeping me in the game when long nights and noon kickoffs had me seeing double. Also, thanks to Dave Sanger for what shaped up to be the most interesting player feature of the year (the Nintendo quotes were priceless).

Hoop – First and foremost, thanks to Bru. It may be a business, but I doubt I'll ever work with a classier or nicer guy. Thanks to my friend Winston; if they kept stats for hustle you'd lead the nation. Also, thanks to Joanie, Caroline and the rest of the Minutewomen for a great Ohio trip; if all goes well, I'll be back on press row covering you all next season (and Eb, you can be my Spades partner anytime).

Media Relations – Thanks to everyone who helped keep me "in the loop," especially Ruthie, Charlie and Ryan. Special thanks to Jim "Rockin" Wrobel for giving up a promising metal career to become the best aquatics contact on the planet.

The Sports Staff – Clichés aside, I love you all. There are too many of you to list individually, well, screw it – "Span, Suds, Sacco, Brades, Vogt, Kflan, Despres, Clown, Pig, Nomah, Bencal and Rose – keep it up. Dan, thanks for the killer art. T. Roll and Smitty, Ohio State was one for the books; I'll bet we had twice as much fun as anyone at the staff party that we missed. To you guys and Benny, best of luck in the future; you'll always be brothers to me.

That's that. I have one more semester left, and I'm shedding my mantle of authority and getting back to my roots as a sports writer. I'm told the best is yet to come, but I don't see how it could get much better than this.

Eric Soderstrom – Sports Assistant, The Johnny Most Man-on-the-Mike Award

"If thus there was a Third, then 48 musteth have thee followed" – Suds 4-9.

Someone check my metachlorine level, I couldn't finish my fish and chips… Fine. I'm calling her.

"Tecmo Bowl," that's just an excerpt from the misty-eyed's that went unprinted.

Guinness in the bottle, I've set one aside for each of you – It's too bad "I'm 12."

Yeah, golf.

Yo son, at the paper son, the voice son, yo son.

"Sports? Hello, Collegian. Collegian Sports. Sports via la Collegione. Collegian Athletics. Yeah, sure…someone will be there."

Collegian Sports to Collegian couch weddings. What?

You can come give me the jiggly. Preferably, the four-finger. Geezer style, if you dare prefer.

So here's where I pick up the Rap Snacks and begin barbecuing with my Honey flavored Homegirls Back at the Ranch. Twenty-five cents, son.

Damn, The Bulldog Inn men's swimming team lost.

"Why don't you kiss him?"

Collegian Party Sudsy premier. Y'all too drunk to remember. It's night. Just shift the circle.

You're not ready. But… She's not hot. She's beautiful.

Halftime field hockey? Esta tiempo practicar. Yeah Final Eight. I had a winter beat? No way, "I want to see the Liberty Bell!"

Jurassic Park 3: The Delaware Bridge.

That's about it. I've said nothing, and I have to get involved. Yeah May 14. What a night.

Love to all sons, much love, lov, lo, lo, love.

Plan on a revolution.

Dj Suds is the broken Collegian record player.

Matt Brady – Sports Assistant, The Andy Moog Half-Untucked Sweater Award

So many memories, so little space… let's start with a brief summary.

Volleyball was good to us, Bencal, and the bond will never be broken. The trip to Maryland was a nightmare, now let us never speak of it again. Hoops was a good time on the trips I made. Oregon will ever be remembered as Span's bird watching debut. GW was a freakin' blast – to this day, Pearson, I think you are the only person who witnessed my grace.

Hockey was a great time with some great mentors. But it's the trips I made with the other guys that was so memorable. Providence…wow, that was an interesting trip, with Sacco wiping off his windshield as we were driving and Pearson suffering from "pink eye" in the back seat. We won at the Whitt! Hi-fiving with Yops was an experience, Smitty.

And then there was the spring. The lacrosse games were all a good time, even though you ruined my shoulder Sacco. And who can forget serving up tea and crumpets at Harvard? But baseball was my bag, and Despres and I had our hands full. Still Fenway was an awesome time, and it showed me how weak you really are. But if it weren't for you…

Smitty, you are the guy who got me addicted to the bug down here and I'll never be able to repay you for that. T-roll, you taught me a lot about writing and dedication, not to mention about LS and ruin cellaneous injuries. Martignetti, you didn't get me any the other night and I'll never forgive you. You're fired. Benny, we drifted some late in the semester, but man we had some good laughs, especially in jazz class.

As for the sports department, we had the best staff we've had in a long time and I'm glad I was part of it. Suds, you are my hero plain and simple and I'll be glad to take one for the team if need be. Next year will bring more good times, I'm sure, though it will never be the same. The only constant thing in this world though, is change.

Oh, and one last thing – Collegiansports@safamily.com. Had to get it in somewhere.

Michael Kobylanski, The Sergei Samsanov Troll Award

My adventures this semester can be summed up in a few terms – trying to graduate, fantasy baseball, utilizing resources and looking for jobs.

Enough said.

I started the semester continuing my coverage of the UMass hockey team for the fourth straight year. It was a damn shame that the Minutemen didn't make the Hockey East playoffs, but I'm sure that they won't have that problem in the next few years.

Determined to broaden my horizons a bit, I expanded my workload over to the UMass Media Relations Department. Since the end of the hockey season, I've only written a handful of stories for the Collegian, but my legacy still lives on.

As I write this, my final print ever to be published in this paper, let it be known that I am the senior staff member down here. Not Smitty. Not Shadow. Not even Benharris. It's me. I've been here the longest, and I leave with no regrets.

Since most of you are returning next year, I want to wish you the best of luck. Make sure to keep people over 21 on the good sports to ensure quality trips like we did. Other than that, keep up the good work and do the Collegian proud.

Trades anyone?

Jesse Greenspun, The Robert Parish Inhale to the Chief Award

Mi ano segundo por el Collegian es fin, y ahora, puedo decir que todos las personas aqui son cabrones. No estoy serioso, pero no hay personas aqui que puenden hablar espanol, y no entenderia que estoy deciendo.

Ok, back to English.

Suds and Brady, I am never driving in a car with the two of you ever again. Other than that, you are both good kids.

To the vets, White, Smitty, and Kobe thanks for continuing to teach me the Collegian ways. I hope you guys find some jobs.

The Field Hockey team is the best team on campus. Next year, I can feel a Final Four berth.

Women's Lacrosse and men's basketball: I enjoyed writing about you guys as well.

To the rookies, Pearson, Sacco, Glen, Jim, etc., you guys really are a talented bunch of up and coming youngsters (even though most of you are probably older than me).

Rose, has anyone ever told you that you are an attractive man. Sacco, Catherine I will see you two next year at our humble abode.

Everyone else at the Collegian is all right, too. Maybe next year they will let me write an article in Spanish.

I will end the year by saying, "I said a hip, hop, a hibbit to the hibbit to the hip, hop and you don't stop rocking to the bang, bang boogie, said up jump the boogie to the rhythm of the boogity beat."

Matthew Sacco, The Tim Wakefield Spot Starter Award

Where are we going? Who cares I'll drive. I can't believe I have been through an entire year of driving you clowns from here to eternity and I have not yet assassinated anybody. Luckily I have UMass athletics to soak up all of my anger or you guys could have ended up like that desk in sports.

But in all seriousness I have really had a great first year at the Collegian. I really appreciate the way everybody welcomes me with Yankees suck chants and spot comments.

Smitty – Loves NYC. Per capita sports championships, my ass. Need a ride to the airport, a column maybe. Hot when wet. Correspondent to Staff, no time flat. Frontal nudity. Bad decision. Where we eating? Giddy as a schoolboy. Te-Kunkel Knock Out. Kunkel Fry. Collegian Coach.

Suds – Iffy chick is Pac here, tell Pac. I'm here. Cuz Connecticut is a state. You're not ready. My Satan is more satanic than your Satan. U-Turn anywhere, anytime, NY plates. I do what I want. X-Games, cult following. Media! Antonio's yo. The Bowl Dance was the best night of my life. Span bowled up. There's only one hot smoker chick. Big Nasty. A.O.D., Don-I-CAC las. I hate Hartford. 2 to go. Ware. Athol. Say Kunkel. Yeah, golf. Chairs, enough said.

Brades – The Devils suck. Arm-in-arm U-Turn. I hear that Harvard lax broadcast was $. Swipes. We're all together. PC ticket. Bootleg McD's. Skilled, untapped, talent. Mack the Knife. Dutch deposit.

Span – Bring your tree next year. Nobody good ever came out of NH, NYC, best pizza in world. U-Mass b-ball talk. Baseball comic marathon. Hey Span you eat yet? Subway Series. Bird watching. Down to earth.

Shadow – Ride? Football Game? KO 2WD truck, snow, sad. That chick should be grateful. Urban Assault Vehicle. 0-5. Hoopla.

Pearson – Snow day. Dot-comedy. Apple D__k. Beat Mr. Slice. Who's Kunkel? Drive me to Smitty's door.

Troll – Wiffle ball. Go outside. What the F happened to his neck. Hobey column. Free lunch. Why did it hit me?

Martignetti – BBQ King. Benny Wanna go to Gym? Rose – Frito keep your shirt on. Nice Slapshot.

KC- Meal ticket! Sucks at wiffle ball. .but better than Vogt.

Pig-Italian connection, yo.

Turner – Cotan sucks. BBQ Queen. I want a big F'in sandwich. Rocky. Walking With Dino's. Burp contest, laugh happy.

Jim Pignatiello, The "El Guapo" Best Nickname Award

Ahh, feels like I'm back in High School preparing my yearbook quotes. But anyway…it's been quite a year, full of ups and downs. Pearson, I will never forget my first beat with you, brother. Water Polo rocked even though I quoted the coach a grand total of one time. So-callback! Hey, if you want a beat that requires going to only one event, it's a great one. I even got to learn a new sport.

The second beat lasted two stories, which was two-thirds of the stories women's track had written about them. Congrats to the ladies who gave me a hard time when I interviewed them, they were more right than I realized.

The spring beat was the most interesting. Softball was a great team with a great bunch of women on the diamond, but nothing could have prepared me for the aggravation caused by this beat. I think I should just leave it at that.

As for the staff I have come to know and love (yeah, right).

Adam: I won't call you by your last name ever again, even if you do it to me. I think everyone would agree that mine is worse, however. Thank you, old man, for all your wisdom and guidance. Troll: Trades, no? Whenever Griffey gets back, our swap will be a rip-off. Sacco: I swear I have come to like you more and more everyday next year should be quite a ride. DJ and Brades: you guys are great. I continue to learn from you guys more and more everyday. Thank you so much, I will forever be in each of your respective debts. Glen: thanks for being a solid beat partner. It's too bad we can't go to the tourney, would've been fun. Landers: thanks for proving that this isn't a club just for boys. Despres: I can't explain it, but you crack me up, good luck in Ed-Op,traitor. Vogt: THANK GOD you are steadily improving with the bat. I was starting to pull my hair out!

And last but definitely not least, Smitty: I'm sure everyone will thank you in one way or another in this column, but I had to thank you myself. Thanks for teaching me as much as you have. Thanks for the meeting you spent calling me out in front of the entire staff. And thanks for making me a better writer. Make sure you keep in touch.

If I forgot anyone, I am sorry. Misty-tough place for line counts.

David Rose, The Anson Carter Black Ice Award

What more can I say. Through all the jokin', clownin', and arguing I would not change my experience down at the Collegian this year for anything, except for everybody calling me Benson or Willis or…forget it, I only have so many lines.

Brady – You are number one on my hit list this year. I knew you would write some sort of article about me playing hockey, but the picture and the length that you went to make the story complete- a stroke of genius and comical. For those who had a problem with the article, CHILL. I think it was hilarious and I was the butt of that joke.

Suds and Bencal – OK after rooming with you guys at the Women's Atlantic 10 Basketball Tournament, I realized something: It was very disturbing. Congrats Suds on winning the first interviewed Golf in history, and if you guys give me a 7:00 wake-up call again, you are walking home from Philly. But you would be probably walking with my Rap Snacks – Hip Hop Pop, baby!

Catherine Turner – C-Money, don't ever change. Go Vikings, except when they play the 49ers.

White – OK last minute substitutions in Charlotte and Ohio. No more ambiguously gay guys touching your hair in Carolina. But, I am going to try to tell you this for the last time: there is no Kentucky conspiracy in North Carolina. Just because they don't have their gear does not mean that they hate them.

For Megan Clarke in office staff ..cause I said I would say this – No matter how many times Buffalo sports teams lose, their fans will always be tight.

Sacco – I agree, Frito needs to keep his shirt on. I hope that we haven't hurt your feelings with the New York crap, I do not want you to start crying or anything.

Speaking of Crying.

Smitty – I don't know what is more unbelievable, that you are graduating or that your liver hasn't dissolved because of all your drinking. Yo dog, you always be my boy. No matter how many beers go flying or how many jokes are coming, you and Mauser got me into this and I am not going anywhere. Whatever you do, you will be a success cause you put more into this paper than anybody I know. You better come back. I got a table at Charlie's waiting.

Family First, everything else secondary. Keep it real and keep it thoro.

See you in September. Peace!

Matt Despres, The Roger Clemens Loyalty Award

I've written this before.

I vaguely remember retiring from the sports staff last spring after accepting a fall internship and entertaining thoughts of greatness.

And here I am, still writing a year later, about to retire for the second (and I promise) final time.

This department was my gateway into the Collegian. It gave me a place where I could do what I enjoyed – and where I could be surrounded by others that shared that love – from the Old School (Mauser, Koenig, Teves, Saykin, Kobo, Smitty) to the New School (Soderstrom, Sacco, Brades, Pignatiello and, uh, Kobo…).

Priorities change, though. It happens. I found something else I love in Ed/Op, and one had to prevail – the latter has.

This department is in good hands, and I wish nothing but the best to Suds, Sacco and Jim. Smitty, you've never been anything but helpful and patient with me, and I appreciate that. Troll, you gave me a song, something that will haunt me until I shed this place, but in a way it's nice to hear. Everywhere.

Brady, it was a long season, but I think we did ok. No more baseball for this guy, but you can count on me sitting out in centerfield with everyone's favorite homeless UMass sports fan next season.

There's really nothing more to say here, nothing you guys don't already know. After all, if it wasn't for me…

Now let's win one for Ray.

Justin Pearson, The Bill Buckner Seeing-Eye Gruander Award

What to say, what to say? I've only been here a year but it sure seems like it's been a whole lot longer. First off I have to give major props to my bro because if it weren't for him I never would have gotten into Charlie's first semester and really caught the Collegian bug. But this is for the staff so I'm gonna stick to them. So here we go…

Greenspan, nice job with the chic you took to the UConn game, but no matter what you think Phil likes me better. I'm going to wear my shirt with pride, go UMass women's lax, limPig, I never even thought about going to a water polo match but maybe I should have. Oh ya, Russ never called me back. Vogt, you're a wiffle ball MVP no matter what the rest of these bums say. Non-sports peeps CS, Sam, Benny, Martignetti and the rest I don't know what to say, thank you and Adam was right- THAT night of Charlie's will be go down in the annals of history.

Now for the rest of the staff, I've seen the best and worst of all of y'all and now I get to tell the world. Without you guys I know my GPA would be a whole lot higher. But that just wouldn't be any fun.

Kflan, how you made it through the year in this boys club I'll never know. I'll see you around Fenway this summer and here you go…546-6645, you're welcome. Brady, I didn't think that anything could beat Providence and the whole "pink eye apple dk" thing but being the only guy in DC to see you fall and rip your pants was priceless. Sacco, good job by you picking up Ted Connover and everybody else who needed a ride. You're a good kid even though you're a Yankee fan. Can you drive me up to Smitty's door? Burgers and beer at the Conn, always. Shadow, we'll be the only 21-year-old sports guys next year so I'm gonna be dragging you out every weekend, sorry Melissa. Rose, yo, Vegas is legendary, what else can I say. Suds, you're still my boy son so don't feel bad, it's all good. We'll laugh about this when we're foremaning at 49 Puffton next year. Thanks son go Worcester. Hey Bencal, nice coat and better ass. Kobo, Troll what can I say, you're a strange, strange little man. Keep wearing the Wisconsin hat and we'll Absolutely make some trades. Hope yo' Geezer we've got the pictures and heard the stories so I just have one question, "Who ate all the pies?" I knew I liked English people and you're living proof of that. Waz till the end. Vegas baby, Vegas.

Smitty, I don't even know where to begin. Just make sure you take care of my car and you got first round tonight. I think we need our own page for Misty Eyes. We know what we did (mostly) and hopefully there will be more to come. Thanks for all you did and I'll see you around, you're a geezer kid… even if you did pick KS over KP, sad.

That's it; I'm out, slata nomar@kockedituwn.com.

Glen Straub, The M.L. Carr Clown Award

Plain and Simple I am the Clown and here is who I want to thank.

Sam – Thanks for the "clown" nickname. Now I will have a personality complex my entire life. You got a sweet volleyball serve, though.

Sacco – Without a doubt thanks for the NYC support. However Staten Island Academy sucks.

White – There is not many of us left but its nice to have someone who likes the NBA as much as I do. Keep praying for a return of those Celtic glory days.

Smitty – Which tennis girl was washing her special area on the water fountain at Amherst College? I am still dying to know. Whatever happened to that weekly NBA column? Only do features on the hot girls, I think yes. Thanks for the help with Dictator Elaine. Thanks for all the support.

Suds – Collegian basketball has never seen a dynamic duo like us on the court. You got skills for someone from Worcester, I mean its no Brooklyn. Thanks for all the help.

Brady – Devils suck. Think about this you like a team from New Jersey. Rangers in 2002. I don't even know why I care considering I could care less about hockey. The NBA is still better.

Vogt – We share a dream – a certain female tennis player at UMass in bed. Nice job taking over the tennis beat.

Troll – SAD. When you come to visit next year I will have a party with all the ho's and tolkin' you want.

Pig – My softball partner in crime. Don't listen to what those people say, we did a good job. Enjoyed working with you and hope to once again.

Greenspan – JEW-tang Clan in the house. You know you wish you still lived in NY.

And to all of you who work down at the Collegian, Red Sox Suck!

PEACE OUT,

Andy Vogt, The Craig Grobeck Punchin'-Judy-Hitter Award

Frankly, writing something that makes anyone misty-eyed has never been my forte. Therefore, I am going to try and keep this as short and as painless as humanly possible.

Looking back on this year, my first at this prestigious university and at the Collegian, I can honestly say that our humble abode in the Campus Center is the coolest damn place to work on campus. Anyone who likes sports and doesn't write for us, you're missing out on a hell of a good time.

A nervous rookie writer was I after as the men's fall tennis season approached. Somehow, I managed to make it through, despite the obvious lack of talent that I had starting off. Thanks to Elena, you helped me make it through.

As winter approached, I somehow managed to become the honorary track writer, hoooo boy. If you can write a track article, you can write ANYTHING.

And then came the spring. I was able to move up in the ranks to women's tennis. With more experience under my belt, I was able to actually come through with some halfway decent stories for our wonderful paper. Plus, it's kinda cool covering the hottest damn squad in college sports history.

Anyways, to White and Kobo, you guys are both great guys and has been a pleasure to work with. Troll, I wish you the best of luck in getting into the Guinness Book for "most fantasy teams ever". Sacco, Brady, Clown, Nomar, Greenspan, Pig, and everyone else, it was fun, we'll have more next year. And to Smitty, I think I can speak for everyone when I say that you have been an inspiration to the whole department with all the blood, sweat and tears you have put into this newspaper. Good luck next year, man.

There must be something about this place that makes me waste countless hours just chilling down in the CC basement. Whatever it is, it's something great.

Katie Landers, The Hideo Nomo Asian Relations Award

Goodbyes are always awkward. I prefer not to see them at all. It's a lot easier just to walk away.

Kobo-kaskl, the shady kid who lived on my floor. Well you turned out not to be that shady, only when you've been drinking. You were fun this year, especially when you delivered 'pizza' Brick Baker? Bryan Smith taught me a lot about writing sports. I may not have let it all sink in, but I'm sure it's floating around in there somewhere. Sacco-kaskl, no matter how much you tell me you know I don't hate you. Eric, I know I have to kiss your ass to get a good beat next semester. I think the big talk we had first semester broke the ice. Pearson you didn't work the magic I asked you about but it's ok. I'll forgive you. I'll see you at the Sox this summer. Great trip to UConn everyone. I got on ESPN like I planned. Hibachis are not fun in December. Hi Matt Bencal. Thanks for reassuring me at the end-of-the-year party. The whole sports department knows everything that happened to me this year. There were no motives behind my trip to Penn State. I am the master at flip cup. Every time we played, you didn't want me on your team. Then you pulled me in as a ringer. I can hang with the best of them at Collegian parties, even you Pearson. You guys were so much fun this year, even though I'm now just referred to as K flan. Adam White is the only one who has ever defended me even though I did better than him in the March Madness pool. I'll miss you Bry and Kobo. I didn't forget you Ryan Benharris. Ryan knows how to celebrate, a.k.a. the Collegian Christmas Party. And he's also a good friend. Best of luck to you guys.

Ken Campbell, The John Bagley Natural Athlete Award

Lots of memories… no space. Once again, regular KC is disrespected. Yo' is now officially in my vocabulary, replacing important language items such as "the" and periods. The view from press row is the best, without a doubt. Too bad the closest I could get was sitting behind Shadow. Watching hockey games with Smitty, him in the box, me next to it. Unless Hockey East was there. Third and 48 was the greatest thing to hit journalism since Bob Costas. Getting plagiarized by the Dartmouth royalty sucks. As does Connecticut, right Sacco?

Vogt, I am better than you, meager though my skills be. Kobo, or as I call him in my mind, Jimmy, you're a strange T-Roll. Pig, I'm not that much of a GOP. Suds, you're a good boss, and a nasty DJ. Diary of a Madman, yo. Nomar and Geezer, wish I could have known you better. Elena, any friend of Greener's is a friend of mine. And you can dance! Alright, that's enough. 3/48 for life, yo. Who's up for wiffle ball?

Suds and Benny may have been the co-editors, but I was the one who got the quotes. And SST: play that back for me one time yo.

Ryan Benharris, The Derek Lowe Golden Locks Award

So everyone in the sports department envies me because I covered women's water polo. It's kind of funny. Don't ever say I'm not versatile though. Have you ever met an entertainment writer, who specializes in music reviews, and television analysis, that writes news stories about peeing in the shower, and editorials about the Doggy's porno films who also claims to be an expert in women's water polo? No? well today's your lucky day!

In all seriousness, thanks to the women's water polo team for being so kind to me. Dana, Kelly and Megan, sorry that I called and annoyed you before and after every game. Thanks for the info and the best of luck in graduation. I'm back in North Carolina. Keep in touch and stay out of trouble!

Now that the "real" sport is out of the way, let's talk about a little column called, "Third and 48." Not only is it the greatest column ever to grace the pages of the MDC, but it's also been voted "most read" by the pumpkin chuckin', ice golfin', turkey shootin', livestock judging, milk consumin', porno store owners of America. (PCIGTSLIMCPSOA)

To the staff…

Smitty, good luck next year, and keep in touch. Come visit anytime, the door at my place is always open. Well, theoretically speaking. I don't actually have a door… or a place… or a job. Screw it, I'll just come visit you in New York. (What I wrote about Nomar applies to you too).

Adam, thanks for mopping the court with my ass over winter break, and in the cage.

Soderstrom, words cannot even begin to describe the most creative man in the history of the sports dept. You kept me laughing all year, and I thank you for that.

Brady, a crappy band I know once said, "All the girlies say, 'he's pretty fly for a white guy.'" I think that band was talking about you.

Sacco, I would've kicked your ass in tennis class anyway.

Nomar, for the love of god keep your clothes on.

Elena, though you always have my respect anyway, you get so much more for sticking around even after I was suggested you try to get an interview with the football coach. That takes guts. Guts even I don't have.

Jim P, worst class ever yo!

Vogt, 7 Webster for life? You need to move.

Martignetti – cuz he wrote track and he always deserves props.

Anyone else I forgot? Sorry, but MEM is a tough place to play. (Punch me in the face for that)

There it is. Another year of coverage bites the dust…boy are we misty-eyed.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – This a good day to concentrate on the more complicated aspects of your own finances. Be sure to be on time for all appointments.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You're dealing with the things on the surface again, and though you are making progress there are certainly deeper levels to examine. Do so today!
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Eyewitness reports regarding a friend or loved one may mislead you today – but with a little effort you can quickly get back on track.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Pay more attention to those close to you today than you do to yourself, and you can surely help all those you touch to increase their profit and enjoyment.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Squabbles and other explosions of emotion may be unavoidable today, but any lasting effects can surely be kept at bay.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may be quite reserved and soft-spoken today – but those around you must not be fooled. Beneath the surface you're still squarely in charge!
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You may be waiting for someone close to you to have a change of heart before you finalize plans. Indeed, patience is a virtue at this time.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You may have to "break the truth" to a loved one today, and you must choose the time and the place with great care.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You must be understanding with those who are in a bind today – for you, too, may find yourself in over your head before you know it.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Avoid being too impersonal in your business relations today. A little of that "down-home" approach can work wonders at this time.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – It is essential that you remain calm and levelheaded throughout the day. Expect the unexpected at every turn – though risks are few.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – The right timing is essential today, and you mustn't lessen your chances of success by taking on more than you can handle at this time.

A-10 title in sight of streaking UMass

George Washington first on plate for Minutemen

DAN BARTELLA/COLLEGIAN

The A-10 tournament will be in full swing on Thursday as the No. 1 seed Minutemen take on George Washington.

By Matt Despres
Collegian Staff

"The character of a team is molded by how we do, and how people react. In baseball, there is always a time when people struggle, and we'll see how people will deal with those situations."

- Baseball head coach Mike Stone before the 2001 season

Nearly three months after contemplating his roster and making those remarks, Stone will watch his team travel to Florida this week to take part in the 23rd annual Verizon Atlantic 10 baseball Championship – a tournament UMass will enter carrying the No. 1 seed.

Questions about character now? Absolutely not. This particular group has plenty.

The Minutemen (26-17, 16-6 A-10) will kick off play in Lake Buena Vista on Thursday, going head-to-head in first round action with No. 4 seed George Washington University (35-21, 13-9 A-10). UMass secured its second title in four seasons after taking eight of its final nine conference games, earning a ticket to the tourney for the eighth consecutive season.

Senior lefty Craig Szado is expected to get the start, entering the tournament with a record of 5-3 to go along with his 5.84 ERA and 40 strikeouts in 57 innings pitched. The emphasis on Szado is key, as he has performed well in conference play this season, compiling a 4-1 record in six starts.

The team's most recent success was a dominant three-game sweep of Xavier last weekend that secured the No. 1 seed. In the series, the Minutemen benefited from a number of sterling performances, none more welcome than the balance of hitting and pitching that has truly made the club, at times, a daunting task for opponents to overcome.

The marked improvement in pitching has perhaps been the most welcome sign for the team heading into the tournament. In the Xavier series, UMass received huge performances from two veteran arms, as Szado and junior Jesse Santos each chipped in with strong efforts, allowing the offense to work comfortably.

On offense, the sparks have largely been the same. Senior Nick Gorneault? Check. First baseman Jeff Altieri? Check. Right fielder Gavin Clark? Check. Stone has molded this team into a powerful hitting outfit that should handle tournament play as well as it has in recent weeks.

Rounding out the tournament, the No 2. Dayton Flyers (32-24, 15-7 A-10) and the No. 3 Temple Owls (24-28, 15-7 A-10), will face each other Thursday evening. Following Thursday's first-round action, championship play will resume on Friday, May 18 with the loser's bracket playing at 12:30 p.m. and the winner's taking the field at 4:00 p.m. The title game will be played at 12:30 p.m. this Saturday.

Minutemen baseball notes:

Helping to build upon the momentum that has carried this team through the latter half of the season have been a number of stellar individual performances, two of which were formally recognized by the A-10 this week. Junior outfielder Mike Kulak was awarded the A-10 Player of the Week honors. In a week that saw UMass go 6-0 against conference opponents, Kulak batted an impressive .458 with 14 runs batted in and two home runs.

Also honored was freshman shortstop Cullan Maumus who, in the same time-frame, collected eight hits in 16 at-bats with 10 runs scored and four RBI. His play has steadily improved at short, having split time at the position with Matt Boulanger and Adam Stojanowski.

Women's lax players pick up postseason honors depsite record

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

The way it usually works is that successful teams garner the big awards. If that precedent were followed the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team and its 6-10 record would not pick up too much hardware. But interestingly that was not the case, as the Minutewomen had four players collect nine postseason honors.

The awards started piling up two weeks ago, prior to the Minutewomen's Atlantic 10 semifinal against Duquesne. Seniors Fay Naber and Rachel Ingraffea were named to the A-10 All-Conference team at the Radisson Twelve Caesars Hotel in Philadelphia.

It was the first time that for each to be so honored.

Naber, a co-captain from Suffern, N.Y. finished second on the team's scoring charts this year with 34 points, a career high. Her 17 assists were a team and career high while her 39 draw controls led the squad.

"It was a great way to go out, to be named All-Conference my senior year," said Naber. "And it definitely helps to have a teammate on the team with me."

The only person to finish ahead of Naber on the scoring charts was Ingraffea. She led UMass with 38 goals and 39 points on the season and tallied nine hat tricks, four of which came in Maroon and White victories. The goal and point totals were career highs for the Ithaca, N.Y. native and her six free position goals led the squad in 2001.

Despite getting two players on the All A-10 squad the Minutewomen were knocked off by Duquesne 10-6 in the conference tournament semifinals. Following the loss, Ingraffea and sophomore Lori Kain were named to the A-10 All-Championship Team. Ingraffea scored three of the Maroon and White's six goals on the afternoon while Kain tallied one.

The loss was the final game in a UMass uniform for five Minutewomen but proved not to be the final collegiate game for three seniors.

Jen Nardi, Denise Brey and Ingraffea were all named to the North Division I/II Senior All-Star Team. The trio will head down to the campus of Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, Md. for the game at the annual STX Festival on June 9.

Nardi, the other Minutewoman captain, posted a 5-5 record with an 8.98 goals against average and .544 save percentage after missing the first three games of the season while recovering from off-season shoulder surgery. In 2000 Nardi was a key figure in the nation's top ranked scoring defense that captured the Maroon and White's first ever A-10 lacrosse title.

"I don't think you ever expect to receive an honor like this," said the senior netminder. "It was really hard [to come back from the injury] and to be recognized like this is an honor."

Perhaps the most surprising addition to the North squad was Brey. The Tabernacle, N.J. native made the shift from midfield to defense this season because of the Minutewomen's lack of experienced defenders and did not skip a beat. Brey handled the responsibility of anchoring the UMass defense with ease and looked like she had played in the back throughout her entire career. She tallied one goal and one assist while picking up 18 groundballs and causing 18 turnovers in 16 games this season. Brey was at her best when called upon to stop some of the nation's top attackers, such as Jami Wilus of LaSalle and Bernadette Smith of St. Joseph's.

"It was very easy," said Brey of the switch from midfield to defense. "It meant that I didn't have to run as much but I also missed going up in attack."

Brey and Ingraffea rounded out the UMass award winners when they were selected to the Division I Brine/Intercollegiate Women's Lacrosse Coaches' Association North Regional All-America Second Team. It was the first time that the pair was recognized by the North Region All-America selection committee for the honor.

Self-proclaimed lege... bids farewe...

There we were, two best friends making their first mission to UMass. We were so anxious to get here that we got lost trying to find Route 2... it took us three hours instead of two to arrive in Amherst.

From the moment I stepped foot on campus I knew this would be my choice as an institution of higher learning. For some reason things did not work out right and I was forced into taking a one-year detour at Northeastern University. My best friend, Dan Santella took a two-year detour at Emerson College. One could say we got lost then, too.

In the end we both made it to UMass – on similar paths. I learned a lot from Dan in my life – not to bet hats on floor hockey, not to wrestle with microwaves on the floor, how to live with your best friend and his best friend, the list goes on and on. But there is one thing that stands out in my mind that I learned from him: best friends are always there for one another at the best of times and at the worst of times. Graduation hats off to you Dan for always being there from the days of the heated Tornadoes/Rangers rivalries to colleagues at the Collegian – I cannot seem to lote you, no matter what I do – nor do I want to.

Now that I spoke of what I learned from my best friend, I want to let you in on some of information that I gathered in my four years in Amherst.

Sleep all day and party all night – Antonio's will someday cause heart failure. Add in a lot of drinking before you grab your hot "cheese up front" and the process will be much quicker – The best place to go on Tuesday nights is Charlie's – who can beat 10-cent wings and tall Bud Lights. Five dollars will get you 10 wings and a beer, with enough money to tip – Revolve your classes around pot roast. The Dove's Nest on Thursday afternoons will always have a special place in my heart – Stand up for what you believe in. If you are passionate enough people will listen – Frank Sinatra is the man – Meet as many people as you can, you never know your ... the next big ent... sometimes hard to ... with John Brigha... ... department ... more Coke ... Pepsi. My dad will kn... – It is be... have lov... that not ... at all. ... You ... ough being a ... ter and ... ... would been able to edit a run-on sentence. You thought wrong.

Now that I have given my words of wisdom I will get to the funny stuff that has happened as a member of the sports staff, unfortunately most are with the same person.

Kobo (that is what you were then), no more billiards stories. Stamp (formerly known as Schantie), how is the chair ... the floor at Penn State and the pizza at UNH? Kobyloski (another tweener), you almost got to drive at Ohio State, you did drive at Wisconsin and you almost peed on yourself in the bathroom at Nebraska-Omaha over the man with the gun. All (present), stole resources, was a ... whore, monopolized fantasy baseball and is a good friend.

Shadow, somehow the three amigos got to go to Ohio State. Blazers all the way, poor effort by Troll to not have the pictures yet. If we ever get a chance to trade tickets with a homeless man with a runny nose again, I would not.

The first ever win at the Whittemore Center for UMass hockey. Even though Barry was to playoff berth this year there are many to come from coach Cahoon's troops. Keep up the good work and I will be there as a fan, rather than a reporter.

I am sure there was more but I left room for others to speak their peace – it all comes back to Troll – it all comes back to memories with friends I will have forever.

Bryan Smith cried when he wrote this. It was his final act as Collegian SportsEditor and as always he took a backseat to friends.

...are about to come down off the map of ...ken. Boy, does that almost bring a tear ... years, I have scoured this coun... coast following various UMass ... to sub-freezing evenings in the ... Maine. I have experienced it – the ... the bad and the ugly.

Coming down to the Collegian on my first day here was obviously one of the best decisions of my life. Not that it was a difficult one, considering that I knew that I wanted to be a sports journalist long before I even set foot on campus.

The people that I have met over the past four years have provided me with friendships and memories to last a lifetime. I feel extremely fortunate to have had this opportunity, one that the average student around here doesn't usually get to experience. The inside jokes and other hysterical references are too plentiful to all name, but I will try to highlight some of the best ones in the following paragraphs.

Since this is my senior year, I might as well start off with some of the most recent events. Earlier this month, the solo mission to the Muddy Duck in Philadelphia was a nice effort by me, even if it still was a solo mission. I don't know if I will ever forget the horrified look on Cyndi Doyle's face when she saw me reading the Maxim on the bus ride down to Philly.

The first semester was filled with ... seemed like I was somewhere other than here at UMass almost every weekend. Needless to say, there are lots of stories to talk about from those excursions.

Arizona State – the first and arguably the most memorable of all of the trips. It's one that I'm sure I will be reminded of whenever I talk to Coach Rudy and Jorma, even if it's 50 years from now. Was I ever in rough shape for the plane ride home.

Ibrahimi and our two sidekicks ... turned out to be pretty ... comedy. And the ... his record. ... ...ham, were both great ... night. ... ...

Wisconsin – Anyone ever try a fishbowl? Taste like fruit punch, loaded with alcohol. If you ever ... in Madison, WI, make sure to partake in the uproarious festivities.

Hey Smitty, poor effort by you getting so pissed that you couldn't get involved with KK the next day. Real poor effort. At least we had enough courage to scrounge up a waiter for the plane ride home.

Florida State – not a Collegian sponsored trip, but still quality nonetheless. Every prospect was an Absolutely." Doak Campbell Stadium on a fall Saturday afternoon is a college football fanatic's dream. Another nice warm weather trip when the mercury ... was dipping lower and lower.

Cincinnati Xavier – It was a damn shame that the Musketeers got the picture perfect goal to beat the Minutewomen. Corcoran Field has been the home of too many heartbreaks over the last few years.

Ibrahimi, too bad you got kicked out with the other group, but I know you had a ball of a time. Thanks for putting up with all of my quirks on the road trips. Take it easy, Ags.

And to my crew from the dance clubs, ... I got in the way. I guess I proved to be useful ... when your teammate started to hook up with a group guy.

Nebraska-Omaha – livestock judging ... enough said. True, we went there for hockey games, ... Tim Grindle and the Iowa State livestock judging team conspiracy emerged as the hot topic. ... did we take long enough to get ... in that restaurant. Another good job by us hitting the casino in Iowa. That allowed me to add another state to the list and tack to the map.

Ohio State – another trip that will live in infamy. Yes, my friends, the trolls will be ... If there is ever a person who is horrible ... and appearance in the near future, ... have to be Marci Hupp. Thanks for ... behind the wheel.

Cookers yo, had quality ... Blazers ... was another laugh.

Reminder to self ... get those pictures developed.

Aside from this year, the rest of my trips have also been memorable. The drive to Xavier, then up to Michigan State, then back to Dayton sophomore year was truly a once-in-a-lifetime, Deja vu reunion. The women's soccer weekend at the University of Colorado only cemented the ... I want to move to Denver when all is said and done. There's nothing better than the Rocky Mountains and an ... with the best of company.

... Notre Dame would have been a bit less comical if I didn't fall in the chair in the press box. Sneaking in the football stadium was another rare opportunity that only I took advantage of – another poor effort Smitty. And why the hell couldn't the Blackhawks beat Brodeur for a goal, I wanted to hear the damn horn.

As far as Penn State is concerned, that's a great place to be if you are 21. If you are 20 like I was at the time, it takes an 'L'. I missed out on ham sandwiches in the pocket, involvement and seeing first-hand how much of squirrels PSU kids are. Smitty and Mauser, outstanding effort boys. Hell of a time, hell of a time.

I would like to give a special thanks to God for keeping me alive in Knoxville, Tennessee after the UMass football team won the 1998 I-AA National Championship. It's not brain surgery. You don't light a cigar in a gas station. Obviously, some people don't know this, and my five friends and I almost ended up in a fiery mess because of their stupidity. I guess it wasn't my time.

Of course, this column wouldn't be complete if I didn't take the time to recognize several people who have been an integral part of my Collegian/UMass Athletics experience.

Coach Rudy, words cannot express how grateful I am for your assistance over the past few years. Whenever I needed a few minutes of your time or any other favor pertaining to my coverage of the team, you always acted selflessly. I feel that this University possesses a huge asset in having you as its women's soccer coach.

Just because I'm graduating though, you won't get rid of me!! I'll be back to get at least a few games next season. I know the team will be ready to go to get to the NCAA Tournament.

Coach Cahoon, I am giddy with anticipation for the hockey season that is to come. I feel that this is about to take, I can sense the weird ... that is about to come to fruition, one that will result in a lot more wins and hopefully Hockey East titles and NCAA appearances in the near future. Just watch out for those dividers at the Gutterbar next time up to UVM.

Coach Barnes, although I only worked with you for a ... while, what a great time serving as the sentinel for ... or an Philly again, the Muddy Duck and ...

All three of these men have proven to be class acts in both the athletic arena and in life. They are truly representative of the quality individuals that we have as coaches here at UMass.

To my predecessors here at the paper – Luke, Jorma, Ralls, Casey, Mauser, Stanford, Teves, Koenig and Moore ... Reluctant, thanks for helping me get on stag in the field this semester.

To the current Collegian staff – including Smitty, Studs, Shadow, Sparx, Kilam, Meathemouth, Nomar, Svensson, Brades, Piggy, Bernal, Clavin, Vogt – and of course, the Geyser – I had a ball this year.

To my former co-editor and fellow graduating senior, best of luck in New York. Find some UAlbany prospects and get involved. Or you could just get involved with Bridie. Give my regards your buddy at the Big House. Late night Antonio's at UNH and the rest of the memories mentioned above won't soon be forgotten.

To all of my readers of the past four years, thanks for taking the time. I hope you enjoyed reading my stuff as much as I enjoyed writing it.

Adios.

Hindsight: top five UMass stories from last year

The past year brought a flood of news through the media outlets of the country and the same held true here at the University of Massachusetts. The fall 2000 – spring 2001 school year presented the student media with a wealth of exciting, high profile stories, ranging from an alleged resource abuse scandal to increased surveillance of students and three highly scrutinized resignations.

Through it all, the flashbulbs never stopped popping and the presses never stopped running. What we are left with now is a printed record of a sometimes-turbulent year, what we are left with are the 5 biggest stories of the last year.

-Adam White

1. Big Brother is Watching

Students in the Southwest living area came back from their summer break to find that they had a lot less privacy.

In order to try and eliminate the high amounts of crime that occurred in the living area, the police worked in a conjunctive effort with the University to place video cameras in the living area for extra-added safety.

But where was the camera? Both the police and the administration were mum on the issue in order to more effectively patrol the living area via video. Barbara Pitoniak from the News Office finally revealed the location when she verified that the camera was placed on the side of John Quincy Adams Dormitory in what was made to look like a light on the side of the building.

"As I understand it, the camera is important is that they know that there is a camera on them and it is viewing that particular area and taping what is occurring in the courtyard."

The new surveillance equipment failed one of its first jobs when, during a blackout that caused a riot in the living area, the camera too lost power and was rendered useless in the incident.

The University plans on putting in additional security cameras in other living areas on campus.

-Melissa Hammel

2. Flint resigns as head basketball coach

Less than 48 hours after coaching his last game of the season, James "Bruiser" Flint resigned from his position as head basketball coach for the University of Massachusetts on March 12.

A statement from the University's media relations department announced Flint's decision, after the coach reportedly met with Chancellor David K. Scott and Athletic Director Bob Marcum.

"We sat down, and they just wanted to pretty much go in a different direction," Flint said. "I said I'd resign the position. They wanted to get somebody else in there, and that was it."

"I'm not going out of here bitter; I think I'm going out of here better," Flint added. "I'll be able to go down my road and do my thing . I'll land on my feet."

The Minutemen compiled a 15-15 overall record in this Flint's fifth season as head coach. After a 3-9 non-conference start over the first six weeks, the team won 11 of 16 conference games to finish the regular season in fourth place in the A-10. The Atlantic 10 tournament saw UMass upset top-seeded St. Joseph's en route to the championship game, where the team fell 76-65 to defending champion Temple.

The position remained vacant for exactly two weeks, after which Marcum announced the hiring of former Villanova coach Steve Lappas. Flint has since been hired as the head coach at Drexel University in his hometown of Philadelphia.

3. RAs attempt to unionize

It seemed like the University of Massachusetts Resident Assistants had just woken up one morning and decided that they wanted to be part of a union. Of course, that's not how it happened, but that's how it seemed. The story came, made a lot of noise and just kind of fizzled out.

In the coming weeks, the RAs made a bid to become the first ever undergraduate labor union at any university.

Exactly what kind of bid it was or is remains to be seen. On April 9 of this year, the University categorically denied to recognize the RAs as an official bargaining unit. That same day, Chancellor David K. Scott made remarks in a statement reiterating the University's position against the union notion. And seemingly that was the last we heard from the disgruntled employees. To date, they have not appealed to the Massachusetts Labor Relations Board (MLRB), which has the power to grant them status as a union.

So what was the big deal? Well, according to the RAs, quite a bit. Their complains ranged from unfair compensation to an unfair RA judicial system to extended hours beyond their contracts.

"We've tried so much to improve our conditions and we've been rebuffed," said David Synott, an RA in John Adams dormitory and one of the people responsible for the union push. "We've been not listened to. Talking employment to management hasn't worked. We aren't going to be objectified and treated as thrown-away employees anymore."

Strong words and maybe the RAs really do have the mobilizing power to back them up. If they did, then they would make undergraduate and, indeed, labor history.

- Adam Martignetti

4. Republican Club brings controversial speaker to campus

When the UMass Refpublican Club announced that they were bringing controversial conservative speaker David Horowitz to campus many people immediately expressed their displeasure. The club brought the speaker to campus in order to raise awareness about a variety of issues on campus.

"We see him as a great person to bring to campus. We wanted to bring someone that you wouldn't normally have the opportunity to see here, now students will be able to ask questions first hand," Zack Spilman, Director of Lectures for the club said about the event.

"We are not so much trying to promote a viewpoint as we are want to promote thought and discussion."

TRICIA GRACZYK-BUMKOSKI/COLLEGIAN

Butterfield Dormitory and its infamous flag was the site of a recent tragedy.

What followed from the Horowitz talk included angry protestors, students walking out during the speech and increased security on the part of both the police and the club themselves.

"We have to tell him he's wrong," Andrew Spagnos, a protestor outside of the event said. Anyone who tells you slavery is over, that exploitation is over, is wrong."

Inside, students learned more about his views on slavery reparations and his controversial advertisement that rocked the world of college newspapers. He explained to those present that it was far too late for reparations for slavery and that often times conservative views are not represented for fear that one would be labeled a racist.

"The world is full of assholes and you can't outlaw them, it just isn't going to work," he said. "Believe me there are racists everywhere and there always will be."

-Melissa Hammel

5. Degan remains critical following Butterfield fall

A simple college prank turned tragic this past spring.

The skull and crossbones flag was the acclaimed object that sophomore Thomas Degan was reaching out to attain when he suffered critical injuries following a life threatening fall off of Butterfield Dormitory.

"It was a prank," Chief John Luippold said. "The flag belonged to a student or students in that building."

Students at Butterfield indicated that there is a rivalry between their dormitory and residents in dorms in the surrounding area to capture and keep the flag.

"The skull and crossbones flag is not the flag of rape, pillage and piracy," Ben Sandrof, a former Butterfield resident told the Daily Hampshire Gazette. "It is a symbol of cooperative dormitory's independence and community."

The prank went wrong and Degan is still lissted in critical condition after his 35-foot fall from the slate roof onto a concrete patio below. He was exiting through a forth floor bathroom window when he slipped and fell. He was transported a half a mile to the North Fire Station by ambulance and then he was airlifted to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield, MA and remains in the intensive care unit.

MOUNTAIN BIKING THE PIONEER VALLEY

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Every year, thousands of students bring their mountain bikes to the University of Massachusetts. And every year an alarming number of those bikes remain shackled to bike racks without ever having their tires touch a trail.

What makes this trend most disturbing is that there are vast networks of trails all around UMass offering just about every type of terrain challenge imaginable. The thrill of mountain biking is literally just a few cranks away from campus; all it takes is a little direction and a little motivation.

This article is designed to give riders of every skill level a number of ideas where to ride close to campus, as well as advice on some excellent terrain located within a short drive of UMass. Students and local residents alike have ridden the trails outlined below for decades, and each trail provides a thoroughly unique riding experience with its own distinctive characteristics.

"What makes this a great area for mountain biking is the combination of terrain and people," said Peter Vangel, a South Hadley resident and member of the New England Mountain Biking Association (NEMBA). "Having colleges nearby brings in a lot of people who are enthusiastic and pretty athletic. And there are plenty of good places for those people to ride."

There are also a few general guidelines that should be followed when riding area trails. The first is to make sure that you are riding lawfully. Posted signs seem to appear, disappear and reappear throughout the Pioneer Valley as the seasons change, and many existing signs are grown-in and hard to notice. Simply put, you should always search out and adhere to posted regulations concerning trail access.

The second major concern is pedestrian safety. Many of the better biking trails in the area are also popular among hikers, so always be on the lookout for people on foot (especially when you are descending). If you want to ride a particular section of trail aggressively, have a fellow cyclist ride slowly on ahead and scout for hikers.

"You don't want to piss off the hikers," said Sean Boland, a senior sport management major and member of the UMass bike team. "They're the ones who get trails closed."

Besides, yielding to hikers beats having to clean them out of your tires with a stick.

Finally, take the steps necessary to protect your own health when mountain biking. A good helmet and plenty of water are absolute necessities (experts advise at least one full water bottle per hour of riding). You should also avoid riding alone whenever possible, in case of a crash or equipment failure that would otherwise leave you stranded alone away from "civilization."

Riding with a buddy isn't just safer; it also makes you a better rider. You're much less apt to step off and walk your bike through technical terrain if your friend is crashing through it with ease.

Once you're all geared up, all you need is a destination. The first section described below (terrain around UMass) has been broken down into areas and arranged north to south, so that an ambitious rider can conquer the whole series of areas with one grueling day of non-stop riding. It is suggested that newer cyclists try these trails one at a time, however, so as not to overdo it.

New Hampshire. "The Frost" varies in width as it winds down past Cushman Village, providing a nice balance of terrain for riders of all ability levels.

The RFT is also a popular area with students in UMass's two mountain biking classes, both of which are taught by junior civil engineering majors Seth Brosnan and Geoff Christoph.

"The upper Robert Frost is a great place for people to get their first taste of the area," said Brosnan. "We bring our students from Mountain Biking I up there because it has a nice mix of single and doubletrack — not too steep or too technical, but fun. It's nice and windy and fast."

The upper portion of the RFT is somewhat rocky, making for tough climbing and exhilarating, bumpy descents. The lower portions can become somewhat soft at times.

Just below the RFT, at the intersection of Bridge St. and the Central Vermont Railroad tracks, is the Kevin Flood Accessible Trail. This somewhat short connector is fun to ride at high speeds, especially the initial drop which leads to a bridge perfect for bunny hopping. Downhill fans will also notice a few steep chutes coming down off the railroad tracks on the east side of the trail.

The KFAT crosses over Cushman Brook and leads to Puffer's Pond, a scenic spot that has unfortunately been placed off-limits to both bicycles and horses. Below the pond begins a network of tightly packed sawdust trails called the Mill River Conservation Area. Certain portions of these trails are reportedly closed to bikes, but the area is such a maze that those on two wheels essentially have free reign.

The Mill River trails are flat but very fast when dry, making for a nice place to practice sprints. The best way into the area is the Jennifer Trail off State St., which offers a thrilling drop-in down a steep bank and over a narrow wooden bridge.

"Mill River is a nice spot for beginning riders," said Christoph. "Just be on the lookout for people walking their dogs."

Moving south down East Pleasant St., the next spider-web of trails is located literally right next to campus. A ride down Fraternity Rd. (not Fraternity row) past the University Admissions Center leads to the Gerald Bozzo Trail, a soft grassy singletrack that winds through the woods and connects with the Wildwood Conservation Area. This network offers a really nice variety of terrain, ranging from rocky hillside to soft pine needle-strewn forest floor.

There is one wicked descent into the network via Village Park Rd., but that is posted as a private road for residents of the apartment complex only. Those who want to obey the law and still ride the drop can enter via the Bozzo Trail and ride (or walk) up to the top of the Village Park entrance.

Reaching the next area of trails necessitates a ride through town. This gives the avid gear-masher a chance both to spot friends and urge them to come along for the ride, as well as to ridicule those spending their beautiful spring days driving around in cars instead of biking.

Central Amherst – The Amethyst Brook Conservation Area, located a short distance outside of town on Pelham Rd., offers one of the most diverse riding experiences around on some very well maintained trails.

"The key with Amethyst is variety of terrain," said Christoph, who lives about two miles from the area. "There's a little of everything for all different abilities. There are loops that you can do in an hour and loops that take four hours or more."

The difficulty level of the terrain at Amethyst also runs the full gamut, ranging from wide, flat doubletrack to winding singletrack laced with rocks and tree roots. The trail traverses its namesake brook repeatedly, providing bridges to hop off of and wet patches to slog through.

Christoph also mentioned that trail etiquette dictates staying away from particularly muddy spots to prevent unnatural trail erosion.

Just south of Amethyst begins another spider web of trails that stretches all the way across the eastern border of the Amherst College campus. These trails tend to get sticky in the wetter months of spring, especially in its lower portions. The best terrain for mountain biking is up around the old chancellor's house, which overlooks Southeast St. from atop a hill. There is a nicely pitched, root-covered singletrack that starts along the house's driveway and spills out onto the Norwottock Rail Trail about a half-mile below.

The Rail Trail can also be reached from South Pleasant St., via a sweet drop-in that starts at an open gate across the street from and just above the Amherst Golf Club.

These areas around Amherst College are supposedly off-limits to anyone not affiliated with the College, so if you want to check it out it's suggested that you befriend someone who goes there to tag along with you.

South Amherst – A very brief trip east on the Rail Trail brings you to the Misty Bottom Trail, which starts just below the intersection of Southeast St. and the Boston and Maine Railroad. Constructed by the American Society of Civil Engineers at UMass, this beautiful singletrack snakes along the Fort River, packing a wealth of terrain (including five wooden bridges, two s-curves and one deliciously steep hill) into a relatively short distance of rises and falls.

The middle portion of the trail, dubbed "the power lines," sees the singletrack enter a sandy field (beneath power lines, go figure) and split into two side-by-side lanes, with just enough room for elbow-to-elbow racing.

Misty Bottom empties out into Groff Park on Mill Lane, just east of the South Pleasant St. intersection.

The park has official hours of 8:30 a.m. to 8:30 p.m., so anyone interested in riding the trail outside of that time period will have to stay on the eastern-most section.

A scenic spin south past Hampshire College and Atkins Farm leads to the Holyoke Range, home to the most challenging and technical mountain biking terrain in the area. Between the 1,000-plus foot peaks of Mt. Norwottock and Bake Mtn. lies an area known only as "The Notch," where an entire network of extremely challenging trails tests even the most experienced of Pioneer Valley mountain bikers.

"You can get lost in there for hours," said Christoph. "If you really want to beat yourself up you can, but if you want to just try something new you can do that too. It's definitely a more challenging place to ride."

The Holyoke Range trail network has been mapped in its entirety by Eric Barnes, a visiting philosophy professor at Mount Holyoke College. Barnes has published a full-color map on his personal website (http://www.mtholyoke.edu/~ebarnes) that depicts dozens of hiking and biking trails all along the mountain range.

At least two of those trails would not be rideable were it not for area residents like Vangel, who has worked in conjunction with the NEMBA and park supervisor Mike Smith to map and build several trails around Mt. Norwottock. Vangel's "experts only" trails allow mountain bikers to explore areas of steep, rocky terrain that were previously only accessible by foot.

"One of the bike trails we built was a former hiking trail," Vangel said. "That meant limited work cleaning it up, which was a godsend."

But for all the effort that people like Vangel put into building and maintaining mountain bike trails in the Pioneer Valley, there are other, less constructive forces that threaten the integrity of these very same areas. While cycling the Robert Frost earlier this season, Boland came upon an area rendered virtually impassable by careless logging procedures. Such damage has also been inflicted on portions of the Amethyst Brook area, where logs, brush and deep ruts from heavy equipment have turned well-maintained trails into obstacle courses. Boland points to such abuse as being something that all environment-conscious mountain bikers must rally against.

"People have to know that stuff like this is happening," Boland said. "It's just a shame to see a place like that where so many people ride being ruined by loggers who don't care."

Raising awareness of the area's mountain biking trails is a goal that will reap many of its own rewards. Not only can abuse of natural resources be combated, but students and residents alike can come together and really appreciate the unique and exciting mountain bike terrain that is all around them. For there is nothing like a facefull of breeze, the jolt of the handlebars and the feel of singletrack beneath your wheels as you rocket down a trail.

It definitely beats leaving your bike chained to a rack all spring.

Welcome to UMass from the Daily Collegian!

About your College Newspaper:
The Collegian was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life. We became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914, the Bi-Weekly Collegian in 1951, and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. The Collegian has been published daily since 1967. It has been a broadsheet publication since 1994.

The Collegian is produced by students. They write the stories, sell the ads, make the ads, design the paper, and even deliver the paper. We are entirely student produced. We don't even take money from the University.

INTERESTED IN WHAT YOU SEE?

We'd love to see you. Come and see us with any questions you may have. Our office is in the basement of the Campus Center (the big ugly gray building with the University Store) room 113. Or you can call us @ 545-3500

Good Luck!

Make Yourself Heard

Don't want to be a little fish in a big pond? Well, make yourself heard while hear at UMass. The quickest way to do that? Write for the Collegian. We publish 17,000 copies of our paper every day, making us the largest College Daily Newspaper in New England. It is estimated that 25,000 people see our pages on any given day. Whether you'd like to write news, diversity, arts, sports, ed-op, or even want to work on our website, come by and see us, and get your name out there.

Express Yourself

Do you have a creative mind? Want to use it? The Collegian Graphics Department helps to create ads and design the paper. They do so using high powered Apple Computers and some of the latest desk top publishing software. Don't have experience? No problem. We prefer experience but we are willing to train you. Use your creative mind to produce something that will be seen by 25,000 people.

Looking for Experience

Are you a SOM student looking to gain some real world experience? Or are you any other major that wants to see how business works? If so, the Collegian Business Department may be right for you. Our student run business department is responsible for carrying on the every day activities of a real business, from advertising to human resources.

Get involved!

This is your paper

As a student at the University of Massachusetts, you now have a number of opportunities to get involved in how this campus works. Outside of class, and outside of dorm life. Any current student will tell you that the true college experience comes not from simply going through the motions, but rather from heading out and discovering what's here; not from the classroom exclusively, but from the people. From day one, it's all yours if you want it.

This is your paper.

If you're coming in as a journalism major – or any major, for that matter – this is your chance to grow. To voice your opinion for 28,000 people, and to cover the events that affect each and everyone of those individuals.

A sports fan? Here's your chance to cover some of the top Division I squads in the country. Through the sports department you can earn valuable experience as a beat writer – Interviewing players, coaches and making the occasional road trip. No class on this campus can teach the skills you'll pick up while working up to the expectations of covering a team on campus – it's something you need to do to learn, and this is the place to start.

Interested in the arts? The Collegian Arts department is a perfect opportunity to dig around and discover what really interests you. Music? Art? Film? Theater? It's all possible, and by living in the Five-College area, there's never a shortage of performances to cover. With free tickets to shows and the chance to interview/review some of the bigger names around, it's a prime launching pad for your collegiate writing experience.

Have something on your mind? Don't keep it to yourself. The Collegian Editorial/Opinion page is a powerful forum for any and every student to voice the issues that are of importance to them. Through Letters to the Editor and column submissions, it is the most effective method at UMass of letting the campus know how you feel.

In the Collegian News department, you'll have the chance to cover the decisions that affect all of us. From the Student Government Association to the politics in the Town of Amherst, there are many ways in which you will be able to improve your writing and put into practical use what you're learning in class.

Writing isn't the only door into the Collegian, though. Our graphics department is responsible for everything from designing ads to laying out each individual page. Our business department is a great place to earn experience selling ads.

There are a number of entry points here at the Daily Collegian. If you see something you don't like, then come and become part of the solution. Involve yourself.

I scored six times

SAM WILKINSON

On a Monday night, I went to the Mullins Center to play soccer. After an awful day, I went to play a simple game. I sought something from that game, some measure of rarely found satisfaction. When I got to the field, there were big rain-clouds in the distance and it looked like Northampton was being rained on. There were only four people playing any sort of game. A fifth was running around off to the side of the field. My arrival made three on three sides.

When it comes to soccer, I was a goalkeeper, a thankless task. The only satisfaction for that position is the win. Without a win, or better yet the clean sheet, the goalkeeper has failed. Of course, with only six players playing on lacrosse nets, there wasn't any need for a keeper which meant that, like most of the times I play now, I'd have to actually run around and try to keep pace.

Keeping pace. Unlikely. There were two Argentineans, whose names I never got, an Eastern European, whose named sounded like Pol-something but I never got that either, two Asian players, Hiro and Jay if I believed what I heard, the other American, whose name I never knew, and me. The game they played was so simple and so beautiful.

Three on three, play until the sun goes down, anything nice on either side gets a compliment and the game just keeps going. As the big American, I am a damned lunk on the field. I always am. I'm never fast enough or skilled enough to keep up with players of foreign caliber and on this night, the other American. He was so quick to and had such a need to score. He could also run for hours, like everyone else on the field. I could wheeze for hours, but that doesn't have the same appeal, does it?

Allow me to interrupt myself and point out that, to a point, I'm romanticizing the game. I'll explain why momentarily, because I need to keep everything bathed in a sea of beauty to explain my night.

I was awesome. For me anyway, I absolutely tore the house down while playing, and that included taking a ball in the back, missing a few open shots, losing the ball to defenders and having to slow myself down because of all the stitches I was getting in my sides when I tried to run. Considering all of that, I was awesome. My first goal? Somebody tried to put the ball over me and I caught it with my shoulder, then I headed it in front of me, then I finished the ball into the net. I did all of that.

And then, we were all scrambling in front of the net. I was on the left side of the net and a player who was centered fluffed a kick that rolled towards me and I let it roll under me and I backheeled it into the net. Then I had the ball almost on the goal line near the goal and I curled it into the net with a quick kick. Then I stole the ball (which bounced off my hand) and with the outside of my left foot. I bent the ball into the net from a distance (and when the Eastern European complained that the ball had hit my hand, I said I only remembered the ball hitting my foot before it hit the net and he sort of laughed and said I had a good coach). Then from straight on I booted the ball around the defender and in. Then I took a pass from maybe ten yards out and kicked it over the defender and dropped it down into the net.

I have never scored a goal on a goalkeeper in a game. Never. Not once have I seen a keeper in the same position as I was so many times. The one or two times I ventured onto the field and out of the goal box, I missed a goal by a few inches off the top right hand corner and I've been headbutted in the mouth, which explains my blackened front tooth which had to be fused into my mouth with metal so I could keep it.

Six times I scored that night. Six times. Ok, so the game wasn't England-Germany from 1990, that's for sure. The game was nowhere near as good as I'd like to remember it. For three on three, it was fairly slow and basic – up and down the field, back and forth – but that was made it so good: the simplicity and the friendliness and the smiles and the laughing. And my six goals. I once scored twice in a pickup game like this and immediately went home to tell my roommate. Six times I watched something I did hit the back of the net. I have no illusions about my performance and will acknowledge that I'm not going to score like that again. The next time I play, I'll miss the net on the three shots I take and I'll curse myself every time. I'll go back to being big American defender who gets to pass off to the players who are much better than me. Then they'll go and score.

And now, a brief aside.

It is very difficult to find satisfaction in this world. There are very few times when any of us can sit back and say 'now I'm satisfied.' We get papers we spend hours writing back with Bs instead of As, our dates don't turn out as perfectly as we planned, the album isn't as good as it should have been and the beer is Natural Light instead of Miller Lite. The weather's ten degrees cooler than it should have been, the wiffle bat breaks halfway through a game, we lose 2-1, the professor doesn't care about the students, we lose when we should have won, nobody recognizes the work you've done, the cute girl picks the cuter boy.

Sounds depressing doesn't it? That's because it is. There's so much in this world that can drag us down as individuals. There's so much that can ruin a day. There are so many reasons to be unhappy. I wrote that satisfaction was a tough thing to find; I wasn't kidding. In fact, finding it is damned near impossible because the more anyone looks, the harder it is to find. Like something you've lost, it's in the last place you look.

And that's why I was satisfied after the soccer game. On an awful day, I played a simple game. I scored six times and I'll likely never do it again. That was enough satisfaction for the time being. It didn't make the world a better place, it didn't make me a better person but for a few minutes, I sat back and drank the game, satisfied.

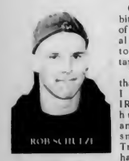
A liberal taxation



ROB SCHULTZ

Oh, the bitter irony of the liberal required to pay taxes.

Yeah, that's right. I owe the IRS three hundred and fifty smackers. Trey and a half clams. I, Rob Schultze, for the very first time in my life, will be giving money to the government in tax form.

It comes as quite a shock. I've been working ever since I turned sixteen and Mr. Deluca gave me a job as a bagboy at Stop & Shop. In the almost five year interval since then, tax time has been a welcome boon to my checking account, as Uncle Sam has cut me a decently fat check with alarming regularity.

This year, however, it is my auspicious fate to have crossed whatever invisible barrier separates the boys from the men and entered into the realm of the responsible, tax-paying citizen. They want my money, and they are damn well going to get it.

It serves me right.

All these years of being a bleeding-heart flaming liberal hippie bastard are finally catching up to me. Who wants to extend welfare? I do! Who wants socialized health care? Me! Who wants to spend massive amounts of money on everything from public schools to environmental conservation to affirmative action? Rob! Rob! Rob!

I'm the one who wants the government to suck up as much money as possible from the populace because, quite frankly, the populace doesn't know what to do with it. The populace uses its cash to buy Twinkies, N'Sync posters, and Jar-Jar Binks memorabilia. The government, in my view, could use that same money to make sure that single moms have the capability to lead a productive and healthy life for themselves and their children. And, to do this, the government must get the money from the people, usually by taxing the living bejeesus out of them.

Sure, I definitely support the whole movement for taxing the rich until they scream for mercy, but I also think that, since everyone would conceivably benefit, that everyone should give, and that definitely includes middle-class slobs such as myself.

It was so great in theory. Now I have to actually live up to it.

And so? I've been bitching and whining as though I were some sort of Republican or something. I've put sad, sarcastic away messages on my IM about the cruelty of it all. I cried to anyone who would listen. I have bemoaned the loss of $350 to the Internal Revenue Service far more than I ever regretted the loss of, say, my innocence, or my hair. Well, not my hair. But I still bitched about taxes.

Then I stopped.

I realized that this is the great test of the liberal. Any person must someday be called upon to put their belief to the test – the patriotic soldier when war breaks out, the religious person upon their deathbed, the pro-choicer with the pregnant girlfriend, the gay-rights activist who's son comes out of the closet. These are the times when people are put to the test, when they have to, once and for all, face the hypocrisy test and practice what they preach.

The Democrat at tax time faces no situation near as serious as the ones I've pointed out above, but the parallel is the same. There is no choice, of course, regarding paying taxes, unless you want to experience a federal penitentiary from the inside. There is the choice, however, of becoming bitter. Of saying "Why me? Why should I pay for other people's misfortunes? Can't these people just get a job and let me keep my hard-earned cash?" This is the test – to resist saying these things, to keep the ideals, to keep the greater good in mind.

I passed.

When April 15th does roll around, I am going to sign my check with pride. I am going to picture what my $350 is going to do within the great big-governmental scheme that dominates us all. I'll picture chalk in an inner-city classroom somewhere. I'll see the single waitress in a dead-end town buying food for her two children. I'll realize that my minor sacrifice can, when combined with the sacrifices of those around me, make a huge difference in lives. This is the core of liberalism, which I've always verbally embraced, and now have to also do in reality.

So keep on bitching about the hit your wallets take on tax day, but take comfort, if you can, that at least Teddy Kennedy and I are happy.

Talking about 'our' generation

DAVE TROUPES

We are – and I say this will full awareness of my own implication in the problem – a generation of moochers. Of slackers. Every last Pearl Jam-listening, suburb-dwelling, car-access-having, irony-toting one of us has grown up in a state of prolonged childhood by which we have been sheltered from much of the colder truths of life. (I trust that my generalization here will be forgiven – those of you who feel yourselves free of such economic privilege may count yourself free of my accusations, for what that is worth.) We are the (largely) white bourgeoisie, and we have been raised in an environment of gratification. This is not to say immediate gratification; sometimes we have to wait a year and a half until graduation for our first used car, and sometimes we have to work at after-school jobs to make available the sort of disposable income we so love to drop in the pockets of the local movie theater or Newbury Comics. The very disposability of that income, however, illustrates this privilege.

On what do we blame this? General American prosperity? Bottomless toy chests are an excellent formula for producing spoiled children; or, to appease those defensive readers who might narrow their eyes with an indignant "not me," nearly bottomless toy chests produce mostly spoiled children. And you can continue to dilute that by degrees if you choose, but the underlying accusation remains the same: we have grown up in a land of plenty, and plenty is what we expect. If not now, then soon.

Mix, now, if you will, this materialistic status quo with our generational roots. I don't know about you all, but my parents are what I lovingly refer to as reformed hippies, and I don't mean to say that they sold out to the system, or anything to nauseatingly Gen-X, but that, at some point during their mid-twenties they encountered real life, got jobs, and had to leave the task of filling the world with love to someone else.

That culture, however, lives on in various aspects of our society. "Free love, man. Free love. Groovy." It's only a cliché because of its universality (within the sphere of recent American history, anyway), and there is a dense foundation of truth to that recent past we seem so eager to dismiss with a self-conscious giggle. We're a generation of wanters raised by a generation of givers (somewhere in there are the yuppies, the generation of takers), and what does your average teen spend more time wanting than anything else? ...Besides that?

Music.

And so I reach my point. Here we have an age bracket used to having its desires fulfilled with a minimum of personal expenditure, acting under the influence of a society flavored heavily with ideals of personal freedom and community, and yet which lives (as can only be expected in such a proudly capitalist nation) in a land of extreme commercialization. And nowhere else has this conflict been so illustrated as in the issues raised by Napster.

I'm sorry for having to make you read that word again – I know I'm sick of it. I'll make my point quickly: Napster is the perfect consummation of one half of our society's composition – the "Free Love" half – and the perfect antagonist to the other half – the capitalist, commercialized half.

Some kid wants a song, so he fires up Napster and gets himself that song. Groovy, man. Free music. You can swap whole albums, live bootlegs and rarities and that disc of pop ditties you'd never plunk down actual cash for; it's like one nation-wide passing of the hash pipe. Far out. The internet was, before the advent of banner ads and bankruptcy-bound dot-coms, something of a newborn utopia, a bustling marketplace where shop owners maintained their booths out of their own pocket and everything was about the free trade of information, and that image has largely stuck around, despite the internet's rapid commercialization.

So what could be more expressive of that freedom and sense of community than a nation-wide network of music appreciators sharing their collections, sticking it to the Strawberries and Sam Goodies out there?

The problem, of course, and this cannot be stressed enough, is that they're also sticking it to the artists that produce the music. I hear people say things like "People should have access to free music" as if this music were mined in pure form out of the ground, and therefore we could claim some sort of natural right to its collective ownership. They speak as if music always were meant to be free, and that Napster is somehow righting an old wrong.

Back in the real world, however, an album is an enormous undertaking, and anyone ignorant and selfish enough to believe that they have the right to enjoy the fruits of someone else's labor without due compensation has been raised with all the wrong inclinations about fairness and respect. No one would ever expect a movie company to produce a film and then hold free viewings for anyone interested, and no one would expect a writer to produce a novel and then hand the manuscript off, free of charge, to be photocopied for anyone interested.

So why, then, do we expect music companies and the artists that represent them to tolerate the free distribution of the music to which they have the rights? The answer is simple: convenience. It's an easy crime to get away with. It's hard to feel guilty over the click of a few buttons. The simplicity of using Napster, however, is no reflection on the gravity of its misuse.

We've heard the argument that the contracts that bands have to sign in order to get a record deal are massively exploitative, and that, until a band has proven itself commercially viable and can renegotiate, the record company stands to make much more than the band through its sales. This is certainly true, and it's unfortunate that so many upstart bands are abused in this fashion, but bypassing both the record company and the band through Napster does nothing to help the band; if anything the threat of this music-swapping only makes the record companies guard their interests even more jealously.

We've also heard the argument that Napster helps otherwise unheard-of bands get exposure in a manner charmingly similar to more traditional underground tape-swapping systems. This is also certainly true, and I think that the potential of the sort of technology that Napster represents is enormous, and could revolutionize the sorely-lacking egalitarianism of the music industry. In its current misguided application, however, this technology takes the choice of distribution out of the hands of those with a legal right to the music, and puts it in the hands of any kid with a CD-to-mp3 ripping program.

So what's to be done, then? Unfortunately, the issue is, and will be, dictated by the technology, which is still emerging bit by bit. We cannot return distribution control to the artists and their labels until some way to prevent the translation of CD's into mp3s is developed. And once one such method is developed, of course, it will be only be a matter of months until that system is circumvented by a new technology. And so on.

Likewise, the recent court decision against Napster is hardly reason for record companies to relax; other programs have already sprung up to take its place, and more will follow those, and any hope of a permanent solution to the issue of emerging technology seems patently foolish.

The larger issue to be resolved, then, and I must admit not to harboring much hope of its resolution in the at-all near future, is one of our own selfishness and hypocrisy. We claim to be the land of the free, and yet we bypass other people's freedoms in order to save ourselves money. We claim to belong to a community of music appreciators, and yet we act without thought for those who form the foundation of that community: the artists who toil away at their craft, driven not, we hope, solely by material desire, but deserving all the same everything to which the success of their art entitles them.

Passionate German hardcore plays it safe

WATERDOWN
Never Kill The Boy On The First Date
Victory

"Impress me," demands Waterdown. The opening track is an arms-folded request of hardcore music: what have you got?

"You're nothing new to me/ and all the things you say/ have been traced out for you." A far from subtle indictment of punk/hardcore would be much for effective coming from a band that could escape such criticism.

Waterdown is not one of those bands. They're not bad by any means, but they're not blazing any new trails.

This German band consists of drummer Jorg, guitarists Claus and Holger, bassist Christian, and screaming and singing vocalists (Ingo and Marcel, respectively).

The content on their debut Never Kill The Boy On The First Date is split pretty evenly between sappy emo core about girlfriends and quiet lament, and anti-social rants about life's big problems. The lyrics (by Ingo and Marcel) are very elementary, but for all their simplicity it's kind of nice to know quickly what the songs are about. It creates immediacy with the subject matter, a practice reinforced by the by-the-books hardcore/emo sound.

The sing/scream split is often divided on a song-by-song basis; rallying cries against capitalism ("Corporate Identity") are handled by screams, while sweet love letters like "Your Shadow" are strictly Marcel territory, who actually contributes some very memorable vocal harmonies. His voice isn't terribly distinctive, but a smooth and confident delivery suits the band's no-frills approach nicely.

Waterdown is at its best when they bring both vocalists in on the same track. The strictly Ingo material is bland, but his minor contributions on "Impress Me" and "Lessons" are an asset. In the end, though, Marcel's forceful singing and snarling chorus on "Impress Me" makes the strong case that he can carry the vocal load himself and Ingo's cliched growl is just holding the band back.

The lyrics are sharpest when they don't give completely to either melodramatic schmooze ("would you call me at midnight/ just to let me know you're there/ to hear your breath on the line/ gets me to sleep tonight") or overbroad political rants ("under the heels of the corporations/ your small world is crashing down/ under the laws of a worldwide market"). "Lessons I Can't Learn" is a serious introspective look into the personal responsibility for the end of a relationship. "From A Different Angle" examines how time distorts once familiar places.

Death to false emo' is the writing on the wall of the Waterdown website. These guys certainly mean it, but authenticity is the least of their problems. Like their brothers in spirit Shelter and Glassjaw, whose most recent works have been highlighted by a couple good tracks and lots of the same, Waterdown needs to exploit their strengths to come up with something more creative and outstanding. That way, the answer to the "Impress Me" question "two years from now where will you be?" will be a lot more impressive.

Shrek a sleek adventure with a heart

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Alumni

SHREK
Directed by Andrew Adamson and Vicky Jenson
with Mike Myers, Cameron Diaz, and Eddie Murphy

Shrek will not make waves because of its animatronics. Visually, the movie offers nothing that we haven't seen from Disney or even from Dream Works before. It will not be renown for intricate plot structure nor its compelling characters. However, what Shrek may be remembered for, years from now, is burying the Disney prototype that has dominated, and in some ways, encumbered animated film since basically the beginning of time.

Shrek is everything that typical Disney animation is not. It's funny, clever, witty and, at times, outrageous. It takes typical assumptions about animated film and either crushes them or completely ignores them altogether. In a sense, Shrek the movie is an embodiment of the ungainly, rude green ogre that is its main character.

That ogre (Mike Myers) has had his home, an isolated swamp in the middle of nowhere, invaded: first by a talking donkey (Eddie Murphy), then by other exiled fairly tale characters of note. He's not happy, so he and the donkey take off to appeal to the ruler of the land, Lord Farquaad (John Lithgow). Fortunately for Shrek, the undersized Farquaad has needs of his own.

First, the Lord is very un-kordly; he's a midget. Second, his kingdom is comprised of these fairy tale characters, so it's not really a kingdom at all. Lastly, he's not really a king because he has no queen to marry. And that's where Shrek comes in. Farquaad sends Shrek off to rescue a princess (Cameron Diaz) who is being held captive by a dragon in some far away castle.

It all sounds very "story-bookish" and it is. Shrek makes abundant use of fairy tale characters and plotlines for comedic purposes. Even the princess is disappointed by her rescuer, because he does not fit the typical mold of the heroic knight. And indeed, Shrek does not fit the mold that the audience would expect. The Gingerbread Man is held legless and captive by Farquaad in one scene and the wannabe king taunts, "Run, run as fast as you can, now." Farquaad's "size" inadequacies make ample material for sexual innuendo from Shrek and his donkey companion. That's the kind of adult appeal that Shrek has. I can definitely see it becoming a crossover hit. It's animated so the kids will likely come. And the humor definitely skews adult in some cases, like Toy Story. For good measure, Shrek even tosses in an absolutely hilarious parody of The Matrix. In the scene, the princess kicks the butt of potential forest attackers in Keanu Reeves style.

During another scene, birds of the forest are blown up like balloons for the amusement of Shrek and his princess. It's undoubtedly shocking, because you don't expect, but the movie moves along as if nothing's wrong. Indeed, the entire film has a blaze attitude and fresh, fast paced feel. It manages to avoid, at least for a long time, the heavy-handed feel that can bog down Disney films.

Of course, a typical romance develops between Shrek and the princess. Popular Disney themes like "accepting others," "accepting ourselves" and "accepting differences" arise. But that's about where the comparisons stop. Happy, feel-good ending a given, Shrek is an enjoyable romp – a twisted tale of courtly adventure gone bad or gone so amazingly right.

Eddie Murphy is absolutely a tour de force as the sidekick. His slick talking, self-deprecating donkey is brilliant. It gives Murphy the perfect vessel for his humor without the theatrics of his onscreen presence. Mike Myers adopts a Scottish accent for the lead role – something which I consider one of the movie's weakest points – but he embodies the brutish ogre fairly well. It would have been interesting and possibly better to see Chris Farley, who actually did voice some parts of the film before his death, in the role.

In publicity interviews for the film, Dream Works' execs said that they did not intentionally set out to attack Disney. In fact, Dream Works even held a special advanced screening of Shrek for the people at Disney. Apparently, Disney expressed no objection.

Maybe they should have. In fact, Disney should be afraid. A studio has finally succeeded not only in copying Disney's success, but more importantly in challenging the fundamental way in which they make movies. Shrek is an absolute success and I highly recommend it, even if you haven't been in grade school for a while.

BINOCULAR

Maverick

Dear Maverick Records,

Having dedicated my life to the revolutionary cause of smashing this country's neo-imperialist agenda, I have learned two very important things in the struggle for true freedom. One, those who stand behind me must be willing to rape the integrity of America's evil corporate power structure. Second, there can be no true revolution without the proper music that will inspire my comrades to bring about the collapse of the U.S. bourgeois ideologies.

Keeping this second fact firmly in mind, I contacted the auxiliary resistance forces at Maverick records and informed the publicity personnel that the commander of the rebel faction (that's me) needed a CD that would ignite the hearts of his soldiers and exhort them to action. They informed me that they had just the thing; a Molotov cocktail of a CD entitled Binocular.

Admittedly, when I first received the album at our underground base I was skeptical of its revolutionary potential. Song titles such as "You Were The One" and "Don't Say Goodbye, Say Goodnight" initially didn't seem appropriate as the soundtrack to our justified slaughter of bloated and corrupt corporate fat cats.

After further review of the album, I regret to inform you, but I do not feel it will be suitable listening material for our platoons of bloodthirsty insurgents.

I have outlined a few reasons for this. Many of the songs sound so wimpy as to drain my men of any testosterone fueled spirit. Lines like "now lock your doors and chain up/ all of your mixed emotions" seem more fitting for the credits of "7th Heaven" or "Dawson's Creek" than for extracting a knife from the heart of the capitalist demagogue. I mean, come on! In fact, words as silly as "I lie awake and feel your nearness .. I don't wanna run beneath your tears" lead me to question if you might be allied with the sprawling conservative Hydra, and send this CD with intentions of mutiny or ambush.

These are matters to be resolved another day, my "friends." For now, I am sending Binocular back and returning to the front.

Sincerely,
Michael Delano

RUSTIC OVERTONES
Viva Nueva
Tommy Boy

Viva Nueva, the new album from Maine's Rustic Overtones, is the sound of a band more excited at eight years than many bands are at one. The music is filled with an energy that tells of a band approaching the studio wide-eyed and giddy. Horns, keyboards, funk, ska, they're all here, but the album doesn't feel like a disjointed attempt at throwing every style on earth at the listener. Rather, the mood of the song dictates what sounds the band needs to draw from, and as evidenced by Viva Nueva, there is plenty of sounds from which to draw.

This latest album builds upon 1999's Volume Up EP, and four of the EP's songs are featured on Viva Nueva. "Gas on Skin," a groovy, bass-heavy toetapper, is wisely placed at the beginning of the album. It keeps the momentum going from the opening song "C'Mon," a jumpy inspirational mantra that is the perfect introduction to Dave Gutter's passionate vocals. His rough, smooth delivery keeps the band grounded, although he can just as easily belt forth a rallying moan or a moving sincere yelp that is Steven Tyler's trademark obsession.

"Smoke," featuring Funkmaster Flex's turntable skills, is an intriguingly dark song, made so through a combination of the guitars of Flex's scratches, resulting in a successful and quite unexpected collaborative effort. "Beekeeper" is a little throwaway intro to the album's best song, "Man Without A Mouth." One of two songs with David Bowie on the album, it's an explosive closer that should cement their position as one of modern rock's most creative forces.

The new tracks are great for the most part. "Sector Z," the other Bowie-assisted track, is an outrageously funky space romp. "Check" and "Combustible" bounce with reckless abandon, and even more personal efforts like "Love Underground" and "Hardest Way Possible" are energized by the urgency of the band. Not everything succeeds; the sapp "Valentines Day Massacre" and "Boys and Girls" stand out like sore thumbs. But they can't come close to ruining one of the most consistent and stimulating releases of the year. As Shuggie Otis would say, this is inspiration information. (Michael Delano)

J.E.E.P.
V2 Records

"Hey, you hear the new album by Oasis?"

"Nope."

"It doesn't sound quite right. The songs sound suspiciously like they've tried to copy themselves."

"They what?"

"It's like Oasis went into the studio, got incredibly drunk, and then tried to copy its own sound while severely inebriated."

"Whatever do you mean?"

"Take the first track, 'Vegas Two Times' a ridiculously bad single with cheap background singers who attempt to add something to the lead singer's Liam impersonation. It isn't creative necessarily, or that good to listen to, but instead just sounds like a cost-effective imitation to hope on a sound that Oasis did five years ago on Definitely Maybe."

"Wait, are you saying that there's a new Oasis album that basically sounds like a cheap rip-off of their own earlier work?"

"Indeed I am. 'Lying in the Sun?' 'Have a Nice Day?' It's like the Liam wanted to sound like fellow important Englishman Thom Yorke of Radiohead. He's got a gravelly voice and a melodic voice, all in an attempt to sample something English that might play to a stupid American public, as if we can't hear the difference. Why not sing like Boy George and see if that gets over with the crowd?"

"It sounds like a really bad album. Like it's bland and devoid of any emotion at all. How strange of Oasis to get together to make music by rather pay direct tribute to themselves by admitting they're nothing more than a cheap rip-off of ... well, themselves. Can I see the CD case? Maybe there are at least some entertaining photos of Liam and Noel hitting one another or drinking or pissing in the airplane aisle."

"Sure."

"Well, the music sounds like Oasis, but wait a minute, what's this? This isn't Oasis at all! You've deceived me. It's some band called the Stereophonics and its album J.E.E.P.!"

"Well it still sucks."

"Yes. Yes it does." (Sam Wilkinson)

The clicker has been passed on; a look back as new season arrives

By Kurt Polesky

The Collegian's beloved "Tube Notes" column has a new writer: me. Kurt W. Polesky, formerly the Collegian's "Boy Band Expert," now promoted to "Tube Notes Writer" (The New York Times calls daily with job offers, as you can imagine). I'll do my best over this upcoming semester to provide my insight and latest news into the world of television. But be forewarned, I love Anne Robinson, and old editions of WCW Monday Nitro. I also strangely enjoy the "teenage bootcamp" editions of "The Jenny Jones Show." Raymond Moses rules.

Anyway, now that the 2000-2001 television season is behind us, let us reminisce. For all you new students reading this, I've decided to grade the networks performance this past season using the unique Umass grading scale The scale goes something like this: A, A/B, B, B/C, etc. Or if you are in a large lecture class it is something like this. 54% of questions answered correctly equal an "A"

NBC- The good: "The Weakest Link." The Bad: "Tucker." The Ugly: "The XFL." NBC certainly has a fair balance of decent shows. "The Weakest Link" is TV's best game show by far. It's "Millionaire" with an edge if you will...and I will. The usual crop of "Must See" shows certainly were solid as well. However NBC had some major bombs with "The lar network in nursing homes, CBS is at least relevant again with "Survivor," even if it is all rigged. Nothing else really earth shattering on this network this past season. but the exec who thought of giving Bette Midler her own show should be tested for sanity. "The Late Show" also improved over the past few months as well. Grade: C

Fox: Certainly not the network for the high falootin' types, Fox still managed to provide some decent entertainment. The Sunday night lineup anchored by "The Simpsons" is excellent. "Boston Public" proved to be one of this season's best new dramas. Also, where else can you see "World's Wild Police Chases" or "Moment of Impact." Plus, they've got better NFL coverage than CBS. Grade: A/B

UPN- Does UPN have anything that anybody watches except for the WWF? Grade: C/D, no wait...they had "Chains of Love" and "When Chefs Attack," grade change: F

WB- The teenybopper network, and really nothing else at this point. "Dawson's Creek" has slowed to a snails pace in its storylines. When it comes to the other shows, "Felicity," "Roswell," "Buffy," etc, if you've seen one, you've seen them all. Grade: B/C to play goalie again."

Final GPA for the networks this season: 2.167. No Dean's List.

After a Little League season of donating his body to punishment in the crease, Campolettano was looking forward to fluttering the nets, instead of fearing the sound of rubber on twine. Unfortunately, the glory of attack was not in the cards; he was instead bound to an existence between the pipes.

"The next year nobody wanted to play goalie again," he said. "So I got stuck playing and I was halfway decent at it so I just stuck with it."

Campolettano was a quick study in the cage, and by the time he reached the high school level, he was one of the top goalies on the Island.

Campolettano was simply dominant in his junior and senior years of high school and while his on field presence wowed Long Island lacrosse crowds, it also drew attention from many top lacrosse programs.

"I talked to Syracuse, Duke, Towson and Cornell but I came here [UMass] and I had a great time on my trip," he said. "I thought the guys were great, I talked to coach [Greg Cannella]. He was young and I thought he was on to something."

His staunchest competition for the title of best goaltender on Long Island was present Syracuse goalie Rob Mulligan. Through no fault of his own, Campolettano was at somewhat of a disadvantage because of the nature of the school he attended and played for.

The distinction between the two talented backstops was that Mulligan played for Farmingdale, a public school, while Campolettano backstopped St. Anthony's, a private institution.

"Me and Mulligan were supposedly the two best goalies on Long Island," he said. "[Mulligan] went to public school and I went to private school and on Long Island the public schools get attention from scouts."

Because of the unfounded advantage that Mulligan held over him, Campolettano was forced to play a waiting game.

"Every school I was talking to was talking to [Mulligan] and they were all making him offers first," he said. "So I had to pretty much sit around and wait for him to choose schools before I could decide."

Eventually Mulligan signed with Syracuse while Campolettano headed to UMass to succeed John Kasselakis in net for Cannella and his Minutemen.

"I told coach [Cannella] I knew Kaz [Kasselakis] was going to be the starter for the next two seasons and it just wasn't worth my time if I was only going to be the starter for two years," he said. "So he told me I should red shirt, but if I red shirted my freshman year there wouldn't have been any back up so I did it my sophomore year."

Even after watching from the sidelines in '98, Campolettano was by no means handed the title – he had to earn it.

"It was between Tom Gilligan and me for the job and really it came down to the spring scrimmages," he said.

Campolettano earned the title of number one keeper and he shined on a struggling 4-8 squad. But his exceptional first season as a starter was followed by a year of tragedy and a season of struggle.

As a senior, Campolettano refused to let his collegiate career end on a sour note. With the calamity of 2000 behind him, lacrosse has once again become the spice of life.

"It's fun again and I am starting to like it," he said. "It's not like a job or going to work everyday, lacrosse is really fun again."

His re-energized work ethic and his renewed passion for the sport he once loved has paid huge dividends on the field in 2001. Campolettano was again up to his old antics, frustrating shooters with a .627 save percentage (6th in the nation) and driving offensive coordinators to the brink of madness with a 7.87 GAA (9th).

Possibly his best game in a UMass jersey came against defending National Champion Syracuse. As the hill of Garber Field was teeming with fans, Campolettano put on a clinic for the 5,000 plus in attendance.

With a 19 save performance, he had the members of the potent Orangeman attack talking to themselves as they headed back to the sideline. His performance even drew the praise of a long time rival.

"Campy's a great goalie," Mulligan said. "It's unfortunate he doesn't get the postseason awards he deserves."

The key to Campolettano's heroics in net is not his ethic or his ability, because he has always been blessed with talent. The key is his attitude, an attitude that has been overhauled since his freshman days in Amherst.

"You look at Chris Campolettano now and compare that to when he first set foot on this campus, you're talking about going from a boy to a man," Cannella said. "And all of that has to do with Chris."

It is amazing when one thinks about the year of trepidation that he struggled through, only to return 10 months later, in top form, with aspirations parallel to those of his teammates.

"I know he'll be there when we need him," Cannella said after an early season victory.

Could he have said that a year ago? Maybe not. But in hindsight that statement is almost fortuitous, as Campolettano turned up the juice every time the he was faced with adversity. Campolettano completed his turbulent but successful four years at UMass by leading the Minutemen to one of the best seasons in its hallowed lacrosse history (12-2 record, No. 8 national ranking).

Despite the disputed absence of an NCAA tournament berth, there is no argument that Campolettano is a champion to all who know him and have heard his story.

So now you know Chris Campolettano and now you can call him Campy.

the best teams we've seen all year and they should be in that tournament, without a doubt," he said. [The teams you should be comparing UMass to] are Hofstra and Towson. Do they have any wins that are any better than UMass? I don't think so."

We can also recall Georgetown coach Dave Urick's sentiments on April 21 following a hard fought 13-12 Hoya win: "A lot of people in the lacrosse world wanted to see what was going to happen in this game and I think it's too bad a lot of them didn't have the chance to see it because it was a great effort by both squads.

"I think UMass proved that it's one of the best teams in the country.

Committees made up of representatives from participating schools should hold some kind of accountability for their decisions. But we don't see any of these members explaining their reasoning. Instead they sit behind an office door shielded from the tears of some of UMass' 12 seniors. Guys, who on Saturday – didn't think they had played their last game. Guys, who knew that they were a part of one of the 12 best teams in the country.

"I'm going to try not to let this ruin an outstanding year – one of the best we've ever had here," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

Talk about dedication. If UMass had been selected to play in next week's first round, Cannella told us he would have driven immediately to his office to prepare.

Instead, he drove home.

Shipp

Payton Award voting. The two most memorable outings of the year, a home victory over UConn and a first-round playoff win at Furman, gave Shipp a wealth of satisfaction even as he padded his stats.

"It felt great to beat UConn," said Shipp, who pushed the Huskies around for 150 all-purpose yards and three scores. "We knew going in that they'd beaten us the two times before, so we were really up for that game. We just took it to 'em."

To cap his rampage against Furman (170 rushing yards, 2 TD's), Shipp plunged in from one yard out with the winning score in overtime. Again he credited his line, the whole of which garnered WHMP / UMass Player of the Week honors following the game.

"A lot of people look at it like I did all that on my own," Shipp said. "But my linemen are the ones who open up the holes for me; I just run through them."

Despite being hobbled by a high ankle sprain throughout his senior season, Shipp still managed to rush for 1,106 yards on 257 carries and 12 touchdowns on the year, while also catching 23 passes for 230 yards. His highlight-reel performances came at home against New Haven (31 carries for 147 yards), Maine (20 for 125) and Rhode Island (36 for 156). Prior to Shipp's A-10 record-breaking day against the Rams in the season finale, Whipple reflected on how the banged-up back was still head-and-shoulders above most of the team's competition.

"Marcel has been hobbled all year and he hasn't complained once; I think that speaks volumes about his character," Whipple said. "But he's gotten a little better each week, and 60 to 70 percent of Marcel Shipp is better than most other backs. I wouldn't trade him for anybody."

UMass earns NCAA berth

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

As if the cold, drizzly atmosphere wasn't bad enough - that overbearing institution known as tradition forced senior Patty Robinson of the Massachusetts field hockey team to flip over a Gatorade jug and unload its freezing, soggy contents on the crown of Head Coach Patty Shea.

"I'm never cooking you dinner again," exclaimed Shea immediately thereafter.

And to think: It was all just a big 'thank you' for the Atlantic 10 Coach-of-the-Year who had cooked her championship-hungry team a tasty lasagna dinner on Saturday night.

Well maybe that wasn't the reason.

But part of the rationale for Shea's dousing was that her team had just beaten the Temple Owls 3-0 to capture its second consecutive Atlantic 10 championship. And it was headed to the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

"Today was a 2-for-1 deal," Shea said. "We win it – we win the Atlantic 10 Championship and we also win a birth into the NCAA tournament with one singular performance. We achieved two of our goals today."

Sunday's A-10 final matched the No. 1 seed Minutewomen (17-3, 5-0 A-10) up against the No. 2 seeded Owls (11-11, 4-1) for that prized automatic tourney bid.

Neither team could find the net in the first half, but many a times Temple was there knocking on the UMass cage's door. Maroon and White goaltender Zowie Tucker just wouldn't let them in.

At 29:14 in that stanza Tucker made her first crucial save, lalling to the ground for the denial. Ten minutes later, she made another great save, this time on a solid shot off an ball-on-ball penalty corner.

"She's a wall back there," Robinson said. "We know she's back there to pick up our mistakes."

Her most critical series of saves came with just under one minute remaining in the first half when she came out of the net and was forced to ball on the ball resulting in another Temple corner. But Tucker stopped the ensuing shot, and the Minutewomen defense was able to survive the scramble in front and knocked the ball out of the circle and watched the remaining first half seconds tick of the clock.

"If Zowie's not there to stop that ball – we're down 1-0 and we have to score two just to get ahead," Shea said. "And that's very, very difficult to do.

"We were lucky to get out of there 0-0 in the first half," she continued. "I think we were playing not to lose. And I told them at halftime that we must play to win this game. It has nothing to do with skill or anything. It has to do with what's in our hearts."

For the seniors, it was the last time they competed on the turf of Richard F. Garber field. But Kristen Schmidt didn't remember.

"I actually forgot about that until someone told me at the end of the game," Schmidt said.

But yesterday, her mind didn't lapse offensively. Schmidt scored three unanswered goals en route to her first hat trick of the season, and the Most Outstanding Player of the tournament award. She also tied the A-10 Championship weekend record for most goals with four.

Note: UMass lost in the NCAA Final Eight to North Carolina.

Jobs for New UMass Students

What are you looking for in a job?

If you're like most UMass students, you'll be looking for some cash.

Our bus and van drivers make between $8.80 and $10.20 per hour, so we can line your pockets to your heart's content. You can work as little or as much as you want, whatever works with your class schedule.

But we can also help you after you leave UMass, because we have some of the best promotional positions of any student job. We'll give you real supervisory experience working as a Driver Supervisor, Dispatcher, Commercial Driver's License Trainer, and more. That'll look great on a resumé, no matter what your major is. Oh, and for those jobs, you get paid even more—up to $11.20 per hour.

So don't get stuck with a job that's going nowhere. Become a part of the team that moves UMass and drive into your future.

To get started, fill out an online application at www.umass.edu/bus. New students and transfer students can train this summer and start driving in the fall! We'll even help you with housing while you train!*

Lappas becomes 19th head hoops coach

Leaves Villanova, Big East for A-10

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Athletic Director Bob Marcum officially filled the men's basketball team's head coaching vacancy by announcing the hiring of Steve Lappas in a press conference on March 26.

The 47-year-old Lappas became the nineteenth head coach in the 92-year history of the program, and assumed his third head coaching position at the Division I collegiate level. He resigned the week prior after nine seasons at the helm of Villanova, before which he coached four seasons at Manhattan College.

Lappas compiled a .613 winning percentage (174-110) with the Wildcats, including eight postseason berths and six seasons with at least 20 wins. That success apparently convinced Marcum and other UMass officials to curtail their interview process and speed up their timetable for hiring the new coach.

"When you embark on a search for a head coach, you look for a proven winner," said Marcum. "We really had no set number of candidates, and no set timeline; the University was very good at granting us the privilege to work at our own pace.

"But something changed all that. And what changed it was Steve Lappas."

Despite his success at Villanova, Lappas felt pressure from fans after his team exited this year's National Invitational Tournament (NIT) with an 18-13 record. He became aware of the UMass vacancy after pondering a move "for a couple months," and welcomed the opportunity for a fresh start.

"I left Villanova because it was time for a change for me and my family," Lappas said. "I just felt that it was a good opportunity for me not just to go somewhere else, but to go somewhere like this. I like the situation here; it's a great school, with a great arena and geographic location."

Lappas addressed a number of issues during the conference, including recruiting, scheduling and the expectations that he will likely face. The initial indication was that Lappas would bring at least a portion of his staff from Villanova with him to UMass, and the coach hinted that some of his recruits from VU may also end up in Amherst.

"We have a list of a few names that could potentially show up here," Lappas said. "If I didn't have a list, I wouldn't be doing my job."

One of Flint's biggest complaints at the time of his resignation two weeks before was the team's scheduling, which he said creates too tough a non-conference lineup with too many road games. Faced with questions about scheduling yesterday, Lappas appeared confident in his ability to guide the Minutemen through the slate currently set for next season.

"Every schedule in the nation has to have a balance that suits that particular program and their particular school," Lappas said. "I'm comfortable with what's on the plate for next year."

When asked how he will handle the inevitable comparisons to former UMass coach John Calipari that plagued Flint throughout his term as head coach, Lappas was quick to defend both the job his predecessor did and his own history of overcoming expectations. He cited his task in 1992 of succeeding Rollie Massimino at Villanova as preparing him for any such pressure at UMass (Massimino's Wildcats captured the school's first and only national championship in 1985, Lappas' first year as a VU assistant).

"I had a tough act to follow at Villanova, and I have a tough act to follow here," Lappas said. "Bruiser did a very good job here, both as a head coach and an assistant. It's a very tough league, but the Big East is a tough league too."

In the net, setting up Camp

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

You can't call him Campy. You can't because you don't know him. You can't because you don't know what he has been through. You can't because to you he is a number or a statistic. You can't because all you saw in 2000 was a dismal goals against average, when all he felt was grief and sadness.

You don't know Chris Campolettano, because if you did you would understand why the last thing he wanted to do 365 days ago was play lacrosse.

"Last year my mom died over the winter and my grandfather died before I came back to school," he said. "Last time I really played, [lacrosse] my buddy Eric [Sopreasa] died so that left a bad taste in my mouth."

Campolettano left Amherst after his red shirt sophomore touted as one of the best young goaltenders in college lacrosse with an upside that had his coaching staff and his defense salivating.

But the death of close friend Sopreasa scarred what turned out to be a glimmering full season debut for the sophomore. Leaving Massachusetts for Long Island, N.Y. should have helped Campolettano but instead he was met with more tragedy over the winter of 1999.

The loss of his mother and his grandfather coupled with the tragic memories of a fallen teammate led to a time of confusion for the star goaltender, so lacrosse took a backseat to life.

"My head really wasn't on lacrosse," he said. "I just wanted to hang out with my buddies and not really do anything, so my performance really slipped a lot."

His 12-month nightmare concluded with a lurid 14 games in 2000. For the first time since his seventh birthday Campolettano really didn't want to be in net – and it showed. Growing up in Long Island is much like a childhood of playground basketball in New York City.

"My brother [Matt] and me had a goal in my backyard and we lived behind a park, so we used to bring the goal out there," he said. "In Long Island everyone plays lacrosse so we used to play in pickup games, instead of playing pickup basketball we played pickup lacrosse."

In the mold of a pure jump shooter that grew up taking hundreds of shots a day, Chris and Matt Campolettano were seemingly born and bred as attackmen. But somehow the elder of the two brothers got roped into stopping shots instead of firing them.

"My Dad was my coach my first year when I played attack. I was seven years old," he said. "Nobody else wanted to play goalie so he asked me if I could play one year and after that he promised me I would never have

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Senior Chris Campolettano led the Massachusetts lacrosse team to a 12-2 record this season. The Minutemen's losses were both by a single goal.

Men's lax left out of NCAA Championships

The entire setup is wrong.

Instead of forcing teams into little conference rooms to watch their fates expire on television, the NCAA should send its officials to the respective schools of possible tournament teams to tell the players, "no."

"No, you didn't make it. Instead we've picked a team you beat 17-13 to play next week. You can come watch them if you want. We've set aside tickets for you at West Point to watch."

We're sure 6-foot-3, 210 pound junior Matt McFarland and 6-foot-4, 230 pound Tom Fallon would love to sit down and have a nice tête-à-tête with any member of the committee.

The NCAA really outdid itself this time.

Everyone isn't invited – not to worry – we haven't forgotten that. But when a team that wins 12 times (more wins than 11 teams that made the tournament) is excluded from the tournament, questions begin to arise about the objectivity and power of the so-called "committee."

Is the committee biased? The politically correct answer would be no. But when looking at the members of this group of selectors (found in the 2001 NCAA Lacrosse Rules) and cross analyzing it with this year's bracket, certain trends appear.

Trend A: Hofstra, a team that the Minutemen defeated 17-13 in Hempstead, N.Y., sneaked in as an unseeded at-large bid. The Pride, ranked No. 9 in many preseason polls, struggled this season going 9-6 and lost in the America East championship game to Towson.

Harry Royle is Hofstra's Director of Intercollegiate Athletics. His name can be found on page four of the 2001 Men's Lacrosse Rules book under NCAA Men's Lacrosse Committee.

Trend B: Virginia is 7-6. Their coach, Dominic D. Starsia, is also on the committee. This is the Cavaliers' ninth consecutive tournament appearance.

So why was UMass ignored?

Under the committee's reasoning, the Minutemen had only one quality win – that being over Hofstra. Hofstra had two. It beat Notre Dame (seeded No. 5 in the tournament) and Duke (at-large bid).

It doesn't matter Hofstra lost six times. The Maroon and White could have lost to Boston College, Stony Brook, Vermont or Albany – but if it beat either Georgetown or Syracuse by one goal instead of losing by that margin then UMass would have been a virtual tournament lock.

Let us reminisce on the words of Syracuse coach and committee member John Desko: "I thought the way [UMass] played [April 28] as a team – both offensively and defensively – was of a playoff caliber team."

Or how about Brown coach Scott Nelson: "They are one of Marcel Shipp was recently invited to the Arizona Cardinals' NFL training camp.

Hula Bowl spells 'Aloha' for Shipp

Senior tailback finishes off storybook career

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Some of it was familiar, some of it was not.

The roar of the almost 24,000 fans in attendance for the Jan. 21 Hula Bowl had to be a new experience for Massachusetts tailback Marcel Shipp. Starting the game on the sideline and only touching the ball six times also must have felt awkward for the senior.

Finding the endzone on two of those carries? Business as usual.

Shipp scored on a one-yard plunge and a 12-yard catch to help stake the North squad to a 31-23 victory and put a serious exclamation point on probably the most glorious season ever for a UMass football player.

Six days prior to the Hula Bowl, Shipp was named to the 2000 Associated Press Division I-AA All-America third team for the third year in a row. The New Jersey native was a finalist for the Walter Payton Award, in addition to being named first team All Atlantic 10 and All-New England. Shipp broke the Atlantic 10 career rushing record of New Hampshire's Jerry Azumah (6,193 yards) with his career total of 6,250 yards.

Shipp ended his career with a UMass record 63 touchdowns, while placing sixth on the all-time NCAA Division I-AA career rushing list with 5,383 regular season yards. He also became the first player in school history to break the 1,000-yard mark in both rushing and receiving with 1,117 career receiving yards.

Starting the last nine games of his first UMass campaign, Shipp set the school record for freshman rushing yards with 756. But even as he tasted success, Shipp was feeling the heat brought on by the team's one-dimensional offense.

"When I first came here I just fit in well with the system, but there was no passing game," Shipp said. "To stop UMass, you only had to stop one thing – the run."

With Shipp's second season came an absolute explosion from the 6-foot, 216-pound back. After moderate showings in the first two games of the year, Shipp bombed Buffalo for 221 yards rushing and never looked back; he would reach triple digits on the ground in the next 18 games that he dressed for.

"What happened was that developed a passing game to set up the run," Shipp said. "Instead of sneaking up the safeties all the time and playing the run, teams had to be honest. We had a more balanced attack, and that opened up a lot of things."

What it "opened up" was a floodgate of highlight-reel performances from Shipp. In one incredible two-week span late in the '98 campaign, Shipp torched Maine for a career-high 270 yards rushing and for an encore bulldozed arch-rival Connecticut for 257 more. He credits his second family – the offensive line – for his unbelievable outing against Maine, the fourth-highest single game rushing total in UMass history.

"Our line did a Hell of a job against Maine that day," Shipp said. "I had an 80-yard run where I wasn't even touched once. We were out there having fun, and winning at the same time. That's always a plus."

The jewel in Shipp's sophomore year crown, however, came in the NCAA Championship game against Georgia Southern. Picked as underdogs to the mighty Eagles, the Minutemen came in with cool confidence and cruised to victory behind a 244-yard, three-touchdown showcase from Shipp.

"We went into that game with nothing to lose," Shipp said. "We had a great tone, then everything came together; the offensive line blocked great and opened up the passing game, and we had the running game going on from the beginning. We were ready to play."

Head coach Mark Whipple is nothing short of blunt when it comes to assessing Shipp's part in UMass' Cinderella season.

"Nobody would be wearing rings around here if it weren't for Marcel," Whipple said.

Shipp picked up right where he left off once the '99 campaign rolled around. He started every game of the year, and stockpiled 1,853 more rushing yards and 25 touchdowns on his way to a sixth-place finish in the
